Day after day we on this side, and some of the progressives on the other side, would cite the facts as to what was going to happen in the event you persisted in the passage of that law. We begged you to take into consideration these prophecies of these great economists who signed that letter, from California to Maine. But you would pay no attention to it. You would go out and increase taxes upon the people. You would increase these duties.

During all that I can hear the sweet, eloquent voice of the Senator from Indiana, with that fine physique of his-and he is a great orator; I sometimes fall under the spell of his benign countenance and the wonderful grip of his imagination. [Laughter.] He made a great speech on June 13, 1930. The prophecy that he made at that time was not like the prophecy made by these men who knew what would happen. His prophecy that day was not made with the same information back of it that was possessed by this group of more than a thousand economists, who had studied the economic conditions of the world and knew the effect of the passage of that measure. My friend said this on that day:

I here and now predict-

He bows his head-

I here and now predict, and I ask my fellow Senators to recall this prediction in the days to come—that if this bill is passed-

[Laughter.]

The Smoot-Hawley bill-

this Nation will be on the upgrade financially, economically, and commercially within 30 days.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What was the date of that? Mr. HARRISON. That was June 13, 1930.

And that within a year from this time we shall have regained the peak of prosperity and the position we lost last October, and shall again resume our position as the first and foremost of all the peoples of history in all the essential elements of individual and national greatness

A great speech; a bad prophet. [Laughter.] None of that came true. But he was speaking in support of the measure then pending, as he was the other night speaking over the

Here is what the economists said would happen. Let us put these prophecies side by side.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Was there ever a time since the birth of | the Republican Party, when a tariff bill was being considered, when economists did not prophesy that it would destroy our foreign trade and our domestic industry?

Mr. HARRISON. I want to say this in behalf of my

Mr. WATSON. No; answer my question.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not surprised at him making that statement, because he got the inspiration from President Hoover in the campaign three years ago, who spoke along the same line and made the same kind of prophecies. I think he went a little farther than did the Senator, because he was going to put two automobiles in every garage, and he was going to put a chicken in every pot, I believe.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Two chickens.

Mr. HARRISON. Two chickens; yes. We found out there were nothing but necks in the pot, however.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator answer my question directly? Has there ever been a time when a great majority of economists did not prophesy as I have suggested? When the Dingley bill was under consideration, when the Payne-Aldrich bill was under consideration, when the Fordney-McCumber bill was before us, did not a great majority of the economists predict exactly what the thousand economists predicted when the last tariff bill was under consideration?

Mr. HARRISON. I have not looked back at all that, but I dare say there never was such an avalanche of economists that prophesied in such a singularly correct way as did those 1.009 economists as to the dire effects of the Smoot-Hawley measure. Economists are in a better position to judge than is the Senator from Indiana. Their training qualifies them to analyze and forecast. That is why we have economists. I reckon some economists in the past have prophesied as the Senator suggests, but they certainly never missed the mark as did my friend in his prophecy.

May I ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Can the Senator produce a number of economists who prophesied in connection with the passage of the Dingley law, the Payne-Aldrich law, or any other tariff law, such as I am going to read here?

Mr. WATSON. I do not say there were a thousand economists; but I do say that a very great number of economists in each instance predicted precisely what these economists did in this instance.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I will come down to the Senator's size. Can he name one economist who during the consideration and prior to the passage of any tariff bill predicted in the way he has stated?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; and I will give them in a little while. The Senator remembers it because it has been discussed

Mr. HARRISON. I want the Senator to name just one.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, I can not do that just offhand.

Mr. HARRISON. But I can name 1,009 who prophesied respecting the effects of the passage of the Smoot-Hawley

Mr. WATSON. Certainly; because the Senator has the list before him. I can not remember who prophesied 10 or 15 years ago.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me ask the Senator another question. I am sure he wants to be candid, even if he is going to come up for reelection this year.

Mr. WATSON. That does not bother me any.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no; I presume not. Is it the Senator's opinion that the thousand economists who prophesied in this morbid and foreboding way were more correct in their prophecy than the Senator was?

Mr. WATSON. They were more correct than I was, but here is the difference between us. In the first place, I prophesied at the tail end of an oration. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator always wrong when he comes to the tail end of an oration? [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. Not always. The point about it is that at the time I uttered that prophecy I did not know the depth | indorsed by the Senator from Indiana.

and the intensity of the industrial depression all over the world. I had no conception of it at that time. I could not foresee the depths to which we would fall industrially, commercially, and financially in the United States.

Of course, at that time it was an idle prophecy to make. I understand that. But these economists year after year are studying this question from the financial, industrial, and commercial standpoint, and they make their prophecies based on what they suppose are settled data and fixed principles. In no instance have they been right except that they happened to be right in this particular instance.

Mr. HARRISON. On what did the Senator base his prophecy?

Mr. WATSON. On the fact that after the passage of the Dingley law, after the passage of the Payne-Aldrich tariff act in 1909, and after the passage of the Fordney-McCumber tariff act, the country did move forward in an era of great prosperity. Our labor was employed better than ever before.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think our good friend from Indiana ought to be attacked on the ground of being a bad prophet. He may have been in this one instance, but I remember prior to the last Republican National Convention, when he was prophesying what would happen if a certain man was nominated for the Republican presidential candidacy, his prophecy was very, very accurate. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Indiana talks about how prosperity came after the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich law. The Senator knows full well what happened following that event because I think he went down in that avalanche himself.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no; I did not.

Mr. HARRISON. Then he escaped that time, but they got him two years later, I believe. Anyway, when Mr. Taft signed the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, after he had spoken as a candidate in favor of that tariff bill, and then when that was enacted into law and raised the rates too high, the Senator knows what happened to him. I think Mr. Taft carried Utah and Vermont, did he not? Were they not the only two States he carried?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has that all wrong. Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has his dates mixed.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is mixed on his dates, like he is on his figures.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not mixed on my figures at all. I came to the Sixty-second Congress in 1911. The Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act was passed in 1909. At the following election the Democrats came into control; we had a majority in the House; and the very next time the American people came to elect a President, Mr. Taft appeared again as a candidate, and he was snowed under an avalanche of votes. Are not those the facts?

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, what are the facts?

Mr. WATSON. I am going to give them to the Senator if he will listen and can comprehend and appreciate them. Does the Senator pretend to say that the defeat of the Republican Party in 1912 was due to the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it had as much to do with it as any other one factor, or probably more.

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator know the candidacy of Theodore Roosevelt brought about that result?

Mr. HARRISON. Now the Senator is hunting for another

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator from Mississippi know that to be the fact?

Mr. HARRISON. I know that contributed somewhat: but Mr. Roosevelt never would have run for the Presidency had it not been for Mr. Taft's reactionary policies, followed and Mr. WATSON. The Senator is entirely mistaken in that conclusion, because Roosevelt himself was a protectionist. There was no quarrel between Taft and Roosevelt over the Payne-Aldrich law, never at any time.

Mr. HARRISON. There was and there are different kinds of protectionists.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator knows that the one great hope the Democratic Party had in 1912 was the split caused by the candidacy of Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; outside of the present split in the Republican Party that was the worst split the party has ever had.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think my friend from Indiana, whose knowledge of political matters is perhaps not surpassed by that of any Member of the Senate, has forgotten the fact that Mr. Roosevelt's candidacy was in part due to what he believed to be the reactionary policies pursued by Mr. Taft and the Republican Party, including the enactment of high tariff laws. It is true, as the Senator said, Mr. Roosevelt was a protectionist, but he was not an extreme protectionist, as were Mr. Aldrich and Mr. Payne. He did not support that brand of protection which found expression in the Payne-Aldrich law. The support by Mr. Taft of the high protectionists contributed very much to inducing Mr. Roosevelt and the progressives in the Republican Party to organize the Progressive Party and nominate Mr. Roosevelt as a candidate for President.

Mr. WATSON. I disagree entirely with my distinguished friend, who is generally accurate and always fair.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to get the facts, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WATSON. Then let me tell the Senator something. The truth about it is that the thing that did Mr. Taft more harm than anything else was his attempt to establish reciprocity with Canada. His endeavors to bring about Canadian reciprocity drove from him the whole farm vote in the West. I know that to be the fact.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator knows that after President Taft signed the Payne-Aldrich bill he was voted down at the next election, and a great army of those who voted for it in the House were defeated in the congressional elections following.

Mr. WATSON. That is true; but that particular feature of it had no more relation to the tariff than it had to the tide.

Mr. HARRISON. It was almost as great a catastrophe as that in the last election which fell upon those Senators who voted for the Smoot-Hawley monstrosity. They are here no more. The people will not stand for that kind of thing. They rise up every time the Republicans try to put on these excessive duties. The Senator has gotten away from his own adage of protection. The Senator said something about the Payne-Aldrich bill saving the situation when it was passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must know that if the rates in the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act were so outrageously high as he undertakes to make the country believe, it would have affected the importations, particularly under conditions existing in the world and in our own country to-day. The people have not the purchasing power here that they had when the bill passed, and yet I call attention to the fact that there are more goods coming into the United States now under existing conditions, difficult as they are economically, than was the case under the former act.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Is not that so?

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to discuss that one phase.

I thought that the Senator was going to say what he said over the radio, that the falling off of our trade is due to the falling off of importations in other countries, but I now find that what he said is that the importations are not falling off.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. I have not talked over the radio. Mr. HARRISON. Let me give some figures,

Mr. SMOOT. I took the figures from the statement of the Treasury Department issued yesterday.

Mr. HARRISON. I have those figures, too. I do not suppose they give us two different sets of figures. They have not become as bad as that. If the Senator from Utah will sit down and let me give him some figures, I believe I can enlighten him.

The Senator said that when the Payne-Aldrich bill passed things got better. The facts are that in 1910, when there was a Republican administration, when the Republicans had control of the House and Senate, immediately following the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill our exports were $1,744,000,000. In 1911, when the Democrats got control of the House, they were $2,049,000,000. In 1912 they were $2,204,000,000. In 1913, when the Democrats came into power, got control of the Government and passed the Underwood law, they were $2,465,000,000. Those were the exportations at that time. They continued to rise until some time during the war, which I would not take as a fair proposition because naturally they would rise when we got into the war. They rose then to over $8,000,000,000. That was under a Democratic tariff act.

Let us see what happened under the Smoot-Hawley Act. In 1929, when we were considering the tariff bill, when all the countries of the world were protesting against the rates the Senator from Utah wanted to put into it, citing to him that they would be forced to retaliate, our exports from this country were $5,128,000,000. In 1930 they had gone from that figure down to $3,842,000,000. That was the first year under the operation of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. That was $3,842,000,000 or nearly $1,500,000,000 of a falling off in our exports after the Senator from Utah passed his wonderful tariff act about which he has been talking, the one that was going to bring prosperity to the country, the one that was going to revive industry in the country and restore confidence.

Last year, 1931—oh, I dislike even to quote it because it portrays the pitiful situation that has been brought about in our export trade. Here we were with an export trade of more than $5,000,000,000 before we enacted the Smoot-Hawley tariff law, and after that was done we decreased until last year our exports had dropped to $2,424,000,000.

That is the way the Republican Party has done things, and yet my friend from Indiana says that the passage of every Republican tariff measure has helped business. Importations, of course, are falling off considerably; they are diminishing to such an extent that we had last year a balance of trade in our favor of only $325,000,000, whereas in times past the balance of trade in our favor had risen until it was more than $2,000,000,000. Talk about this law bringing prosperity! It has done what these distinguished economists said it would do. They foretold what was going to happen. Their statement was:

We are convinced that increased protective duties would be a mistake.

My friends the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Utah say it was not a mistake. These economists further said:

Few people could hope to gain from such a change. Miners, construction, transportation and public-utility workers, professional people and those employed in banks, hotels, newspaper offices, in the wholesale and retail trades, and scores of other occupations would clearly lose, since they produce no products which could be protected by tariff barriers.

pations would clearly lose, since they produce no products which could be protected by tariff barriers.

The vast majority of farmers, also, would lose. Their cotton, corn, lard, and wheat are export crops and are sold in the world market. They have no important competition in the home market. They can not benefit, therefore, from any tariff which is imposed upon the basic commodities which they produce. They would lose through the increased duties on manufactured goods, however, and in a double fashion. First, as consumers they would have to pay still higher prices for the products, made of textiles, chemicals, iron, and steel, which they buy. Second, as producers their ability to sell their products would be further restricted by the barriers placed in the way of foreigners who wished to sell manufactured goods to us.

Our export trade in general would suffer.

And it has suffered to the extent of nearly $3,000,000,000.

There are few more ironical spectacles than that of the American Government as it seeks on the one hand to promote exports through the activity of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Comwhile on the other hand by increasing tariffs it makes exportation ever more difficult.

In my opinion the Republican Party has practiced the worst kind of political hypocrisy upon the American people. We have recently considered a bill here that carriedhave forgotten the exact amount—but somewhere around eight or nine million dollars to be expended in an effort to increase our foreign trade and commerce. We appropriate money to be spent abroad in the hope of increasing our foreign trade, and yet we pass a law that builds a tariff wall so high that nobody can trade with us. That is why our foreign trade is disappearing.

These economists further stated:

We do not believe that American manufacturers in general need higher tariffs.

I will again insert in the RECORD this statement, Mr. President, so that those who chance to read this debate may see what the greatest political economists in the country in 1930 thought of the imposition of these excessive duties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so

The matter referred to is as follows:

The undersigned American economists and teachers of economics strongly urge that any measure which provides for a general upward revision of tariff rates be denied passage by Congress or, if passed, be vetoed by the President. We are convinced that increased protective duties would be

We are convinced that increased protective duties would be a mistake. They would operate in general to increase the prices which domestic consumers would have to pay. By raising prices they would encourage concerns with higher costs to undertake production, thus compelling the consumer to subsidize waste and inefficiency in industry. At the same time they would force him to pay higher rates of profit to established firms which enjoyed lower production costs. A higher level of protection, such as is contemplated by both the House and Senate bills, would, therefore, raise the cost of living and injure the great majority of our citizens. our citizens.

Few people could hope to gain from such a change. Miners, construction, transportation and public-utility workers, professional people and those employed in banks, hotels, newspaper offices, in the wholesale and retail trades, and scores of other occupations would clearly lose, since they produce no products which could be protected by tariff barriers.

Our export trade in general would suffer. Countries can not permanently buy from us unless they are permitted to sell to us.

permanently buy from us unless they are permitted to sell to us, and the more we restrict the importation of goods from them by means of ever higher tariffs the more we reduce the possibility of our exporting to them. This applies to such exporting industries as copper, automobiles, agricultural machinery, typewriters, and the like fully as much as it does to farming. The difficulties of these industries are likely to be increased still further if we pass a higher tariff. There are already many evidences that such action would inevitably provoke other countries to pay us back in kind by levying retallatory duties against our goods. There are few more ironical spectacles than that of the American Government as it seeks, on the one hand, to promote exports through the activity of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, while, on the other hand, by increasing tariffs it makes exportation ever more difficult. President Hoover has well said, in his message to Congress on April 16, 1929, "It is obviously unwise protection which sacrifices a greater amount of employment in exports to gain a less amount of employment from imports."

We do not believe that American manufacturers in general need we do not believe that American maintacturers in general need higher tariffs. This report of the President's committee on recent economic changes has shown that industrial efficiency has in-creased, that costs have fallen, that profits have grown with amaz-ing rapidity since the end of the war. Already our factories sup-ply our people with over 96 per cent of the manufactured goods which they consume, and our producers look to foreign markets to absorb the increasing output of their machines. Further barriers to trade will serve them not well but ill.

Many of our citizens have invested their money in foreign enterprises. The Department of Commerce has estimated that such investments, entirely aside from the war debts, amounted to between $12,555,000,000 and $14,555,000,000 on January 1, 1929. These investors, too, would suffer if protective duties were to be increased, since such action would make it still more difficult for their for-

America is now facing the problem of unemployment. Her labor can find work only if her factories can sell their products. Higher tariffs would not promote such sales. We can not increase employment by restricting trade. American industry, in the present crisis, might well be saved the hydron of adjusting itself to new school. might well be spared the burden of adjusting itself to new sched-ules of protective duties.

Finally, we would urge our Government to consider the bitterness which a policy of higher tariffs would inevitably inject into our international relations. The United States was ably represented at the World Economic Conference which was held under the auspices of the League of Nations in 1927. This conference adopted a resolution announcing that "the time has come to put an end to the increase in tariffs end to move in the convexte diveran end to the increase in tariffs and to move in the opposite direction." The higher duties proposed in our pending legislation violate the spirit of this agreement and plainly invite other nations to compete with us in raising further barriers to trade. A tariff war does not furnish good soil for the growth of world peace.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, no one can possibly deny that what those economists said has come true. We have seen industries transferred from this country to Canada and other foreign countries; the figures have been cited. A newspaper in Canada the other day stated that there were now invested in Canada more than a billion dollars of American capital in manufacturing industries. We know that our manufacturers have established plants in Germany; that they have established them in France, and in many other countries. When the American people realize that the Smoot-Hawley law by placing excessive duties upon importations drove factories out of America into Canada and prevented American manufacturers from carrying on their foreign export trade, which they worked for years and years to build up, thus causing tremendous unemployment in Detroit and in the other great industrial centers of the land they will see in that one thing the injurious effect of the passage of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law.

I do not know whether or not anything can be done by this Government to keep American capital from going abroad and erecting factories, giving employment to foreign peoples, causing unemployment in this country, and creating a problem that is grave indeed, but if there is anything from a governmental standpoint that can be done, it ought to be done. I must say that I have some degree of sympathy with the automobile manufacturers, for instance, as an illustration, who had built up a great American industry, which was selling abroad $520,000,000 worth of automobiles in 1928 and until Congress passed the Smoot-Hawley law. Of course, we are not selling that amount of automobiles now, for when we passed that law France retaliated, as England retaliated, and the other day both France and England again retaliated and raised higher and broader their rates. Canada and practically all the other countries have retaliated against us. What can those manufacturers do? They have either got to supply merely the American trade, operate only a sufficient time to supply the American trade, or they must go to those foreign countries in which they have built up a trade if they want to supply it, or else must close their plants. So I have some sympathy for the American manufacturer who, by the narrow policy of the Republican Party, has been driven out of this country and forced to go abroad in order to manufacture goods for the foreign market.

For the first time, Mr. President, I think the business men of America are waking up; I think the American laboring man is beginning to realize that the narrow, selfish policy of exorbitant and excessive protection, destroying our trade, has driven American capital and American factories abroad, to the detriment of this country. So they are changing their views, and they are coming around to believe in the sound, economic policy of having sane tariff rates such as will permit international trade and commerce to flow in the regular channels, which will protect the American consumer and at the same time preserve American industries which are properly located and efficiently managed. That sentiment is one of the signs of the times, in my opinion, and it will be manifest in the approaching election, which will afford the first chance the American voters have had to express themselves in regard to the man who signed the Smoot-Hawley tariff law, the man who sat in the White House while the Republican majority, with its groups and schemes working, were bringing in Members to vote for what they proposed by offering them this or offering them that. I believe the American people are going to condemn him by the biggest vote that has ever been cast against a candidate.

I am not going to ask my friend from Indiana whether he agrees with me in that statement, because I do not want to pry into his conscience that far, but nearly everybody believes that to be so. No party can adopt such unwise policies as those embodied in the last tariff act without creating an abnormal condition and without being repudiated at the hands of the American people.

Mr. President, I think that is all I want to say for the time being. As the bill proceeds we shall explain any amendments that may be suggested. I hope that the bill will pass.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few moments ago the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. Warson] stated that I was usually accurate and always fair, but in the statement that I made concerning the Payne-Aldrich law, Mr. Roosevelt, and the Progressive Party I was inaccurate. The statement I made that the Senator thought was inaccurate was that one of the contributing causes to the formation of the Progressive Party was the Payne-Aldrich high tariff bill, which was opposed by Mr. Roosevelt. I respectfully assert that I was accurate; and in support of my position I shall read from the national platform of the Progressive Party, adopted at Chicago, Ill., August 7, 1912. It was understood at the time that Mr. Roosevelt wrote the platform; it was his political creed; he not only organized the Bull Moose or Progressive Party but was its leader and articulate voice.

Here is what he wrote into the platform:

We condemn the Payne-Aldrich bill as unjust to the people.

That is the position that I took, namely, that Mr. Roosevelt condemned the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, the enactment of which, with the support given it by Mr. Taft, was one of the causes of the breach between the two distinguished Republicans.

The Republican organization is in the hands of those who have broken faith and can not again be trusted to keep the promise of necessary downward revision—

Before the discussion concerning the pending measure is concluded, if opportunity is afforded, I shall put into the RECORD statements made by Mr. Roosevelt during the campaign when he was bitterly opposing the Republican Party and Mr. Taft, its candidate for the Presidency, in which he condemned both Mr. Taft and the Republican Party and charged that pledges for revision of the tariff had been broken and that the Republican Party was no longer worthy of the confidence and support of the people. Mr. Roosevelt, because of his dynamic force and his attacks upon predatory interests and the privileged classes, as well as because of his support of a number of progressive policies, won a high place in the esteem of the American people. Though he believed in a protective tariff he was not a high protectionist; and when his successor, Mr. Taft, was elected upon what Mr. Roosevelt believed to be a platform calling for a revision of the tariff and a reduction downward and a readjustment of tariff rates in the interests of the masses of the people, he was not only dissatisfied but thoroughly aroused against what he believed to be a surrender by his party to selfish interests and to what he regarded as predatory interests. Mr. Roosevelt and his followers made no secret of their opposition to Mr. Taft and to the Republican Party, and one of their indictments against the latter was its enactment of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. In the Progressive platform there was, however, a criticism of the Democratic Party. While Mr. Roosevelt struck the Republican Party with one hand he was not sparing of the party of which I am a humble member.

The Progressive platform also contains the following language:

It is imperative to the welfare of our people that we enlarge and extend our foreign commerce. We are preeminently fitted, because as a people we have developed high skill in the art of manufacturing, our business men are strong executives and strong organizers, and in every way possible our Federal Government should cooperate in this important matter.

Mr. Roosevelt did not believe in national isolation; he favored foreign trade in commerce and sought foreign markets for American products. Our Republican friends by their high-tariff measures are interrupting the stream of trade and commerce which should flow around the world for the benefit of the United States and the advantage of all peoples. They are committed to policies that will close the ports of the world to our products and drive our flag from the seas. In erecting tariff barriers they are closing American mills and factories and forcing millions of American workmen from profitable employment. A self-contained and isolated country in this enlightened age would be an anachronism; it would be a stagnant and unprogressive country. Unfortunately, under the policies of the party in power our foreign and domestic trade is languishing and our country is plunged into the valley of profound depression.

Returning to the platform written by Mr. Roosevelt, it appealed to millions of our citizens, and he won an overwhelming victory over Mr. Taft and the Republican Party. Mr. Taft carried, as my colleague said, but two States—Utah and Vermont.

We demand tariff revision.

That was one of the demands of the Progressive Party, and they made it an important issue in the campaign. Mr. Roosevelt and his party were not upholding the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill; they denounced it and demanded a revision downward, declaring that it was an unjust measure and injurious to the people of the United States. Another platform declaration was:

We pledge ourselves to the establishment of a nonpartisan, scientific tariff commission, reporting both to the President and to either branch of Congress, which shall report, first, as to the costs of production, efficiency of labor and capitalization, industrial organization and efficiency, and the general competitive position in this country and abroad of industries seeking protection from Congress.

There is no demand here, Mr. President, that the Tariff Commission should have authority to fix tariff rates or that neither the President of the United States nor a tariff commission law should have the power to fix rates and usurp functions which belong exclusively to the legislative department of our Government.

There are some further general statements, Mr. President, in this platform bearing upon the question of tariff revision, but I shall not take the time of the Senate now to read them. It is obvious, however—

Mr. GORE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KING. I will yield when I complete the sentence. It is obvious, however, that Mr. Roosevelt condemned the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill and regarded its enactment as a breach of faith and a betrayal by his party of the American people. I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator from Utah overlooks the fact that Theodore Roosevelt had to avail himself of the means at hand. He could not avail himself of the irresistible charm and enchantment of Rudy Vallee's crooning. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. I understand that Mr. Vallee has been promised a medal if he will write and croon a song that will cause the people to forget the darkness and depression.

Mr. President, I rose merely to make a brief reference to the statement made by my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. Watson]. I shall put into the Record later some statements made by Mr. Roosevelt in which he condemned the Payne-Aldrich tariff law and the Republican Party for enacting it.

Mr. WATSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Kean Kendrick Austin Bailey Bankhead Couzens Sheppard Shipstead Smith Dale Davis Dickinson Keyes King Barbour Smoot Steiwer Dill Logan McGill Bingham Fess Fletcher Thomas, Idaho McKellar McNary Metcalf Blaine Thomas, Okla. The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a moment ago I read from the Progressive platform which was prepared by Theodore Roosevelt when he was a candidate for the Presidency, in which he specifically condemned the Payne-Aldrich law and charged his own party with having broken faith with the people, and that that tariff was unjust to the American people.

I have before me a speech made by Mr. Roosevelt, copy of which will be found in Senate Documents, volume 40, and I read just a few lines from that speech:

I believe in a protective tariff, but I believe in it as a principle, approached from the standpoint of the interests of the whole people and not as a bundle of preferences to be given to favored individuals. In my opinion, the American people favor the principle of a protective tariff, but they desire such a tariff to be established primarily in the interests of the wageworker and the consumer. The chief opposition to our tariff at the present moment—

That was at a time when the Payne-Aldrich law was upon the statute books—comes from the general conviction that certain interests have been improperly favored by overprotection. I agree with this view.

The commercial and industrial experience of this country has demonstrated the wisdom of the protective policy, but it has also demonstrated that in the application of that policy certain clearly recognized abuses have developed.

The Progressive platform from which I read a few moments ago and this address conclusively prove that Mr. Roosevelt was dissatisfied with the Payne-Aldrich tariff law and that he believed it had resulted in abuses injurious to the American people.

I have called attention to Mr. Roosevelt's platform and statement only because of the statement made by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was a little surprised at many of the statements made by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison]. I have never seen any real good come from a discussion when only part of the truth is told. Therefore, I shall at this time undertake to present to the Senate at least the objections I plainly see to the bill which is under consideration.

A great deal of the time of the Senator from Mississippi was taken up in talking about the decline in exportations. Anyone who has an ounce of sense knows the reason for that decline. The purchasing power of the world has been decreased until it is absolutely impossible for people in foreign markets to buy American goods or any other goods to speak of, outside of the absolute necessities of life.

If one will take into consideration the volume of business of every country in the world and compare it with the business of the world for 4 years, or 3 years, or even 2 years, he will find the whole question of our exportations answered.

During the war and immediately following the war and the years after, there was only one place capable of furnishing the world with the goods necessary; there was only one place where money could be borrowed for the purchase of those goods, and that was the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have an article by the Senator from Utah on the question of American capital leaving the United States and going into other countries and forming an oligarchy to break down the tariff system, labor, wages, and everything else. Is the Senator still of the opinion he expressed in that article?

Mr. SMOOT. I am of the same opinion I expressed relative to the tariff question at anytime.

Take the question of importations into the country, referred to by the Senator from Mississippi. He intimated that our tariff was the reason why we did not trade with foreign countries. I want to say now that foreign countries never purchased any goods from the United States at any time, under any tariff, unless they could purchase them in America cheaper than in any other part of the world.

Under the present tariff law, which the Senator has so condemned, what do we find? Even under conditions existing in the world to-day, with every nation in the world in such a frightful financial condition, not only the peoples, but the countries themselves, when they can not buy as they have in the past, we purchased in those countries more pounds, more yards, even under the conditions existing in the world to-day, under the present tariff law, which was supposed at least to protect the workingmen and the manufacturers of this country, than the year preceding.

Up to yesterday there had been collected for goods coming into this country—and I am not referring to the free list, either, which has increased in quantity, but to goods which fall within the present tariff law, the rates of which have been so condemned—during the fiscal year 1932, up to March 21, 1932, we collected $263,564,969.57. During the same period of last year we collected $280,016,625.34, the latter amount based upon goods at a much higher unit.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator give us the figures for 1928 and 1929?

Mr. SMOOT. As to the importations?

Mr. HARRISON. The collections at our customhouses. Mr. SMOOT. I have not the figures here, but I want to say, without a moment's hesitation-

Mr. HARRISON. It was four or five hundred million dollars, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that it is marvelous, it seems to me, that under the conditions existing to-day we could bring in, with our mills closed and our factories closed, more in volume than was imported into the United States a year ago. If there ever was a time in all the history of the world when a protective tariff was needed, America to-day needs a protective tariff more than she ever needed it before.

The bill under consideration (H. R. 6662) is designed to amend the flexible provision of the tariff act of 1930, to create a consumers' counsel attached to the United States Tariff Commission, and to instruct the President to call an international economic conference. This measure comes to the Senate with an adverse report from the Committee on Finance.

Before analyzing this bill I want to say, Mr. President, that there has never been a time in the history of the United States when tariff protection was more essential to the welfare of the American people than at present. Prices have declined throughout the world, but to a far greater extent in other countries than in the United States. Nearly a score of commercial nations, including Great Britain and Japan, have suspended the gold standard. Manufacturers in these countries are producing goods and paying for them with depreciated currency. At the same time they are shipping as much as possible of their produce abroad to the United States and other countries that remain on the gold standard, thus reaping extra profits because of the money they receive. In this crisis it is imperative that the American protective policy be maintained, and, if necessary,

For two years we have been in the grip of a world-wide depression that has curtailed the markets for our factories and farms, and left us with the responsibility for caring for several millions of unemployed. In spite of this fact, the volume of our imports from foreign countries continues to be large. Last year, according to the Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production, the output of industry within the United States declined 16 per cent. But what of our import trade? Our purchases from other countries fell off only 10 per cent. These figures are not based upon the foundation of value but upon the actual quantity of foreign goods that were shipped into our ports to displace our home-made and home-grown commodities.

Only to-day, Mr. President, there appeared before the Committee on Finance Mr. Flynn, representing the labor organizations of this country, and Mr. Gray, representing the farmers and agriculturists of the country, asking that something be done over and above the rates in the present law in order to give employment to the laboring man, and in order to protect agriculture from foreign products which come in direct competition with the farmers of the United States

In this time of distress and unemployment, why should we give importers a 6 per cent margin over our domestic producers? I repeat, Mr. President, there has never been a time in the history of the United States when tariff protection was so vital to our farmers, our workingmen, and our manufacturers as it is to-day. The world is still suffering from its orgy of overproduction and its panic of underconsumption.

We are all guilty of it. I am just as guilty as any man in the United States. I have not purchased what in ordinary times I would purchase; and, as I come in contact with men all over the United States, I find the same as to them.

To weaken our tariff structure at this time would be to invite all nations to use America as a dumping ground for their surplus products. Yet the chief purpose of the bill which the Senate must consider is to destroy the flexible provision of the existing act under which tariff rates may be adjusted to current conditions.

The bill which comes to us from the House of Representatives contains a very novel arrangement which would virtually transfer the rate-making power of Congress to the Tariff Commission. It provides that the commission shall investigate the difference in the cost of production of any domestic article and of any similar foreign article on request of the President or any interested party. On completing the investigation the commission would report to Congress its findings and its order with respect to such increases or decreases in the duty upon the foreign articles as the commission finds to be necessary in order to equalize such differences in the cost of production.

Under the present law the Tariff Commission is authorized to order higher or lower duties, with the approval of the President, only upon those commodities on the dutiable list, and the change may not exceed 50 per cent in either direction. These restrictions would be removed by the Collier bill. It provides that-

Any such increased or decreased duty may include the transfer of the article from the dutiable list to the free list or from the free list to the dutiable list.

And there is no restriction as to how great the change might be.

Furthermore, the Collier bill provides that-

Sixty days after the date of the report to Congress of such order by said commission, such changes in classification shall take effect, and such increased or decreased duties shall be levied, collected, and paid on such articles when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions

This order by the commission would be final unless Congress, within the 60-day period, should reverse it. The commission would have authority to order new tariffs, even on products that have never been dutiable, and those imposts difference in the value of the money they pay and the | could become law without either the Senate or the House of Representatives having an opportunity to pass upon them. Even if this bill were so construed that reports could be made and new rates ordered only while Congress should be in session, the commission might submit its orders so near to the end of a session that it would be impossible for Congress to act upon them.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Dale in the chair) Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the Senate substitute has eliminated the 60-day provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that; but the bill will go to conference if it ever passes, and I am calling attention first to what the House bill provides, and then I shall later call attention to what the amendments provide. But the bill will be in conference, if it passes the Senate, as I have no idea that it will.

I submit, Mr. President, that this provision is obviously unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has held time and time again that Congress may not delegate its legislative powers. The fundamental law is made clear in Hampton v. the United States (276 U.S. Repts. 394), the case in which the court held the flexible arrangement of the 1922 tariff act to be constitutional. The court says:

The Congress may not delegate its purely legislative power to a commission, but having laid down the general rules of action under which a commission shall proceed, it may require of that commission the application of such rules to particular situations and the investigation of facts, with a view to making orders in a particular matter within the rules laid down by Congress.

Under this interpretation of the fundamental law Congress could not authorize the Tariff Commission to levy imposts on commodities that are not now dutiable without laying down a tariff formula broad enough to cover every item that is ever imported into the United States. There is nothing in the tariff law and nothing in this bill which establishes the policy of putting a duty on every single commodity that costs more to produce in the United States than in foreign competing countries. I think that I am safe in concluding, Mr. President, that no such drastic measure will be sponsored by the Democratic Members of this body to give the bill we have before us a semblance of constitutionality. I do not intend, therefore, to take the time of the Senate in further discussing this measure, which is repugnant to the fundamental law of the United States and contrary to any sound or reasonable principle for administrative adjustment of tariff rates.

The Senator from Mississippi has proposed a substitute bill, and it is this measure which I especially wish to call to the attention of the Senate. Instead of allowing the Tariff Commission to wield the taxing power the Senator from Mississippi would destroy the flexible provision so that no tariff changes might be made without running the gamut of political debate, amendment, and obstruction in Congress. Instead of allowing the President to carry out the purely administrative function of proclaiming the rates found necessary to equalize productive costs, the Harrison substitute bill would require him to transmit the Tariff Commission's reports to Congress, together with his recom-

This provision would destroy the usefulness of the Tariff Commission and leave the consuming public without any means of emergency relief from possibly excessive duties, on one hand, and the producing public without any remedy against ruinous foreign competition, on the other.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. For 140 years, up to 1922, what other resource did the American people have so far as tariff revision was concerned?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. It is the same as we would have if my substitute should be adopted?

Mr. SMOOT. With the single exception of the amendment offered in the substitute which the Senator has presented, which I do not think limits them at all but perhaps extends them.

Mr. HARRISON. Prior to 1922, before the flexible provision was written into the law, did the Senator ever suggest or have any idea that the Congress ought to be divorced of such power as they had exercised throughout the history of the country, and that it be given over to a tariff commission?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator was a member of the Finance Committee at the time the bill was considered and no doubt the Senator remembers my position in relation to it.

Mr. HARRISON. I know; but before 1922 did the Senator ever suggest or did anybody else ever suggest that we ought to take away from the Congress the power to levy duties and vest it in some commission?

Mr. SMOOT. No. The Senator is correct in that statement. I agree with that absolutely. But conditions arose and it was thought the commission ought to have some such power granted, because Congress is not in session for months at a time. These questions arise particularly after the passage of a tariff bill, and I think perhaps a majority of the people of the United States became convinced that there ought to be some provision to take care of conditions that might arise at such times.

During short-session years Congress is in adjournment for 9 months out of the 12. Even in long-term years Congress is in session only about six or seven months. In other words, the so-called flexible provision, which the Senator from Mississippi has devised, would be wholly inoperative about 60 per cent of the time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator makes that statement in a very broad way. Is it not a fact that it expressly states that when a measure based on the report of the commission comes before the Senate amendments shall not be permitted except they are germane to the particular subject matter upon which the Tariff Commission reports?

Mr. SMOOT. It may be; but there may be 20 cases arise during the recess of the Congress, and they would all be held up.

Mr. HARRISON. But it would not cause a general revision of the tariff act when the Tariff Commission reported upon a particular product. Whatever amendments are offered must be germane to that particular subject matter.

Mr. SMOOT. For instance, if we had before us at this moment a proposition to place a tariff of 4 cents a pound on copper, there is no chance of granting that without giving a compensatory duty upon the articles into the manufacture of which copper enters.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator. Where it is a constituent part of the finished product it would be necessary to consider the other elements; but when the question of a tariff on copper came before the Senate, we could not consider silver and we could not consider a lot of other items that I might enumerate.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that, but everything we consider would involve a rate of duty. I do not think there will be anything upon the free list in that event. Everything on the free list would be brought into discussion, and if the articles on the free list enter into a manufactured product, then perhaps hundreds of articles that are covered in the tariff bill would have to be considered.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Austin in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio? Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I can see additional confusion in the question of germaneness, because that is always to be determined by the Senate under the rule of the Senate. If we were interested in several items, Senators might put their heads together and include all those items, and we would have a regular tariff revision before us.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; we would have the tariff question before the Senate all the time.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator from Ohio is in error. Does not the question of germaneness, when it is submitted to the Senate, pertain only to appropriation bills?

Mr. SMOOT. It need not, so far as that is concerned.
Mr. HARRISON. I think if the Senator will investigate, he will find that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Ordinarily speaking, that would be true. It would have to be germane; but in a tariff bill so many questions of germaneness are involved, so many articles are involved. We could not touch one but what we would affect some other, and perhaps 50 or 60 would be involved in that way.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator must admit that those who drafted this legislation were attempting to restrict the consideration of matters relating to the tariff when we included the question of germaneness.

Mr. SMOOT. The substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi does not do that.

Mr. HARRISON. It says no amendment shall be offered unless it is germane to the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all it does say. It does not and can not go into the question of how far the germaneness may apply or not apply.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator would not have us write into the bill that if the Tariff Commission, for instance, reported a certain difference in cost of a particular article, that would open up the whole tariff question?

Mr. SMOOT. I hope not. I do not know what the House would do.

Mr. HARRISON. We have tried to restrict the matter as far as we could.

Mr. SMOOT. I admitted that, but I do not know what position the House would take, and I do not know what position the Senate would take.

Mr. HARRISON. That same provision is in the House

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, it is, but I am referring to the construction to be put upon it. There may be a wide difference of opinion as to whether it is germane or not.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Mississippi is correct with reference to the rule I mentioned, that the germaneness to be settled by vote of the Senate is in relation to an appropriation bill. But the Senator will admit that if I should offer an amendment and the Chair would sustain a point of order made against it, I could immediately appeal from the decision of the Chair, bring about a vote of the Senate at once, and if we had a sufficient number of votes, we could combine and have a general tariff bill up for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. May I, in that connection, say to the Senator from Ohio that what we are trying to do is to prevent logrolling. That is why we tried to restrict consideration to such amendments as might be germane to the subject matter. If we can go further than that, I would be glad to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi, but I say that if a majority of this body or a majority of the House, no matter whether the amendment was germane or not, should vote one way or the other, it might and probably would open up the entire tariff question. I know what the Senator is trying to do, and I agree with him absolutely in his desire. If we could provide for it in stronger words, I would like to see the words used, but I can not think of any, and I am quite sure the Senator from Mississippi can not, or else he would have included them. His views and mine on that subject are exactly alike.

I am simply calling attention to what may happen and what is very likely to happen; and if it should happen, we would have one continual tariff discussion in nearly every session of Congress. I have only to refer to my files since the last session of Congress to realize the great number of applications and petitions signed by hundreds and hundreds of people which have come in from every section of the country begging for increases in tariff rates under the existing law.

Mr. President, while Congress is in session this arrangement would hold out hope of relief to industries suffering from tariff maladjustments, but without much possibility of obtaining it. Every recommendation of the Tariff Commission would be pitched into the caldron of politics. No bill increasing or lowering the rates prescribed by the commission could be considered without a flood of amendments being unloosed, so as to reopen the whole tariff question. Congress can not deal with isolated items of duty; it never has and, in my opinion, never will. When this body acts it must consider the whole field of duties and balance one against another. When a tariff is levied on hides, for example, the rates on shoes, gloves, hand bags, and a thousand other items demand attention.

This weak point in the bill is recognized by its authors, and a feeble attempt is made to correct it. The measure provides that any bill designed to carry out the recommendations of the Tariff Commission shall not include any item not included in the commission's report, and that no amendments shall be considered unless they are germane to the items in the report. Every Member of this body realizes that one session of Congress can not bind another to honor such a rule in considering tariff bills. It never has and never will.

Furthermore, the Senate might vote at any time to declare an amendment germane to the report, even though it had no direct relation to the commodity investigated. In this way the whole tariff schedules might be opened up every time an important recommendation from the Tariff Commission came under consideration. The tariff controversy would be eternally before Congress.

I wish to point out, Mr. President, two serious results that would inevitably follow from the policy that is here proposed. Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator object to my asking a question, if he is about to take up another matter?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am discussing the same question.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. Mr. SMOOT. In the first place, each report from the Tariff Commission would arouse partisan support and partisan opposition, with the result that relief under the flexible provision would certainly be delayed and probably be denied. Congress has clearly defined its policy with regard to equalizing the costs of production as between domestic articles and similar foreign products on the dutiable list. Why should we engage in a new controversy every time that policy is applied to new conditions of competition? If we should approve this measure, we would place ourselves in the position of inviting citizens to seek relief from obsolescent rates, and then denying them the relief after they had proved their case.

In the second place, we must consider the effects of such a measure upon business. It is not necessary for me to remind the Senate that uncertainty as to tariffs acts as an impediment to business. Industry can not proceed at a normal pace so long as there is danger of the whole tariff question being opened at any time when Congress is in session. The existing machinery for flexible tariff adjustments is encouraging to American industry and commerce because abnormal duties can be ironed out on the cost equalization basis. But the probability of a widespread political revision of duties at any time would constitute a formidable menace

There is not the slightest excuse for changing the present arrangement for adjusting tariff rates that do not stand the test of the cost-equalization formula. The Tariff Commission is functioning with dispatch and efficiency. Since its reorganization about a year ago the commission has handled 138 projects, involving 246 commodities or commodity groups. Think of it, Mr. President! The commission has handled cases involving 246 commodities since the present tariff bill was enacted, whereas during the preceding years. from 1922 up to that time, I think there were fewer than 30. Under the flexible provision the commission completed 39 reports on 72 separate commodities. Twelve rates were increased and 17 were decreased. The commission found, after extensive investigation, that the cost of production for 39 different foreign and domestic commodities was already equalized by the 1930 tariff law. Of course, no action was taken in those cases.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the aggregate value of the imports considered in these reports by the commission to the President last year amounts to about 14 per cent of our total dutiable imports.

That is, of the total dutiable imports for one year, the commission has acted upon items that amount to about 14 per cent of our total dutiable imports. The rates were increased on imports valued at only $17,000,000. Imports on which lower duties were specified were valued at $44,000,000. and the imports that were investigated without alteration of the tariff rates were valued at $137,000,000. That is the result of the operation of the flexible provision of this "horrible" tariff law. These figures not only indicate the dispatch with which the commission is doing its work, but they suggest the vital need for maintenance of a flexibletariff arrangement that will afford relief to American producers and consumers without delay.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator gave figures showing the aggregate imports of the products of particular industries in cases where decreases had been recommended by the Tariff Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; lower duties.

Mr. HARRISON. And he showed the value of imports of products of industries in cases where increases had been made. That is right, I believe?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I stated that rates were increased on imports valued at nearly $17,000,000, and lower duties had been specified on imports valued at $44,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. There was a decrease recommended by the Tariff Commission on some high-priced shoes and an increased tariff rate on some low-priced shoes. It was a kind of combination rate. Did the Senator in arriving at his figures take into consideration the whole boot and shoe industry?

Mr. SMOOT. I took into consideration the whole industry covered by the tariff act.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, because on one character of shoe manufactured in Massachusetts the Tariff Commission recommended a slight reduction, the Senator takes the whole boot and shoe industry, whose products in the United States are valued at so much, and says that that industry was affected by virtue of that decrease?

Mr. SMOOT. No; this is what the Senator from Utah said: That the rates were increased on imports valued at nearly $17,000,000, and imports on which lower duties were specified were valued at $44,000,000. There may be an increase in one and a decrease in the other, but I compute the entire decrease and the entire increase as a whole, without going into specifications.

Mr. HARRISON. The figures are so startling to me that I wanted to get an analysis of them.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the way the figures have been prepared.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I understand that, in the case of the boot and shoe industry, the Senator has made the computation on both sides?

Mr. SMOOT. If there was an increase, I put it as an increase; and if there was a decrease, I put it as a decrease.

Mr. HARRISON. On boots and shoes?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the way it was done. In the boot and shoe industry on certain ladies' shoes coming from Czechoslovakia there was an increase.

Mr. HARRISON. That is a small industry.

ures. I have taken all the industries covered by the items, and where there was a decrease I have included the amount specified as a decrease.

Mr. HARRISON. Were those figures furnished the Senator by the Tariff Commission?

Mr. SMOOT. They were furnished me by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. President, it is remarkable that out of 165 reports from this bipartisan commission 147 have been unanimous. That record speaks well for the commission and for the law under which it operates. The flexible provision is operating better than it has ever done before. The people have confidence in the present method of adjusting rates, and they have learned to make use of the present machinery. Congress ought not to destroy this formula for adjusting customs duties at a time when it has reached its maximum of efficiency. Conditions throughout the world are changing every day. Unstable currencies and abnormal competition because of world-wide overproduction render imperative the maintenance of a workable and efficient flexible tariff provision.

I wish now to invite the attention of the Senate to paragraph C of section 1 in the Harrison substitute bill. In that paragraph will be found set forth in meticulous detail a formula by which the Tariff Commission would be asked to ascertain the difference in the cost of production of American and similar foreign articles. I do not intend to discuss this provision in detail. It is sufficient to say that its purpose is to restrict the latitude of the commission and to augment the red tape involved in finding production costs.

No narrow formula can be laid down by which the commission may find the cost of production of 25,000 different articles in many different countries. The present law instructs the commission to consider costs of production, supplemented, if necessary, by invoice or wholesale selling prices for a representative period, as well as transportation costs and "other relevant factors that constitute an advantage or disadvantage in competition."

Congress has tried particularly to make certain that instructions to the Tariff Commission were given in words that could not be misunderstood. I think, Mr. President, that is one of the reasons why the Tariff Commission has made such strides since the last tariff act became a law.

The commission is given a relatively wide range of alternatives so that its investigation may not be frustrated by lack of definite information from any one source. It may take cognizance of all the evidence, weigh it according to its merit, and formulate its decision accordingly.

This formula has proved to be practicable and fair to all parties concerned. Congress could have no purpose in destroying it to substitute a new and untried set of instructions which seek to restrict the commission in its work. If the flexible provision is to remain a useful instrument for adjustment of any of thousands of items that are contained in the tariff act, it must allow the commission to use accurate and pertinent data from all available sources.

Section 3 of the substitute measure, proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, is one of the most novel morsels of legislation that have ever come before this body for consideration. It provides that there shall be "an office in the legislative branch of the Government to be known as the office of the consumers' counsel of the United States Tariff Commission. No person would be eligible for this strange position if at any time he has ever acted in tariff matters before Congress or the Tariff Commission, either in his own behalf, as an attorney or a legislative agent. In short, the consumers' counsel would have to be some one who knows nothing about the tariff, for which accomplishment he would be allowed a salary of $10,000 per year.

Now, what would be the duties of this anomalous counsel? He would be instructed "to appear in the interest of and represent the consuming public in any proceeding before the commission." He would have power to crossexamine witnesses, to order investigations by the commission and to obtain information relative to any tariff matters.

Mr. SMOOT. And that increase is computed in these fig- | For that purpose he would be allowed a staff of assistants and clerks, so that in due time another costly bureau would be set up for the edification of taxpayers.

> Creation of a consumers' counsel, under the terms of this bill, would bring the red tape in adjustment of tariff rates to the nth degree of absurdity. The counsel, who must be a greenhorn in tariff matters, would advise and direct the Tariff Commission in the name of an unknown body of Americans theoretically known as consumers. The commission would make its investigations and submit reports to Congress and the President. The President would submit his recommendations to Congress. Each House of Congress would submit the matter to its respective committees for further investigation and advice; and when the matter returned for action, it would probably be defeated by the demands of a few dozen Members of Congress seeking higher duties for products of their home States. Such would be the crowning achievements of the measure we have before us. The consumers' counsel is but another link in the chain of red tape that is designed to destroy the flexible provision.

> The Finance Committee tried in vain, Mr. President, to discover whom the consumers' counsel is intended to represent. Every man, woman, and child in the whole country is a consumer. Our greatest consumers are our greatest industries, which spend billions of dollars for raw products. The farmer is a consumer of machinery, automobiles, building material, and what not. Yet the farmer is entitled to protection on his produce. Our laboring men are a great body of consumers; yet they are wholly dependent upon the prosperity of American industry for their livelihood. Presumably this counsel would be called upon to represent a class that does not exist, unless it might be the idle rich.

> Let us not deceive ourselves. The only purpose such an official could serve would be to fight eternally against the protective system. In reality, this proposed officer should be named the importers' counsel. Invariably he would be found fighting the battle of importers against American producers, on the theory that there is within the United States a body of consumers whose interests are detached from the prosperity of American industry, agriculture, and labor. But there is no such body. America's producers and America's consumers are the same identical group. Only the importers who wish to encroach upon our domestic industries would reap any benefit from this new bureau that the American taxpayers are asked to > Congress has laid down a formula upon which investigations shall be made, facts ascertained, and rates changed, if necessary to equalize the cost of production. Now it is proposed to hire a counsel to divert the commission from that factual basis of inquiry by the interjection of views attributed to that unknown body referred to as consumers. This counsel would be nothing more than a leech upon the commission. How could we ask the people to support with their taxes an officer whose sole purpose would be to work against the welfare of labor, agriculture, and industry, by which our economic system is sustained?

> Apparently, the author of this measure is not willing to trust the Tariff Commission and the President of the United States to make simple administrative adjustments in the duty schedules. But is he also unwilling to trust the welfare of the mythical consuming public to Congress? Inasmuch as he would have all reports come to Congress for final action, does he contend that it is necessary to set up a subsidized propagandist to tell Congress what its duty is to the consuming public?

> This is no time to set up useless appendages to any department of the Government. It is not necessary to urge upon the Senate the need for economy when our national debt is increasing at the rate of $2,000,000,000 per year. Instead of encumbering the Government with another functionless and obstructive body, we ought to trim away the dead timber that already hinders efficient service in many of the departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that the Senator's main objection to the consumers' counsel is that he would be eternally fighting against the protective system. Did I misunderstand him?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that would be the case.

Mr. GEORGE. He would be a trouble maker down in the Tariff Commission, according to the Senator's view of the matter?

Mr. SMOOT. I think he would.

Mr. GEORGE. That is, from the standpoint of the extreme high protectionist, he would be constantly giving

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all; in connection with any rate that may be in the law.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to see if I understand the Senator. His main objection is that the consumers' counsel might controvert some of the arguments that were advanced in behalf of higher duties?

Mr. SMOOT. Not in relation to higher duties; in relation to any duty in the law, or any duty that came before the commission, whether it was low or whether it was high.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator contemplate that the consumers' counsel probably would object to a lower duty?

Mr. SMOOT. He might want the lowest duties made still lower. He is there to represent the consumer.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. And if the Senator's theory of a tariff is correct, the consumer has to pay it; and therefore the consumers' representative would take it all off, if possible.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to get the Senator's position, because I do not want to misquote him. If I understand him, the Senator does not anticipate and does not fear that the consumers' counsel would be objecting to any lowering of duties, does he? His only apprehension is that the consumers' counsel might object to some increased duty?

Mr. SMOOT. No; he might object to increases, but I think the whole policy of a consumers' counsel would be that if there was an objection, it would be an objection because of the fact that he desired a lower rate. In fact the Senator knows that.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Utah thinks he would take the side of the lower rate?

Mr. SMOOT. I think so; and I think he would also take the side against any additional rate.

Mr. GEORGE. And therefore-because he is the object of the Senator's special animadversions—the consumers' counsel is the particular object of the Senator's wrath because he would universally take the side of the lower rate? I want to understand the Senator's position.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no wrath whatever. I am telling the Senate just exactly what will happen. There is not any doubt about it. The consumers' counsel is put in this bill for the very purpose I have stated. There is not any question about it; and the Senator from Georgia will not

Mr. GEORGE. O Mr. President, I would deny it, but the mere denial or affirmation would not get us very far. Mr. SMOOT. What was in the Senator's mind when he suggested a consumers' representative?

Mr. GEORGE. To attain a fair degree of fairness and justice to the body of American citizens who are not directly interested in a particular tariff controversy. Of course, they are all interested in a sense.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the commission there for? That is exactly what the members of the commission are there for—to find the facts and then put the facts into law.

Mr. GEORGE. Why does the Senator anticipate that the consumers' counsel would be so embarrassing to the commission if that is why the commission is there, when, if the commission is endeavoring to do its clear and manifest duty, the consumers' counsel could not harm it? The Sen-

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a | ator does not fear that the consumers' counsel would convince the commission of the truth, and certainly not that he could convince the commission of a lie?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not said that he would or would

Mr. GEORGE. Why be so apprehensive, then? If the consumers' counsel is to perform the same general function that the commission is to perform, why the degree of apprehension that he will throw so many monkey wrenches into the machine, or put so many flies in the ointment? Why not assume and presume that he will help the commission?

I just wanted to find out why the consumers' counsel was such a thoroughly discredited individual in the opinion of the Senator from Utah; and I discover the reason when the Senator says that the consumers' counsel generally would be in favor of the lower duty and against the higher duty, and always, or at least generally, he would be against any increase in the duty.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that, Mr. President, What is the very name "consumers' counsel" put there for? To get just as low rates as he can possibly get.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, not necessarily.

Mr. SMOOT. Why did the Senator name him "consumers' counsel" then?

Mr. GEORGE. He had to be named something. I shall be perfectly willing to change the designation to "people's counsel" or "special counsel." I have no particular con-cern with what he is called. It is not a question of the name. If the Senator is so fastidious as to be objecting to this individual who is the subject of his especial wrath merely on account of his name, we will end the controversy now and name him anything else.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I would not rob the Senator from Georgia of the glory he is getting over the country as a result of calling this man the consumers' counsel.

Mr. GEORGE. We will not quarrel about the name of the counsel. I apprehend the Senator is quarreling about something much more substantial than the mere name.

Mr. SMOOT. Why did not the Senator ask, then, that there be another member of the commission?

Mr. GEORGE. I wanted some man who stood apart from the commission, so far as his services were concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly it.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; that is exactly it; and I do not see why the Senator is so apprehensive that the consumers' counsel would present to the American people facts that would be so disconcerting to the extreme protectionist element in the country unless there is some ground for Surely we can depend on the American people to distinguish between false propaganda coming out of the Tariff Commission, or anyone connected with the commission, and a true statement of facts.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the consumers' counsel will have a vote upon every item that comes to the commission. Mr. GEORGE. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The consumers' counsel will have a vote, just the same as anyone else.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; he would not have any vote.

Mr. SMOOT. What I mean to say is this: I will not say he will have a vote on the final rate, but taking what any people ask, he would have his vote.

Mr. GEORGE. He would not have any vote.

Mr. SMOOT. I think he would have a vote in that case. Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is wrong about that. That is a mere matter of construction. He would not have

Mr. SMOOT. I will not say he would have a vote when the final vote is taken on a rate, whether it be an increase or a decrease, but I have no doubt that the Senator had in mind when he first suggested that provision that the counsel would be there to see that high rates were not imposed and that the commission would not give a higher rate or would keep the rate just as low as possible.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is entirely wrong about that. I But, as I said before, we can not make any progress here by merely making assertions. That was not the purpose at all. Candidly, I do not mind stating to the Senator the purpose, because in his entire discussion he has not said one word about it.

The real purpose was this, and is this: That we deem it desirable to convert the Tariff Commission, just as far as possible, into a judicial body, into a nonpartisan fact-finding body. That being the purpose, it seemed logical that there should be some one attached to the commission whose duty it would be to ascertain the facts, to gather all the information that had a pertinent and relevant connection with the case, so that the commission itself could always occupy, just as far as it is humanly possible for such a body to occupy, such a position; a position of disinterestedness; a position occupied by our courts, or any fact-finding commission.

Candidly I never had the idea that the consumers' counsel would always contend for lower rates, or that he would always oppose higher rates. I had the hope that he would assist the commission to do its work in such an impartial way as to commend the commission to the respect of the American people. I assert now that if the commission ever attains the status where it has the confidence of the people as the Interstate Commerce Commission, or any fact-finding body that is supposed to stand impartially between the direct litigants in any cause of controversy, it must be aided and assisted by some one whose duty it is to present facts to it. and whose duty it is to advise it, and who does not stand in the shoes either of the importer, who wants the lowest or no duty, according to the view of the Senator, or of the manufacturer, who seeks the highest duty, assuming that the manufacturer was contending for such duty. That is the reason why I offered the amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator agree that the correct basis of levying rates is to measure the difference between the costs of production at home and abroad?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not. I concede that that is an element in the equation when once it is decided that a rate should be imposed upon an article, but I do not concede that it is the correct or that it is the exclusive or that it is even a wholly satisfactory method.

Mr. WATSON. What is the Senator's basis for rate

Mr. GEORGE. I have not offered any basis, except in the discretion of the legislative body. If I had the power to write the law, I would like to see the commission a disinterested, fact-finding body, to find the facts with reference to any import, or with reference to any commodity that is manufactured or produced in the United States.

Mr. WATSON. To find what facts?
Mr. GEORGE. All the facts pertinent to the costs, and any other pertinent facts, and to report those facts to the

Mr. SMOOT. That is just exactly what they do now.

Mr. GEORGE. I am perfectly willing to concede that if the Congress is to have the final power, as I think it should, either to impose a rate, decrease a rate, or increase a rate, or to take it off entirely in a case where the rate is already imposed, there is not the same necessity for the consumers' counsel as there is under the present system.

Mr. WATSON. Let me ask the Senator this question: Has it not come to be the Democratic basis of rate making that rates shall be levied to equal, as nearly as possible, the difference between the costs of production at home and

Mr. GEORGE. That is an element; but the Democratic position is that facts with reference to that question should be found by the commission and the commission should then make its report back to the Congress, and, finally, the question of the rate-whether it should be imposed or the height of the rate, if imposed-should rest in the discretion of the Congress.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator says, I think very justly, that what he wants the commission to do is to find the facts. That must, of necessity, mean the facts of conversion costs in this country and conversion costs to manufacture the same article in competing countries. What other facts are there for the Tariff Commission to find on which to base protective tariff or revenue tariff rates?

Mr. GEORGE. There are many other facts the Tariff Commission might find, as far as that is concerned. It could find, of course, all the facts with reference to production and manufacture of any particular article. It might find, also, facts concerning the efficiency of methods of production in various countries. It might find, also, facts with reference to the location of industries and matters of that kind.

After all, the position which I believe to be the sound position—and it is the position which is taken in this proposal-is that whatever facts it finds shall be reported to the Congress, and the Congress itself in the exercise of its legislative powers, enlightened by those facts, should impose the rate or should deny the rate.

Mr. WATSON. I understand the Senator's position thoroughly, but I could not understand why, and I can not yet understand, if it be the conception of the very formation and operation of the Tariff Commission to levy rates which measure the difference in the costs of production at home and abroad, together with transportation costs, and efficiency, and so forth, why it is necessary to have an adjunct to the court to ascertain those facts. The Senator sat on the bench for many years.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.
Mr. WATSON. And he was a very able judge, as we all

Mr. GEORGE. I disclaim the compliment the Senator desires to pay me, but I am glad the Senator mentioned the matter of the court. Let me call the Senator's attention to this fact: If the courts, sitting to do justice between litigants, had constantly to interfere with the one side or the other, exposing themselves to the criticism of partiality in behalf of this side or the other side of litigation, the courts would lose the confidence of the American people, and it is precisely that thought I had in mind. Whatever the Senator from Utah may now ascribe to me, it was precisely that thought I had in mind when I proposed the consumers' counsel, or the counsel to the commission, because I wanted the commission, in its effort to find the facts, to be placed in a position where it could invite the full confidence of the public in its final conclusions upon the facts. so that it would not be compelled to take sides against an importer who was a litigant or a supplicant at the bar of the commission or to take sides against or for an American producer or manufacturer.

Mr. WATSON. Where there is a commission with three Republicans and three Democrats-and that is the kind of a commission we are supposed to have-

Mr. GEORGE. I do not understand that that is the kind of a commission we do have.

Mr. WATSON. That is the kind of a commission we are supposed to have. I am not going to argue the individual views of different commissioners, because I do not know what they are. I can not understand why it is necessary to appoint another person, who would be at least equally prejudiced with any man sitting on the Tariff Commission.

Mr. GEORGE. Equally prejudiced?
Mr. WATSON. If he were prejudiced at all, he would be equally prejudiced. He would have tariff views. The Senator would not have appointed as consumers' counsel one devoid of all opinion, divested of all ideas about the tariff. He would be there to represent somebody for a given

Mr. GEORGE. No; we perhaps have some commissioners who are devoid of all ideas. They are divested of all real opinions of their own about tariff matters.

Mr. WATSON. Is not that the very attitude for a commissioner to be in?

Mr. GEORGE. He should be an impartial commissioner.

Mr. WATSON. Yes. Mr. GEORGE. Waiving all that, and assuming it is desirable that the American people believe that the Tariff Commission is impartial, that it makes an honest effort to ascertain the pertinent facts in every case, the way to maintain the reputation of the commission in the opinion of the American people, the way to sustain confidence in the commission is to place the commission in a position where it does not have to become apparently partisan for the manufacturer or against the manufacturer, or the producer, if the Senator wishes to use a more inclusive term. The counsel may aid the commission, he may perform the same function for the commission that the counsel to any other fact-finding body, or to any judicial body performs. I dare say there is no tribunal in our system, from the highest to the lowest of our tribunals, which could retain the confidence of the American people if that body itself were called upon to be constantly taking the side or apparently taking the side of one litigant or the other litigant to the particular controversy before it.

It was precisely for that reason that I desired to see a consumers' counsel or commission counsel appointed, because I had hoped that the Tariff Commission might develop into a great fact-finding body, fortified by the confidence of the American people, very much as is the case today with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I had hoped, of course, that it would be considered as a nonpartisan commission, as nearly as that consummation can possibly be reached.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me to ask a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah vield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. In answer to the question of the Senator from Indiana, may I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the case of Fourdrinier wire, where the importers and producers got together and raised the price to the American consumer, would be a very nice illustration of where the consumers' counsel could play some part if the matter went before the Tariff Commission.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. HARRISON. To cite another case, the importers of high-priced watches into the United States, as the Senator will remember, and the producers of such watches in the United States got together and agreed on a certain rate. If they wanted to reduce that rate they might come before the Tariff Commission, and the consumers' counsel in that case might play a very desirable part.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the first time I have heard of the watch importers and the American manufacturers getting together

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, the Senator recalls that in the Committee on Finance we worked on that proposition ever so long and finally they brought in a proposal that was in absolute agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is mistaken. I remember that I received from importers some of the bitterest letters I ever received in my life, relating to that compromise rate.

Mr. HARRISON. That may have had to do with the cheaper watches, but the high-priced manufacturers and importers got together.

Mr. SMOOT. No; they did not get together. Who is the consumer? The idle rich, the importer, and everybody else comprise the consumer class, and the consumers' counsel would not be there unless it was for the purpose of looking after the consumers' interests.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I hope the chairman of the Finance Committee will pardon me again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I invite him to-night to think of some better name for the counsel of the commission. If the word "consumers'" is so offensive to him, I invite the Senator to suggest a better name. We want the function and not the mere name.

Mr. SMOOT. I know what "consumer" means, and I think I know the object of the amendment. Everybody is a consumer, and they all want lower rates. We might as well have a "labor counsel" and a "manufacturers' counsel" and a "producers' counsel."

Mr. President-

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further before he proceeds?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I am always glad to yield to the Senator. Mr. HARRISON. The Senator suggested that we ought to have a manufacturers' counsel and a labor counsel. The Senator will recall that during the consideration of the Fordney bill it was suggested that labor and the manufacturers might be represented, but we voted to strike them out. That was before the Grundy machine got to working so smoothly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows I was not in favor of it and the Senator knows the Finance Committee was not in favor of it.

Mr. HARRISON. We took it out, did we not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and we should have taken it out of this provision.

Mr. HARRISON. That is one time the Senator was against Mr. Grundy. The Senator was in good form that time.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no flings to make at Mr. Grundy or anyone else. If Mr. Grundy is right I am with him, and if he is wrong I am against him.

Mr. President, section 4 of this bill launches into quite a different field. It "respectfully requests" the President "to initiate a movement for an international economic conference with a view to (a) lowering excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair trade practices and other economic barriers affecting international trade, (b) preventing retaliatory tariff measures and economic wars. and (c) promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations." The President would be asked to invite other nations to sit in a council for the scaling down of American tariff schedules. But such a conference would have no authority whatever actually to change the American tariff law. This bill itself specifically provides that any treaty or arrangement changing tariff duties or in any way affecting the revenue of the United States must first be approved by Congress.

There is no reason to anticipate that Congress would lower the American tariff under the influence of an international conference. The sponsors of this bill profess to believe that our present tariff rates are too high and that America led all other nations throughout the world to increase their duties. Then why do they not initiate legislation to reduce the tariff? It is evident that they do not wish to take the responsibility of denying protection to any industry that is struggling against foreign competition in these critical times. In this bill they seek to shunt that responsibility upon the President without trying to indicate in any way what the policy of Congress might be when the proposed conference had been concluded and its work would come before this body for ratification.

In view of the fact that the sponsors of this measure have vigorously denounced the existing tariff rates as detrimental to the welfare of the United States and that they now make no move to change any rate in the 1930 law, this proposal of an international conference on tariffs takes on the nature of a face-saving gesture. They wish to blame the President for their own failure to adjust rates that they have condemned as a whole but dare not change as to specific items.

I do not blame the Democratic leaders for their refusal to consider the reduction of tariff rates. They are doubtless aware of the fact that any weakening of the protective system would expose our producers to unprecedented foreign competition at a time when they are least able to cope with it. Any measure proposing specific reductions of duty would arouse widespread resentment from all citizens who depend upon tariff protection for their livelihood. I sympathize with the Senator from Mississippi in the impracticability of translating his avowed principles on the tariff into specific rates of duty. But why should the Democratic leaders of this body seek to impose upon the Chief Executive and foreign governments a responsibility which primarily belongs to themselves?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the Senator fussing because we did not bring in a specific proposal reducing the present rates?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not fussing. I am just calling attention to the attitude of the Democratic Party to-day just before the election.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator give me his opinion as to whether he thinks the President would sign a bill that would provide for a reduction in rates?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any right to speak for the President in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. HARRISON. If the President would consult the Senator, would he tell him not to sign such a bill?

Mr. SMOOT. The President would not consult me.

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose he would not if he follows his usual practice.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question? Will the Senator join with me in endeavoring to put through an amendment to this bill reducing the duty on long-staple cotton, and see what the President would do with it?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Tariff Commission should find there is no difference in the cost of production in this country and abroad and recommend it, I would stand right by their finding. I would do differently in that respect than the Senator from New Hampshire would with reference to a lot of products of his State.

Mr. MOSES. Let us take a short cut at it. I invite the Senator to join with me in that move.

Mr. HARRISON. That would be a wonderfully fine argument, but if the Senator had been here this morning and heard what I said about him-

Mr. MOSES. I heard it.

Mr. HARRISON. What was it I said?

Mr. MOSES. Oh, something about my voting to limit the time during which he-

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose the Senator has changed his view on that?

Mr. MOSES. I have not looked up my record to see. The Senator knows about it so much better than I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that if a 7-cent duty is necessary for long-staple cotton, I will vote for it at any time.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the trouble with our friends over on the other side of the Chamber. Whenever a Senator shows that he is not in every instance for free trade, but for a tariff, whether it is a competitive tariff or tariff for revenue or what not, they try to throw upon him the burden of their whole nefarious course. So far as I am concerned, if the Tariff Commission should ascertain a certain state of facts, I would be willing to follow them providing there is real competition in the product. In that particular instance, as the Senator knows, there was quite a large competition of 400,000 bales coming in with only 700,000 bales produced in the United States, a situation where there is real competition.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not long-staple cotton enough produced in the United States to fill the demand. The Senator knows that and stated so very frankly.

Mr. HARRISON. There are 400,000 bales imported and 700,000 bales produced, and we exported a little, but not

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.
Mr. MOSES. I have just consulted with a much more powerful Member of the Senate than I, and one also a member of the Committee on Finance along with the Senator from Mississippi. I will now ask the Senator from Mississippi if he will join with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Warson] and with me in reducing the duty on long-staple

Mr. HARRISON. I would be perfectly willing to have the Congress vote to take all the tariff off of it if we could take off a lot of the exorbitant rates contained in the law. I have no interest in that particular item. In other words, I am one of those who can not be bribed by saying that if I will vote for a certain item, other Senators will vote for my item. I do not work that way. Logrolling is one of the factors that has made tariff construction nauseating.

Mr. MOSES. I would like to have a bill of particulars from the Senator. To what exorbitant rate does he refer? Possibly he and the Senator from Indiana and I can come to an agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Utah give me the time to go over all the exorbitant rates figuring in the law?

Mr. MOSES. I think the Senator from Utah, with his usual good nature, is entirely willing to have the Senator from Mississippi display his entire ignorance of tariff matters.

Mr. HARRISON. I will tell the Senator one that the Senator was very much opposed to, where an effort was made to vote a rate of 51/2 cents a pound on maple sirup, for instance, and an 8-cent duty on maple sugar. That was done over our protest, but the Senator from New Hampshire voted for it because his people were interested in those products. The Tariff Commission reduced those rates down to 5½ cents and 4 cents. I can give the Senator many other instances.

Mr. MOSES. And I am still protesting against it along with the Senators from Louisiana.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senators from Louisiana are not interested in maple sirup or maple sugar.

Mr. MOSES. They are interested in the sugar schedule. May I say, while the Senator from Mississippi is distributing saccharinity all over the Chamber, that he can not possibly deceive us as to his attitude?

Mr. HARRISON. Did I state the facts correctly about maple sugar and maple sirup?

Mr. SMOOT. I want also to say to the Senator from Mississippi that he ought to be happy because Cuban raw sugar is now selling for 73 cents a hundred.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not talking about Utah sugar. I was talking about maple sugar. The Senator does not know the difference between Utah sugar and maple sugar, but as soon as any kind of sugar is mentioned the Senator from Utah goes into spasms.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that we would never get him to vote for any tariff on sugar.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator put a question to me.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator to say he agreed with me as to what I said about maple sugar and maple sirup. I have not mentioned any other kind of sugar.

Mr. MOSES. But we are.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must announce that if interruptions are not made in accordance with the rule, he will insist that the Senator having the floor shall only yield for a question. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the ruling of the Chair, I will ask the Senator from Indiana if it is for a question that he desires me to yield?

Mr. WATSON. No; I want to make a statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I must decline to yield.

Mr. WATSON. I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question

Mr. HARRISON. I should be glad to answer it if I can. Mr. WATSON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT (rapping for order). Let the Senate be in order.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has stated that he is going to enforce the rule. Four or five Senators are trying to talk at the same time.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Chair a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT (rapping for order). Let the Chair make a statement. Unless Senators desiring to interrupt address the Chair and ask permission to interrupt the Senator having the floor to ask him a question, the Chair will insist that the rule be strictly enforced and that the Senator having the floor shall yield only for a question.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question in the time of the Senator from Utah?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield for that purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. And now I yield, too! [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question. On long-staple cotton, known in the trade as sakellaridis, in July, 1930, the landed cost prior to the payment of 7 cents per pound specific duty, was 22.02 cents per pound, being equal to an ad valorem duty of 32 per cent. England has gone off the gold standard, and on the 31st of December, 1931, the landed cost, prior to the payment of 7 cents a pound specific duty, was 10.82 cents per pound, equal to an ad valorem duty of 65 per cent. In other words, there was an increase from 32 per cent to 65 per cent. Is that one of the "outrageous" rates the Senator from Mississippi referred to in his speech; and is that one of the rates he is willing to reduce?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator if he was on the subcommittee which considered the agricultural schedule of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act-and I think he served on that subcommittee-he will recall that certain gentlemen there were appealing for a duty of 22 cents a pound on long-staple cotton, and I think an amendment was offered to that effect by one of the Senators from the Far West. I would not stand for such a proposal. I went as far as 7 cents a pound, because it was shown that that was about the difference in the cost of production. I am perfectly willing to reduce the rate, and I just stated to the Senator that I would be perfectly willing even to vote long-staple cotton on the free list if we could get the tariff law upon a fair basis where it would not cost the American people the billions of dollars it is now costing because of its excessive rates. Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. WATSON. No, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. What does the Senator want me to say-to answer the other way?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield further?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield for a question, and then I desire

Mr. WATSON. I will refer to the matter further in my own time.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, an international conference on tariffs could accomplish nothing under these circumstances. On the other hand, it would probably lead to a strengthening of tariff barriers against American exports. Three years ago a tariff conference was held at Geneva, attended by some of the ablest men of the great commercial powers. Before sending delegates to this gathering about two-thirds of the participating governments raised their duties, so as to put their delegates in a better trading position. But the conference could not even agree to leave tariff barriers where they were at that time. The net result was a substantial increase in duties for most of the participating governments. And since that time European countries have indulged in the greatest tariff-raising orgies that the world has ever seen. Even Great Britain has been forced to raise a protective wall around herself to halt the dumping of surplus commodities resulting from world-wide overproduction.

No nation is willing to sacrifice its domestic market to foreigners in times like the present, least of all the United States. Production costs and living standards in the United States are far above those of competing nations: therefore, this country would suffer most from a razing of tariff barriers.

Mr. President, during the consideration of the bill of 1930 I had in the Finance Committee room a map of the world showing the tariff walls of all the countries of the world. That map demonstrated the fact that the tariff rates established by the United States are not the highest by any manner of means. More than half of the countries of the world had higher tariff walls, so called, then we had.

During this period of abnormal competition and worldwide overproduction we can not afford to allow foreign producers greater privileges in the American market, regardless of what concessions they might be willing to make

Since Congress is not prepared, and likely will not be prepared, to add to the distress of any domestic industry, it would be absurd to call an international conference. Nations would send representatives to the gathering, with the expectation that the United States would lead the way in making tariff concessions. If the delegates refused to do so or if they did so and Congress refused to ratify their agreement, the resentment of the whole world would be turned against the United States. Congress would be accused of duplicity. America would be charged with prolonging the depression. Do the authors of this measure suppose that they could promote American export trade or ameliorate the domestic situation by such a performance?

It should be noted also, Mr. President, that this bill would not restrict such a conference to tariff matters. It proposes an "international economic conference," one purpose of which would be the elimination of "other economic barriers affecting international trade." This might be construed as a direct reference to the so-called war debts which the Governments of Europe owe to the United States. Certainly the debtor nations would so interpret it. The American delegates would be asked, in all probability, to agree to a modification of the debt-funding arrangements in the interest of promoting international trade. As it stands, this bill would give them authority to launch upon such a discussion and the whole question of intergovernmental debts would be opened. Having called the conference, the United States would be in a most embarrassing situation. Serious international complications and increased resentment against the American people would be the inevitable result. It must be apparent to every member of the Senate that the only purpose which this proposed economic conference might serve would be to complicate our international relations and strain our friendship with other governments.

By the final paragraph of this bill Congress would be "authorized and requested" to "negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual tariff concessions." At present our tariffs are levied against all nations, and no foreign country is favored against another. That is one reason why the United States is on friendly commercial relations with the whole world. But this bill would abolish the traditional attitude of the into our international relations.

The effect of such a measure upon domestic enterprises would be even more serious. In adopting this policy Congress would say, in effect: "We do not need some of our industries that are now protected by customs duties. Therefore let us scrap them and allow foreign nation A to supply us the commodities those industries now produce, so that we may in turn sell to A a larger quantity of some other American product." Tariff concessions can not be established without sacrificing some industry now operating under the protective system. Obviously we can not bargain with other countries, using commodities that are already on the free list. What industries shall we discriminate against? Would the Senator from Mississippi be willing to take away the duty on long-staple cotton so that radio manufacturers might sell more of their products abroad? give up the duty on olive oil, for example, so that Michigan could sell more automobiles to Italy?

Reciprocal trade agreements might work well in Great Britain, where large quantities of foodstuffs and raw materials must be imported and a foreign market must be found for finished manufactures. But in the United States our problem is quite different. With the exception of a few necessities, such as rubber, tea, and silk, the United States is virtually self-contained. Nearly all of our wants can be supplied from our own varied resources. How can we expect our people to allow part of those resources to lie dormant to give other favored industries a better chance to exploit foreign markets? The central thought behind this provision for "mutual tariff concessions" is repugnant to the political theory of equality on which our Government is based.

It is of practical interest to ask what concessions are foreigners seeking in the American market. Most of the protests that have been registered against the Smoot-Hawley Act come from the importers of farm products. Most of the protests have been against farm products, and, Mr. President, most of the increases in rates in that very tariff bill were on farm products. I was in favor of them, and I do not believe this Congress is going to change them, or would do so if it had a chance.

Industry in the United States has been protected for so long that foreigners have little hope of effectively competing in that field. But agriculture was brought definitely within the bounds of protection only in the 1930 act. The most vociferous demand of our commercial neighbors is for the revival of lower rates on agricultural imports. Is the purpose of this bill to withdraw protection from the farmer so that industrial sales abroad may flourish?

As the tariff now stands, it is calculated to equalize the costs of production in the United States and foreign countries. It does not tolerate special bonuses to some domestic industries while foreign competition is invited against others. If Congress should adopt a policy of discriminatory tariffs, the whole protective system would be jeopardized. In a nation of such varied interests as ours, concessions to any foreign producers would be repugnant to the common welfare.

In conclusion, Mr. President, the arguments against this bill are clear and unmistakable. It would vitiate the flexible provision at a time when emergency changes in the tariff are more vital to industry, labor, and agriculture than ever before in our history. It would clog the wheels of legisla-tion and encourage filibustering, because it would keep the tariff issue perpetually before Congress. For the same reason it would promote uncertainty in the business world. It would narrow the latitude of the Tariff Commission in its investigations and thus delay, if not frustrate, flexible tariff relief. It would create an expensive and worse than futile agency, known as the consumers' counsel, to harass the commission and confute the fact-finding process. It would entangle the United States in a useless international imbroglio from which only antagonism and resentment could arise. Finally, it would eviscerate the American doctrine of protection on a cost-equalizing basis, and substitute therefor a Government and institute tariff bickering and favoritism | vicious system of concessions for foreigners and bonuses for a few favored industries.

I submit, Mr. President, that not one paragraph of this bill could be written into law without mutilating our traditional policy of tariff protection and compromising the welfare of the American people.

Mr. President, I had some other remarks to make upon this question, but I think this is ample for the day, and I yield the floor now.

PRODUCTION AND TRANSPORTATION COSTS OF CERTAIN OILS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 323 of the Seventy-first Congress (submitted by Mr. Sheppard), a report of the costs of production and of transportation to the principal consuming markets of the United States of coconut oil and copra from the Philippine Islands and other principal producing regions, palm oil, palm-kernel oil, whale oil, rapeseed oil, perilla oil, and sesame oil, etc., which, with the accompanying document, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. BLAINE presented resolutions adopted by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Oconto Falls, Wis., protesting against the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to the States, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD presented a petition of sundry citizens of McIntosh, Minn., praying for the passage of legislation known as the Frazier bill, being Senate bill 1197, to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness, and to encourage and promote agriculture, commerce, and industry, by establishing an efficient credit system, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KING presented a paper in the nature of a petition signed by Hon. George H. Dern, Governor of the State of Utah; Maggie S. Francis, Lucy R. Turner, and Eliza Rich, president and first and second vice presidents, respectively, of Morgan County Camp, Daughters of Utah Pioneers, praying for the passage of legislation granting pensions to such veterans of the Black Hawk Indian War as can prove service and have not heretofore received pensions, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Salt Lake City. Utah, remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia or other restrictive religious measures, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a resolution adopted by Lawrenceville (N. J.) Grange, No. 170, Patrons of Husbandry, favoring reduction in governmental expenditures and taxes, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Taxpayers' League of Passaic County (N. J.) (Inc.), favoring retrenchment in governmental expenditures, and opposing bond issues for proposed new projects, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented the petition of Manasquan Brielle Auxiliary to the Veterans of Foreign Wars Post, No. 1838, of Point Pleasant, N. J., praying for the immediate payment in cash of adjusted-service compensation certificates (bonus), which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Camden and vicinity, in the State of New Jersey, praying for the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Association of Chosen Freeholders of New Jersey, at Jersey City, N. J., praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 9642) to authorize supplemental appropriations for emergency highway construction with a view to increasing employment, which was ordered to lie on the table.

THE PROHIBITION QUESTION

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a petition sent to Hon. W. B. OLIVER, Member of Congress from the sixth Alabama district, from 126 members of the Calvary Baptist Church of Tuscaloosa, Ala., with reference to the prohibition law. ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To W. B. OLIVER,

To W. B. OLIVER,

United States Representative:
In view of the many bills that have been submitted to Congress by the opponents of prohibition, we, the undersigned, urge that you use your influence and cast your vote in support of the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement and against any measure looking toward its modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal, and that this petition be printed in the Congressional Record.

REVISION OF BANKRUPTCY LAW

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask leave to present a letter in the nature of a petition relating to the bill to revise the bankruptcy law now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The letter is as follows:

JONESBORO, ARK., March 12, 1932.

Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON,

Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator: Some of my friends who practice more in the bankruptcy court than I do are very much concerned over the new bill which it seems the President is trying to rush through as a relief measure creating a new bureau and entirely revising the bankruptcy procedure. bankruptcy procedure.

I have been requested to write you suggesting to you that this bill ought to be carefully investigated by the Judiciary Committee or some committee before final passage. Certainly it does not bear much of the earmarks of a relief measure, from what I understand about it.

The information conveyed to me is that the bill seems to have been devised to meet certain supposed defects in the administra- | report (No. 455) thereon, tion of bankruptcy law in New York and that it would be entirely inapplicable to the eighth circuit. For instance, I am informed that one of the provisions is that within five days after adjudication inapplicable to the eighth circuit. For instance, I am informed that one of the provisions is that within five days after adjudication the bankrupt is supposed to appear before the supervisor for examination and, considering the size of the eighth circuit and the fact that most of the bankruptcy matter are no-asset cases, this would constitute something of a hardship on a small bankrupt, whereas in New York or some city it might not be so difficult. If the supervisor of the eighth circuit should be located at St. Paul or elsewhere, it would certainly constitute a big job to reach him from Jonesboro, for instance, in five days.

I am further informed that the act seems to contemplate an investigation with reference to the propriety of discharge as to each individual bankruptcy case. A very large percentage of the bankruptcy cases down here are no-asset cases; and while there may be an occasional fraud, it is doubtful whether there is any general and persistent custom to commit fraud, and any one individual can only go bankrupt every six years; hence it seems a rather elaborate plan when applied to this circuit, however applicable it may be to New York.

However, the only thing I am suggesting to you is that it would be well if the committee should investigate the matter, and I am Your friend,

Your friend.

CHAS. D. FRIERSON.

PROPOSED SALES TAX-FEDERAL FARM BOARD

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I also present a petition in the form of a telegram signed by a number of citizens of Hindsville, Ark., relating to the proposed manufacturers' sales tax on canned foods. I ask that that petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Also, sundry telegrams relating to the proposed reduction of salaries of the Federal Farm Board. I ask that these telegrams be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I also present a telegram relating to certain features of the proposed sales tax, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so

ABOLITION OF THE SHIPPING BOARD AND MERCHANT FLEET CORPORATION

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few days ago I introduced a bill for the purpose of abolishing one of the unnecessary bureaus of the Government-the Bureau of Efficiency. I desire now to introduce a bill to abolish the Shipping Board and Merchant Fleet Corporation, and ask its reference to the appropriate committee.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 4214) to abolish the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation and to provide for the disposal of their assets and winding up of their affairs; to the Committee on Commerce.

POISONOUS VOLATILE SUBSTANCES-AMENDMENT

Mr. BINGHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3853) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in poisonous volatile substances intended for household consumption, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF ON OIL

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an anonymous letter written and circulated in West Virginia protesting against a tariff or an excise tax on imported oil, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 10, 1932.

You are probably aware that the House Ways and Means Committee released on Saturday, March 5, the revenue bill of 1932, commonly referred to as the "sales tax bill," to balance the Fed-Treasury Budget.

This bill is to be referred to the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., on Thursday, March 10, for debate by the entire membership on the floor of the House.

The bill as submitted provides for a 1 cent per gallon tax on gasoline, fuel oil, gas oil, and crude oil imported into the United States.

Experts of the United States Treasury Department have stated that this import tax will bring no revenues. The inevitable result will be the stoppage of the imports of gasoline, which will result in increased prices of gasoline and oils in the eastern section of in increased prices of gasoline and ons in the eastern section of this country.

Those in favor of this section of the bill have forced its inclusion in the Ways and Means Committee report by threat of opposition to the sales tax as a whole. As now provided, this tax on imported oils will amount to 90 per cent ad valorem on crude oil, 70 per cent ad valorem on fuel oil, and 25 per cent ad valorem on gasoline.

Paraphilican craters in 1928 promised form sudjences that no

Republican orators in 1928 promised farm audiences that no tariff would be levied on gasoline or fertilizers. In view of these promises, the proposed tax, which is in reality a tariff, would be fatal to the usual support of farmers in your section.

It is important that you immediately wire your United States Senators and the Congressman from your district impressing upon them that you are opposed to this 1 cent per gallon tax on imported gasoline for the reasons outlined above. It would be well, also, to call their attention to the violation of their 1928 promises. Your United States Senators are: Hon. Henry D. Hatfield and Hon. Matthew M. Neely, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C. Your Congressmen from the State of West Virginia are: Hon. Carl G. Bachmann, Hon. Frank L. Bowman, Hon. Robert L. Hogg, CARL G. BACHMANN, Hon. FRANK L. BOWMAN, Hon. ROBERT L. HOGG, Hon. LYNN S. HORNOR, Hon. Hugh Ike Short, and Hon. Joe L. SMITH, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the importer and those who are interested in foreign markets are always with us. They are always concerned in what Congress does when it comes to protecting home industry, which means the protection of home labor.

We had this experience in the Seventy-first Congress, when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was under consideration. We had it in the Customs Court, which has recently held the flexible feature of this law unconstitutional. We have it in the ports of entry. Indeed, Mr. President, we have it reflected from our universities through the economists.

In no nation, I believe, do we find such a flagrant disregard for the protection of home industry as we experience here in America on account of the attitude of Congress in basing our cost differences upon foreign costs instead of upon the cost price of home production.

The same campaign of the importer is carried on throughout the land, my own State being no exception.

On March 17, 1932, I called the attention of the Senate to a telegram which I asked unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD, which is to be found on page 6330 of the RECORD.

To-day I have asked unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an anonymous communication dated March 10, 1932, and circulated in the State of West Virginia, dealing with an excise tariff on oil imports.

The duplicity, cowardice, and treachery of the propaganda against the oil excise tax are revealed again in the newest stratagems. Anonymous letters, with nothing in the letter or on the envelope to indicate the author, are being circulated, urging the recipients to write their Senators and Congressmen to oppose this tax. Since an excise tax on oil would be of positive benefit to all the people of West Virginia, with the sole exception of those who are interested in or employed by companies concerned with the importation of cheap foreign oil, one may assume that these are responsible for this sneaking form of propaganda.

Those anonymous letters are as full of falsities as the usual anonymous letter. Among other glaring misstatements, they misrepresent the excise tax as amounting to 90 per cent ad valorem on crude oil and 70 per cent ad valorem on fuel oil. The utter falsity of this is self-evident.

Similar letters are probably being circulated in other States. Like the thousands of telegrams sent to Members of Congress by the oil-importing companies last week, this is quite evidently merely one more attempt to delude us into the belief that the people are opposed to this measure, when in reality those who understand it enthusiastically support it.

I feel that the Senate, the Congress, and the citizenship throughout the country should be informed as to the actions of those who are interested in seeing to it that certain imports continue to come into this country without interference and without any protection to home industry, this inevitably destroying our home industry.

ADDRESS ON GEORGE WASHINGTON BY SENATOR WALSH OF MASSA-CHUSETTS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a very eloquent address delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] at Wakefield and Somerville, Mass., on February 22, which was the official opening of the bicentennial in Massachusetts this

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON'S TRIALS AND OUR ANXIETIES

Washington's trials and our anxieties

This day 200 years ago the man whom all Americans love to call "the Father of his Country" was born. We meet to-night to honor his memory and to inaugurate in Massachusetts commemorative bicentennial observances that are to continue throughout the Nation during this year of 1932.

It is fitting that on such an occasion we should lay aside our thoughts of present-day affairs, our concern about the business depression and taxes, our perplexities over unemployment, our controversies over prohibition, our anxieties about the disarmament conference at Geneva and a raging war in the Far East, and that we should turn back the pages of history and mentally contemplate the conditions in this land in the days of George Washington—the days when this Nation was being formulated.

We were all familiar in school days with the simple history of those early times, yet their circumstances and happenings are apt to be forgotten in the rush of current events. To-day we pause to recall them and weigh their significance.

The scriptures use the expression "think on these things." If we are to maintain the ideals of the founders, it is likewise necessary that we "think on these things." It is for this purpose that anniversaries are observed.

Each generation has its problems. We have ours. Washington and the fathers had theirs. Let us consider briefly some of them and make some comparisons.

When Paul Revere rode through Lexington and Concord, there were less than a million able-bodied freemen in Colonies, less than 3,000,000 men, women, and children, white and black, on the entire continent. Most of them were deand black, on the entire continent. Most of them were dependent on the toil of their own hands for their bread and shelter. Many winters some of them went hungry. Wood was their only fuel. Medical care was scarce. Schooling was rudimentary and fragmentary. Travel was slow and fraught with hardship and danger. Of recreation, as we know it to-day, there was none. Yet they were happy and, except for their grievances against the royal governors and the exactions of the mother country, they regarded themselves as contented and prosperous. They did not complain of their lot or grumble about hardships. They were accustomed to gather in their churches and render thanks to their Creator for His many blessings and mercy. They were God-fearing complain of their lot or grumble about hardships. They were accustomed to gather in their churches and render thanks to their Creator for His many blessings and mercy. They were God-fearing and God-trusting men and women. They found peace and contentment in steadfast reliance upon the Creator.

These men fought the Revolutionary War, when there were no Red Cross nurses, no Salvation Army, no Young Men's Christian Association or Knights of Columbus entertainment huts. They won the war, and founded our Republic, framed a Constitution that in all its essential aspects remains unchanged to this very day. Washington had to guide the army and afterwards the young Republic through intrigue and faction, for Washington labored in no harmonious environment. In addition to eternal strife and discontent among the colonists, he had unceasing struggles with foreign foes on our coast and savage foes on our frontiers.

The early Congresses had numerous debates about State rights, about governmental offices, about raising the meager revenues required by the Central Government—aye, even about the very preservation of the Union. They were not concerned with building post offices and roads and improvement of rivers and harbors, with child labor laws, workingmen's compensation acts, anti-injunction bills, 5-day week plans, and other of our present-day problems. They were not dealing with juvenile delinquency, with narcotics, with tariffs, with woman suffrage, with prohibition enforcement, nor with trusts and monopolies, nor with world courts and leagues of nations.

Times were often hard. Poverty had not been abolished then or of nations.

Times were often hard. Poverty had not been abolished then or since. Banks, such as there were, failed then as now. Droughts came, with fire and other disasters. Yet with all the Nation grew and prospered, population multiplied, and the citizenry of the land for the most part did not grumble over their lot. They had secured for themselves the blessings of liberty; they believed fixedly that they were living under the best government in the world, in the fairest land in the world, with greater opportunities and blessings for their posterity than were to be had elsewhere in the world.

We will do well during these coming months to contemplate the days of George Washington, the stoic courage of the people, their simple joys, and then to contemplate our own circumstances to-day and our abundant blessings. To-day we are a Nation of 120,000,000 people, possessed of the most richly endowed area on the globe. We have abundant homes with material comforts not found in the palaces of kings a century ago. To-day we take for granted our plastered walls, our furnace heat, our gas and electric light, telephone and radio, our automobiles, and our moveles.

We have some discontent and disorders in our great cities, some criminal classes in our population, rum runners on our seas, unfaithfulness in places of public trust, but despite these by-products of the present era, the average citizen enjoys a security products of the present era, the average citizen enjoys a security in his life and property quite unknown to those early pioneers, who siept with muskets by their sides to protect their lives and their loved ones from the Indians and who could never make a sea voyage without risk of attack by pirates.

To-day we have an aggregate national wealth represented by stores of gold, by railroads and factories and buildings, and by deposits of copper and coal and oil beyond the imagination of King Solomon.

We have fine highways from one end of the country to the other; we have schools—free schools for every child. We have more colleges than we can count. We have libraries and hospitals, parks and playgrounds, golf courses and beaches. Medical science has conquered much of the pestilence and disease which ravaged nations a century ago. Doctors and nurses ease our pain when we fall sick. It is well to pause and to consider these things, to appraise our manifest good fortunes, especially at a time like the present, when we are so prone to see only our misfortunes.

Many men and women willing to work are out of work. The unemployment situation is serious. Many business men are in bankruptcy. Many persons have seen their life savings disappear almost overnight in the great fall in the quoted prices of goods and securities, in the failures of companies and of banks.

We grumble over what we regard as the heavy burden of taxa-

We grumble over what we regard as the heavy burden of taxation. We worry about the gold standard. We rise in alarm over what we fancy may be the spread of communism and anarchy in our land. We protest war in the Far East. We become heated over political differences. We have admittedly a deep and grave social problem to deal with in prohibition.

I do not wish to seem to minimize these matters. But I submit that all of our present troubles are greatly minimized when set alongside of our blessings; that our present hardships are as nothing when compared with those bravely endured by our fore-

One priceless treasure, however, was possessed by George Washington and his compatriots, which we to-day seem for the most part to have lost. That was the sustaining comfort of belief in part to have lost. That was the sustaining comfort of belief in the wise guidance and the protecting power of an omnipotent God. While we have made tremendous gains in a material way, yet any comparison between the present and Washington's period that is not superficial will emphasize the fact that the spiritual values that were a source of strength, inspiration, comfort, and contentment to Washington and his comparitots have largely dispensed. We seem to have disregarded the spiritual forces and appeared. We seem to have disregarded the spiritual forces and influences that led the founders to seek divine guidance in all their private and public undertakings. Their trust and confidence in the justice and wisdom of God is one of the most outstanding their private and public undertakings. Their trust and confidence in the justice and wisdom of God is one of the most outstanding and pronounced facts in their history.

Has not the absence of the staple influence of the religious teachings and discipline of the earlier days of the Republic thrown present-day society violently out of balance in those primary essentials to real and permanent contentment and progress? Observe the absence of the religious influences so pronounced in the days of Washington in three major activities of our society, namely, in the education of the youth, in our economic life, and in the probity essential to the wise administration of government, municipal, State, and Federal.

Compare the home and religious training of the youths of Washington's day and to-day. Now millions grow up in crowded centers apart from religious contacts. An appalling number of our future citizens are receiving an education and training for life unnurtured by spiritual influences and indifferent to the restraints of divine law.

The absence of this influence has become marked in every avenue of life. It is noticeably absent in modern commerce and economics. We have substituted for individual responsibility and ethics, in the commercial and industrial field, an economic creature known as a corporation. A corporation is a "persona artificialis" created by the state to facilitate and speed up the large and extensive projects of commerce. By its very nature and creation the corporation removes responsibility from the artificialis" created by the state to facilitate and speed up the large and extensive projects of commerce. By its very nature and creation the corporation removes responsibility from the individual and places it upon a third artificial entity which is not endowed with morality or spiritual guidance. Its limitations are set only by civil law and human statute. Its abuse has brought to society many of its present ills and troubles because it has eliminated that concept of justice and charity which is the basis of all religious teachings.

We can not deny that material and mechanical benefits have accrued to society by the gigantic efforts of corporations in developing our natural resources and increasing tremendously the volume of wealth and mechanical ease and comforts of family veloping our natural resources and increasing tremendously the volume of wealth and mechanical ease and comforts of family life; nevertheless the loose system of creating unlimited securities in the form of stocks and bonds and the distribution of such paper on an innocent, frequently unprotected citizenship, is indefensible and is the result of the substitution of greed, gain, and materialism for the divine precept, "Thou shalt not steal."

The soulless character of these state-created substitutes for individual effort and responsibility has led to a growing protest among the masses of working people against economic conditions that deprive them of a sufficient income from their labors "to support themselves, their wives, and children in reasonable and frugual comfort," and to lay aside sufficient reserve to protect them from the horrors of poverty in the declining years.

As a result of the absence of supernatural influences in modern economics, society has been rocked again and again by explosive combats that have at times threatened not only to lessen faith in government but also to create intensive class rivalries, disproportionate distribution of wealth, poverty and economic distress in reoccurring cycles—indeed, apprehensive as to the possible survival of democracy and capitalism. The economic order of our whas tended to make society into a mechanical thing instead of an ethical and morally responsible thing. This is, indeed, a stupendous departure from the ideals of the men of Washington's era.

The lesson that must impress itself upon us, as we reflect upon the past and the present, is that there will be no lasting solution or permanent reconstruction of our economic life unless it is in-or permanent reconstruction of our economic life unless it is inspired by the divinely taught principles of justice, equality, and charity that guided Washington and the other patriots of his epoch. The economic crisis of the present hour is unmistakable evidence that if we rebuild on the sands of greed and selfishness we shall rebuild in vain.

May we not in this year of nation-wide celebration in honor of the great Washington come to realize the necessity of restoring to America the powerful influence for peace, progress, and security that the spiritual forces alone can provide. In no better way can we honor the memory of Washington. In no more lasting manner can we assure the preservation of the inheritances of liberty and the blessings of free government that have come down to us from

There are many characteristics of Washington we would do well to imitate. His fortitude, his courage, his heroism; his willingness to sacrifice self and to forego pecuniary rewards; his breadth of vision that lifted him above all pettiness and partisanship into the clear realm of a true patriotism; yet most important of all, if the Republic is to be preserved, we must do what he did—commit our citizenship and public service to Divine Providence.

Seldom did George Washington pen a document or render a public speech until he had committed himself and his cause to Divine Providence. Upon that eternal, impregnable support he based his life, his career, his cause. In a word, his life was compassed with the divine. Through the record of his years of There are many characteristics of Washington we would do well which emerged in that mighty hood of deeds of devotion and sacrifice. His life was a constant witness to God, and his character was molded to the principles of his religious training. Because of this he did not hesitate to emphasize in his immortal Farewell Address the importance of religion as a support to government and an essential to good citizenship.

To the end of our national existence and to the end of international civilization Washington's fame will endure and his name will be held in veneration. This Nation owes him a debt of gratitude which it never can fully discharge. The youth of to-day and the men of to-morrow may inbreathe inspiration from his living memory. Rulers and public servants of this and every land may well emulate his public virtues and lofty concept of the public trust. All who believe that true democracy can run its course only by following divine guidance may rejoice with grateful hearts for the life of George Washington.

RADIO ADDRESS BY SENATOR BROOKHART ON THE PROGRESSIVE PROGRAM IN CONGRESS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] in Chicago on The Progressive Program in Congress on March 19, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The death of Theodore Roosevelt changed the whole course of American history. After that untimely event, the Government in all its branches literally fell into the arms of "big business." This surrender began during the last days of President Wilson's administration and during his illness. If Roosevelt had lived he certainly would have been President again. Then the sordid story of Harding, Fall, Daugherty, of Mellon, and Eugene Meyer would never have been written. The elder La Follette stood stoutly against this financial rule, and his giant efforts live to-day in the revival of the progressive cause.

stoutly against this financial rule, and his giant efforts live to-day in the revival of the progressive cause.

This may be properly designated as the era of "business in government." It was "business" that put the jokers in the Federal reserve act and drove the surplus credit of the country to New York for promotion and speculation. It was "big business" that lowered the interest rate to itself for speculation and long-time bond issues and raised it on agriculture and every other little business. It was "big business" that seized control of the War Finance Corporation and the Federal land bank, the intermediate credit bank, and, finally, the Federal Farm Board itself for the destruction of the family farm home and the promotion of the corporation farm.

It was "big financial business" that promoted and sponsored the transportation act, pumped $7,000,000,000 of water into the valuation of the railroads, raised agricultural rates 60 per cent together with what had gone before, and dipped a cash subsidy of $529,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States.

It was "business in government" that built ships with public funds and at enormous cost and then sold them to itself for a cond.

It was "big business" that planned in secret to force a general defiation in May, 1920, postponed it, and further inflated so it could secure ample credit for its own protection, let it fall in October, and, according to the Manufacturers' Record, defiated agriculture in the whole sum of $32,000,000,000 and little business by eighteen billions more, while it itself rode through triumphant upon the credit savings of the people. It was "big business" that organized the chain-store system. It was "big business" that demanded a branch banking system; that sent its bank examiners out to decry loans to farmers; closed 6,000 banks because they had frozen agriculture paper, although for 55 years that paper was the best the bank could get; advised investment in long-time bonds, and until recently closed banks because the bonds had depreciated. It was "big business" that passed our tariff laws and sacrificed our foreign markets on the altar of greed. It was "big business" that organized the Power Trust, seized the great power resources of our country, and more than doubled the price of electricity to our people. It was "big business" that took its surpluses, accumulated under tariff protection, went abroad, and built factories to break down American laborers and farmers with the cheaper labor of foreign lands.

It was "big business," gone mad with power and the lust for profits, that inflated all stocks and bonds and kited their values 400 or 500 per cent into the sky. Then, in spite of all the wisdom of high finance, the bubble burst Still, "big business" laughed for a time, declared more dividends than ever, marshaled its economic armles, and finally stopped the panic at a value level still 200 per cent up in the air.

Agriculture lay prostrate where it had been since 1920. More than a million and a half farmers had lost their homes or their life savings. Six million workers were discharged

They first planned a consolidation of the big eastern railroads as a basis of a big stock boom. This met Senator Couzens and blew up. Stocks went still lower. Then came the moratorium of worship and service as a communicant and vestryman of the little | foreign debts. For a few days the boom prevailed, but too many Virginia church may be traced that inner stream of the spirit | knew these stocks and bonds were still inflated enormously and which emerged in that mighty flood of deeds of devotion and | began unloading, and again the boom collapsed. The next is the knew these stocks and bonds were still inflated enormously and began unloading, and again the boom collapsed. The next is the 15 per cent freight-rate advances, but that has gone stalemate, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation likewise. Now the big financial crowd stands appalled at the wreck and ruin it has wrought and trembles for its own financial safety. They must have a scapegoat, so they point back 13 years to the war and then sigh it was all inevitable because of the war. They think the people will forget that we were a debtor nation when the war began and soon paid over $5,000,000,000 with war profits. They also want us to forget that directly and indirectly from war profits we have loaned other people about twenty-four billions more, and there was no default on these until we had been a year and a half in this depression. No; the war did not cause it. It is the culmination of "business in government." It is the most colossal failure in human history.

"Big business" has garnered extortionate profits, but it has ruined the general prosperity of the country. The duty of civilization is to provide employment for everyone, so he can earn food, clothing, shelter, and education for his family. "Big business in government" has failed in these great purposes. In spite of its manipulation of both great political parties and of the sinister philosophy of party regularity, it has failed. Since business has failed to perform these fundamental obligations to the people, it is necessary that the Government step in and perform these duties. There is no other choice, and this is the great issue before the next session of Congress.

The question then arises, Has the Government a better chance the next session of Congress.

The question then arises, Has the Government a better chance of success than the eternal gamble of "big business"? History so declares. All admit that the best thing in our civilization is the public-school system operated by the government of the States and by the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia, the Canal Zone, and the Territories.

The next item in importance is our public-road system, operated by the States and the Federal Government jointly. There is one little blot, and that is private business in toll bridges, which

Next in importance is the post-office system, more efficient than any private business of its magnitude in the world. Yes; it operates at a deficit, because it furnishes a magnificent service at the lowest rates in history. The deficit is paid mainly by a tax upon the big profiteers, who have ruined the country, and is therefore an added advantage to all the people.

Next comes the great Panama Canal. There is no more successful and efficient enterprise in this world to-day. The Government has its power plants furnishing current at about one-third the cost of private business. There are great machine shops and dry docks for service to the ships of the whole world. Government farms, hotels and restaurants, cold-storage plants, and great stores or commissaries with a vast business, low prices, and large profit. Even the penitentiary is self-sustaining, perhaps the only one in the world.

With a record like this in what the Government has already with a record like this in what the Government has already done, the question will be presented as to what the Government can do in Congress for the revival of prosperity to the whole people. In September I said unless Congress is called in extra session at an early date there will be little chance for any substantial accomplishment. The national conventions will be coming on, and every proposition will take a political color and be considered more for its political effect than for its genuine merits. Of course, I do not believe that these great questions can all be solved in any one session of Congress. "Big business" itself is demanding, a revolutionary reorganization, but something substantial could have been accomplished if Congress had been convened in October.

Two problems that demand immediate attention and lay the foundation for restoring prosperity are:

Two problems that demand immediate attention and lay the foundation for restoring prosperity are:

First. The agricultural problem; and Second. The problem of unemployment.

There are two immediate phases of the agricultural problem:
First. The handling of the exportable surplus; and Second. The marketing of the home demand.

At present agriculture is forced to sell its surplus in the domestic market. That floods the market, breaks down its tariff protection, the surplus goes over into the free-trade markets of the world, is sold in competition with all the world, the price fixed by that sale, cabled back to the exchanges in the United States, and then the whole price in the home market fixed by the sale of this surplus in these free-trade markets of the world.

Agriculture is the only American business in this situation.

of this surplus in these free-trade markets of the world.

Agriculture is the only American business in this situation. Every other business that has an exportable surplus is financed and removed, separates and segregates its surplus from the domestic market. It is then sent abroad and sold to the best advantage in the best market that can be found. The same system must be provided for agriculture. This can be done by increasing the revolving fund to the Farm Board $1,000,000,000 or more, and then giving it authority to pay losses, if any are finally sustained in d'sposing of the surplus in foreign markets, either by a debenture from the United States Treasury or an equalization fee tax upon the farmers themselves. This is exactly what "big business" is doing with its surpluses now. It is even using the deposits of the farmers themselves in the banking systems of the country for this purpose, while the funds allowed to the Farm Board are wholly inadequate to accomplish the same purpose for the farmers themselves. There must be no trifling with this surplus. It must all be removed from the domestic market, and if this is done at a price up to the top of the tariff rates above the world market the price of the farmers' whole product will rise world market the price of the farmers' whole product will rise to the same level and to a cost of production level with an embargo to protect.

On an average there is only about 10 per cent of farm products that are exportable. It is about 50 per cent of cotton, 20 per cent of wheat, but less than 1 per cent of corn, and also cats, and on an average less than 10 per cent in a series of years. This is a small portion of the production to control the price fixing, but nevertheless that is what it is doing at the present time and has been doing these many years. With such a small proportion for export, farmers can well afford to pay the loss upon the surplus if they can get a cost-of-production price and cooperative profit upon the 90 per cent which is used at home. This is not like rubber and coffee, which were wholly export propositions and must find foreign markets. Only 10 per cent of ours is foreign, and the balance we can control at home as we did during and after the war.

eign, and the balance we can control at home as we did during and after the war.

If this were done for agriculture, it would, in turn, start many wheels of industry, and thus meet part of the question of unemployment. Agriculture was stricken down in 1920. It has stayed down ever since. It represents more than one-third of the buying power of the American people. It can not be stricken down and its credit destroyed, as has been done for the last 11 years, without bringing unemployment and general depression. Therefore agriculture is basic in this situation and should receive the first attention from the Government of the United States. I do not think this would correct all of the unemployment, and I not think this would correct all of the unemployment, and I think it would require at least $3,000,000,000 more to start public works and provide jobs for the rest of the seven or eight million who are now unable to get them.

Nobody believes in the dole. In the language of another:

"It is twice cursed—it hardens him that gives, and softens him that takes. It does more harm to the poor than exploitation, because it makes them willing to be exploited. It breeds slavishness, which is moral suicide."

What men want is not charity but a fair chance to earn their own living. However, we have found many men, women, and children hungry this winter. They must be fed. The Treasury of the United States must not be exempt. It is constantly replenished by taxes upon the extortionate profits of the great capitalists, who discharge their men to protect these same profits. Our civilization and our Government owe these men these jobs. They have failed in their duty; therefore the starving must be fed for emergency relief, regardless of offensive names or processes.

There is a special situation as to the unemployed of the World War, of whom there are more than 750,000. We have by law admitted a debt to them in the form of adjusted compensation and postponed the payment of it to 1945. This debt should be paid now, and they should not be sent out with their tin cups begging of the Red Cross or any other charitable institution.

If these temporary things had been done in an early session, we might have some time to consider a permanent reorganization and remedy. Since 1922 and up to the depression, our national income was about $90,000,000,000 a year. This means $750 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, and about $3,750 for each family of five. This was enough income so that What men want is not charity but a fair chance to earn their and remedy. Since 1922 and up to the depression, our national income was about $90,000,000,000 a year. This means $750 for each man, woman, and child in the United States, and about $3,750 for each family of five. This was enough income so that we need have no depression in the price of farm values, no seven or eight million workers unemployed if this income had been properly distributed. We have produced enough in the United States. We have a surplus of everything, while men are starving and homeless. Our whole trouble is in distribution. We spent about seventy-four or seventy-five billions of this for living expenses, operating expenses of industries, taxes, and waste of competition. This still leaves fifteen or sixteen billion dollars each year as a net national income, and that represents the wealth increase of our country. If all of this wealth increase had been distributed to capital in such distribution, the return of capital would have been less than 4 per cent, and that is all there is in this American pool of production as it is now operated. This 4 per cent is all that we have to distribute over and above our living, such as it is. But we do not distribute it upon any such theory. We organize these economic armies, these great corporations, these great combinations, and they go out fighting for 10 per cent, 40 per cent, 100 per cent, inflate their stock and bond values, and distribute the wealth of the country in gamblers' markets. This constant system of economic warfare has plunged our country into eight major depressions in the last 50 years, with seven little ones thrown in for good measure. We have spent half our time for 50 years in getting in or getting out of depression. Heretofore, agriculture came out first, because land values were advancing. This time agriculture went down in 1920 and has stayed down because land values are still declining. Other business revived in 1922 and then went into the great inflation boom of 1929, but agriculture stayed down through it all. It has had no power to

In order to effect this distribution, Federal taxation of excess profits is necessary. A part of the funds could be raised by the issuance of legal tender Treasury notes without interest, but there is a limit to this sort of financing. Since 1920 there has been a very material reduction per capita of our circulating money. This is one of the strong contributing causes of the depression and in a large part accounts for the low price level of all commodities. It is the most oppressive element upon the people who owe debts in the whole situation. Perhaps two or three billion dollars of legal-tender money without taxes upon anybody could be issued for farm relief, soldiers' bonus, and public enterprises before anything like justice would be restored between debtor and creditor. This would also help restore land values and other commodity values, which everybody now concedes to be desirable. The balance of the funds necessary should be raised by graduating corporation taxes, raising the higher brackets of incomes, and heavily increasing the estate and gift taxes and abolishing the 80 per cent refund to the States.

ing the estate and gift taxes and abolishing the 80 per cent refund to the States.

A sales tax has also been suggested. For the most part this is a tax directly upon the people, who are not able to pay it. The only sales tax ever suggested that meets the approval of progressive thought was suggested by Senator Glass. He proposed a 5 per cent tax on all resales on stock exchanges within 60 days from date of purchase. This tax would produce a large revenue from a source that ought to pay it and at the same time be a better regulation of stock gambling than other plans suggested. All of these taxes which I have herein approved would make for the redistribution of wealth to the people who by their labor have actually produced it.

We were told that congressional agitation was prolonging this depression, that prosperity was just around the corner, and with the adjournment of Congress we would catch up with it at once. Congress adjourned, and the depression has grown deeper every day, until now the whole country is crying to Congress. Is Congress answering the call? No; under a bipartisan dictatorship of the eastern financial machine the West and the South are forgotten. Even many of their own Representatives worship at the shrine of this economic god. They pass a $2,000,000,000 reconstruction bill, mainly for the relief of speculators in stocks and bonds, and grudgingly allow only two hundred million for closed banks in the West and South, which need three times as much. banks in the West and South, which need three times as much. They defeated the only substantial relief for the unemployed. Now, turning to the Treasury deficit, they propose to balance the Budget by a sales tax upon the poor, while the big incomes escape taxation by subtracting their stock-gambling losses. It is with especial delight that I note the defeat of this scheme so far under the fearless, progressive leadership of LaGuardia, of New York, and Swing, of California. The most sinister development in this bipartisan leadership is the evident design to defeat all substantial relief for agriculture or unemployment. This bipartisan combine. partisan readership is the content of the content o committing them, killing time, and running the session into the conventions, when it can adjourn without accomplishment. If the farmers, the laborers, the soldiers, and the independent business men of the West and the South, yes, and of the East, too, are listening in upon this address, let this be a call to action. Demand of your Congressman and your Senator that they give you a legislative set-up that will pay a cost-of-production price to the farmers, public works that will give unemployed labor a job, a deflated dollar that is honest between debtor and creditor, a reduction of Government expenses by reducing war profits in job, a deflated dollar that is honest between debtor and creditor, a reduction of Government expenses by reducing war profits in peace time, pay the soldiers their adjusted compensation, and levy the taxes upon the big incomes, big estates, and speculative business to pay the bill. This will redistribute some of the amassed wealth of the country and build a solid foundation for prosperity, and not a stock-watering inflation for speculation. It should now be apparent to all that prosperity can not return until the buying power of the farmers, the laborers, and the soldiers is restored. That can all be done at the present session of Congress, but it will not be done unless these great masses arise and demand it in terms that can not be denied.

ATLAS OF WASHINGTON'S TRAVELS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, among other things that the Bicentennial Commission has authorized to be printed is an atlas that depicts the travels of General Washington, and also shows many of his most important surveys.

This work was referred to a subcommittee of the Bicentennial Commission, of which the distinguished Member from Maryland [Mr. Typings] was the chairman. The atlas has come from the printer. I know that every Senator will be very much interested in its examination. It contains 25 different plates that are reprints of maps that were made by General Washington in his graphic drawing. It also contains quite a number of battle maps. It also contains his drawings illustrative of his surveyings of the lands that he himself surveyed, the ones that he owned. It is a very unusual work.

I am making this announcement for the benefit of the Senators. I think a copy will be sent to each Member of the Senate and each Member of the House.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes. Mr. HULL. Mr. President, a stranger dropping into these galleries to-day and listening to the impassioned address of the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] would have wondered whether our present-day tariffs are primarily intended to protect the helplessness of infancy or the decrepitude of old age. One would ordinarily imagine that some reference would be made to the infancy of industries in connection with tariff discussions.

I recall that Alexander Hamilton prescribed a tariff level of 8½ per cent in this country, and stated that when an industry had had full and ample time and opportunity in which to grow and develop, and failed to do so, it should be abandoned as not economically justified.

After the War of 1812 I think the tariff level was jumped up to about 20 per cent. The act of 1828 raised it 30 to 45 per cent, on the average. The Walker tariff was about 30 per cent, on the average. The tariff of 1857 was 24 per cent. The Civil War tariff was 48 per cent, on the average. The McKinley tariff was 50 per cent. The Dingley tariff was 52 per cent. Finally, so many articles, not all competitive, were placed on the dutiable list with small rates as to lower somewhat the average ad valorem during subsequent years. Under the Smoot Act the average rate on dutiable imports for the last calendar year was 50.9 per cent. Probably 80 per cent of the dutiable imports to this country bear an average ad valorem rate under this act of 60 to 65 per cent.

From listening to the Senators who have spoken with great concern about a few pairs of shoes or some other commodity or article getting into this country from abroad, one would easily conclude that the supreme problem in this country to-day pertains to stopping whatever cracks and crevices may be found in our present Smoot-Hawley tariff law, in order to prevent any sporadic item or any novelty or specialty or other product in some way indirectly or remotely or speculatively competitive from getting into this country, and, perhaps, bringing about the insolvency of some "struggling industry" 125 years old.

Mr. President, there are other conditions and problems in this country, in my opinion, of far greater magnitude and urgency than these little minor and insignificant phases of our present tariff situation which are being given such serious and particular emphasis by Senators on the other side. I realize, however, that we are approaching a quadrennial election in this Nation, and that bids will be thrown out here and there for campaign contributions. Some of our industries will be persuaded that they are in danger—not in imminent danger, but in possible future danger—of some kind of competition from somewhere, and, therefore, that they ought to get in here and secure tariff recognition on the eve of this election, which, like all others, of course, must be financed.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this great body would do well to devote more of its time and thought and attention to the real conditions and problems that confront this country, rather than to duck and dodge and run away from them, and devote hours and days here, as I said, to hair-splitting distinctions about rates of tariff that might perchance permit some nondescript items of imports to filter into this country, and devise ways and means, if possible, to bar them out.

The present panic, unprecedented in its depth and intensity, owes its origin to deep-seated and fundamental causes. The Federal administration, its supporters and advisers, however, have not thus far proposed any program of basic remedies for these basic causes. They frankly avow their purpose, on the contrary, to confine any panic cures to purely local, superficial, or temporary treatment in the way of palliatives or soporifics or first aid. For these, let them have even more than their share of credit.

This is what I would direct attention to, while it gets away from the minor and insignificant items of tariff importations. These awful conditions of business depression, however, have been permitted to run virtually two years without any adequate plan even to administer this first-aid treatment.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana, I think, agreed a while ago that he had not gaged or measured the scope and extent and depth of the panic until it had been raging in this country, and spread throughout the world, for some eight months. That was significant that Senators with great ability and wide intelligence were not able to identify the nature of this deep-seated panic until it had scattered wreck and ruin among hundreds of millions of people here and elsewhere for eight months. I submit, Mr. President, that it is high time that we were brushing aside some of these minor tariff inconsequentials and giving our real thought and effort to a more thorough analysis of present financial and industrial and general economic conditions and remedies for them.

I am wondering how long the American people will be content to undergo the incalculable losses and injuries of the existing panic situation and permit, without any complaint, the Federal administration, while dodging responsibility for a permanent cure, to trifle and dally with purely minor and temporary phases of it.

It is really amazing that the blind and shortsighted course of the Government in thus dealing with mere symptoms, pursued so smugly and complacently, has not before now met with sweeping and indignant challenge by the best thought of all political parties, of the press, and of every other informed and unselfish group of persons, with vision, courage, and constructive capacity. I warn governmental and political leaders that there is a limit to human patience, distress, and panic privations, and that unless these leaders bestir themselves and cease to trifle with the real and fundamental phases of the depression situation the millions of unemployed, the tens of millions of agricultural population, and most of the American public, all the victims of unsound economic policies and incompetent business leadership, will peacefully assemble in their respective localities and demand that so-called leaders assign some reason for their complete failure and unwillingness or incapacity thus far to offer the semblance of a program that would cure, not the mere symptoms alone but the fundamental causes of the depression and so avoid periodical recurrence of a similar panic.

The Hoover administration is clinging blindly to a list of temporary emergency relief measures and also to the most extreme phases of economic nationalism or isolation, as its sole economic policy at the present critical stage. It seems utterly blind to the patent truth that the former, at most, can only bring about very partial, unbalanced, and temporary prosperity in this country alone, leaving the balance of the world in its present prostrate condition, while the administration's wild pursuit of the mad policy of economic nationalism will, instead of really curing, seriously aggravate both domestic and world business conditions. Of what avail would be the limited, lopsided, and temporary period of prosperity in this country alone if the basic domestic and world causes of the panic are to remain undisturbed and intact with the inevitable and certain result that we might, at any time in the future, be visited by another equally destructive depression?

It is my unalterable opinion that the practice of the half-insane policy of economic isolation during the past 10 years by America and the world under American leadership is the largest single underlying cause of the present American and world panic, and that a gradual or material reversal and modification of this policy, so suicidal especially to a great creditor and surplus-producing country, is an indispensable prerequisite if this and the other nations are to be restored to full, sound, and well-balanced prosperity which will not be limited nor lopsided nor, what is most important, subject periodically to recurring panics.

This absurd attempt of every nation to live unto itself and aloof from others has resulted in a breakdown of international confidence, credit, finance, exchange, and trade, and is gradually pushing the world into bankruptcy. Exports of goods the world over have diminished by nearly one-half, unemployment is running into the tens of millions, business is prostrate, and agriculture is utterly impoverished. To what extent are we going to give attention to these real problems? To what extent are we going to abandon them and run away from them and join the dis- | tinguished Senator from Utah and a few others here in discussing these flyspecks, which we can only discover with a microscope on the insurmountable walls of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law? To what extent must these unthinkable conditions of distress and loss become still more aggravated before the intelligent thought of the Nation will assert itself and demand the application of modernized economic policies to our whole transformed industrial and commercial conditions, in lieu of the utterly obsolete policy of superprotection and its accompanying trade barriers which have become an economic blight and scourge here and everywhere? Can not every person plainly see the 10-year results of existing economic policies-that the American people, with the exception of a small group, that always uses the Government to get rich, notwithstanding these years of unbounded opportunity for human progress, are worse off in every important respect than in 1920?

Yet no remedy is offered except to put the whole machinery of this great Government to work for an indefinite time to see whether Bill Jones is not suffering on account of the importation of a pair of shoes from some other part of the world or find a way to block that pair of shoes from coming in in the future.

The mad pursuit of economic nationalism or aloofness or seclusion—every nation striving to live unto itself—has proved utterly empty and disastrous. This attractive theory contemplates that each country shall surround itself by high and ever higher tariff walls, with an accompanying network of restrictions, reprisals, embargoes, and retaliations, and with the very minimum of economic contacts with others. Every nation is expected to produce all articles or commodities it needs, that may be humanly possible, regardless of costs. Each nation would sell, but none would buy, and each would feverishly get ready for the next war by thus making itself completely self-contained. High wages and high living standards to labor in each of the 95 countries of the world, under this theory, have become a mere matter of legislative enactment.

Under the benign effects of this plan of high protection and other trade barriers it would be a close question as to whether agriculture or industry would grow rich more rapidly. Each nation would either pay its debts in gold instead of goods or secure their cancellation. Each country also would practically consume what is produced. Since most countries, with their productive capacities thus highly stimulated artificially, proceeded, during past years, to produce in numerous lines more than each could consume at home, each has undertaken to utilize bounties, rebates, drawbacks, subventions, and most every other kind of device to force exports of surpluses on other countries. Each country thus glutted with surpluses is also practicing the most obnoxious phases of paternalism by government devices for purposes of valorization, pooling, pegging prices, restricting output, and similar methods, all of which thus far have broken down and reacted disastrously upon the producer.

The following article, written 50 years ago by a great economist and teacher, Prof. William G. Sumner, aptly describes the present-day spirit of paternalism, plunder, and loot:

The Government is to give every man a pension and every man an office and every man a tax to raise the price of his product, and to clean out every man's creek for him, and to buy all his unsalable property, and to provide him with plenty of currency to pay his debts, and to educate his children, and to give him the use of a library and a park and a museum and a gallery of pictures. On every side the doors of waste and extravagance stand open, and spend, squander, plunder, and grab are the watchwords * * . Who pays for it all? The system of plundering each other soon destroys all that it deals with. It produces nothing. Wealth comes only from production, and all that the wrangling grabbers, loafers, and jobbers get to deal with comes from somebody's toil and sacrifice. Who, then, is he who provides it all? Go and find him, and you will have once more before you the forgotten man. You will find him hard at work, because he has a great many to support. Nature has done a great deal for him in giving him a fertile soil and an excellent climate, and he wonders why it is that, after all, his scale of comfort is so moderate. He has to get out of the soil enough to pay all his taxes, and that means the cost of all the jobs and the fund for all the plunder. The forgotten man is delving away in patient industry, supporting his family, paying his taxes, casting his vote, supporting the church and the school, reading his newspaper, and cheering for the politician of his admiration, but he is the only one for whom there is no provision in the great scramble and the big divide.

Can all the people of all the nations of the earth be fooled all the time? How much longer will the Hoover administration be permitted by the American people to rely alone upon its present list of emergency panic measures, and how soon will a peremptory demand be made upon all political parties to offer a definite program dealing with the fundamentals of the panic situation? The Federal administration contends with pretended seriousness, as stated, that our country is sufficiently equipped to be able by itself to bring about a satisfactory state of prosperity; that by boot-strap methods it can lift itself up to a satisfactory business level.

The minds of the President and his advisers seem to have undergone an evolution as to the causes of the panic. For several months following the stock-market collapse the President was sanguine that it was no more than a stock-market flurry, due to excessive and uncontrolled speculation in securities. He was sure that underlying conditions were sound. The idea of world causes at this stage did not occur to him. The panic was only a temporary and isolated affair.

A new and different impression, however, seemed to become conclusive and clear in the mind of the President during the late summer of 1930. Prior to this stage, and on January 21, for example, the President announced that employment had turned upward. On January 28 he expressed his pleasure at the upturn. On March 7 he declared that 36 States were now normal. On May 1 he said that the worst of the depression was over.

In his address to the American Bankers Association, October 2, 1930, the President declared that—

This depression is world-wide. Its causes and effects lie only partly in the United States.

The President also found that-

A perhaps even larger immediate cause of our depression has been the collapse of prices following overproduction of important raw materials, mostly in foreign countries.

He named rubber, copper, wheat, sugar, cotton, zinc, and silver, among others. In his message of December 2, 1930, the President reiterating, said that—

In the larger view the major forces of the depression now lie outside the United States.

The idea seemed to be that the collapse of world commodity prices had reduced the buying power of many countries, resulting in the slowing down of demand for manufactured goods from ourselves and Europe, with inevitable unemployment. The President was rather pointed in this reference when he spoke to the American Bankers Association in October, 1930.

It is interesting to observe that while changing his view to the effect that "the major forces of the depression now lie outside of the United States," the President at the same time took pains to indicate that this very international situation to which he referred did not require international treatment from the standpoint of American recovery from the panic. He said at Cleveland that—

Because the depression is world-wide and because its causes were world-wide, does not require that we should wait upon the recovery of the rest of the world. We can make a very large degree of recovery independently of what may happen elsewhere.

The theory of the President was that "we are so remarkably self-contained" as to be able thus to recover. The President seemed to think at this stage that—

Our recuperation has been retarded by the unwarranted degree of fear and apprehension created by these outside forces.

He referred to overproduction of basic commodities, followed by price falls, declining buying power abroad, and declining demand, and to the general collapse of the world economic situation.

The President and his advisers are wholly unable to see any necessity for the constructive treatment of the fundamental causes of the panic—both domestic and world either from a standpoint of soundly curing the panic, or of preventing its recurrence by removing its basic causes. And | course, concerted governmental action becomes all imporyet President Hoover, in 1928, said:

To insure continuous employment and maintain our wages, we wast find a profitable market for our surpluses. * * The must find a profitable market for our surpluses. * * The great war brought into bold relief the utter dependence of nations upon foreign trade.

And yet, Mr. President, from the remarks of distinguished Senators on the other side of the aisle we would have thought the supreme paramount problem is about a few thousand dollars of scattered, sporadic imports, instead of this nation-wide and world-wide condition that has swept hundreds and millions of people into the vortex of bankruptcy and insolvency.

The President in his Brazil speech, following his election, said:

International trade is the lifeblood of civilization.

And I concur in what he said. The history of the human race shows that the really great countries and cities which have been built up have been trading countries and trading cities. They levied tribute upon the culture and the learning, and the best habits and customs and manners of all the peoples of every part of the world. Under this modernized postwar theory of economic isolation some would have this great and powerful Nation, with unprecedented equipment and resources of every kind, abrogate its opportunity to go out and develop its finances and commerce in all parts of the world, to abrogate in favor of some second or third or fourth rate nation simply because some 125year-old American industry, probably with an obsolete plant and with some trifling son-in-law as general manager, comes goose-stepping into the Capitol every so often and reports that $15.25 worth of foreign products have filtered in, or are about to filter in, on him.

William McKinley, in his Buffalo speech, said:

The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. * * * Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

The Federal administration lightly ignores a long list of vital facts fixing the place of the United States in the world economic situation. In the first place, we are, as stated, the greatest creditor and surplus-producing nation on the planet. We have $28,000,000,000 loaned abroad, but the administration supporters would say that this does not suggest any international coordination, collaboration, or cooperation. We have a vast amount of idle gold, but the administration seems to imagine that one or two countries may gobble up most of the gold of the world, store it in a cellar, and be under no obligations to cooperate in the world administration of the gold standard or in stabilizing monetary conditions. The world market fixes the price of our entire domestic output of cotton, hog products, wheat, and many other commodities on an exporting basis, and these commodities are sufficiently numerous in turn to fix measurably the entire wholesale commodity price level here at home; and yet the blind isolationist is unable to detect any interdependence of this and other nations economically.

The patent fact that from the standpoint of our own enlightened self-interest there must be some conference and cooperation to restore the international exchange, credit, and trade situation which, under the effects of every sort of artificial and arbitrary barrier, is in a state of virtual collapse, is complacently ignored by the Hoover administration. The fact that international trade was never so completely choked and strangled by insurmountable tariff walls and almost every other similar imaginable restriction does not remotely suggest to the Hoover mind that the further obstruction and destruction of trade by these arbitrary methods shall stop and that some international conference and understanding is necessary for the practical accomplishment of this end. The fact is ignored that all governments, including our own, have plunged headlong into excessive expenditures, taxation, and debt, and that the most ruthless economy and retrenchment everywhere is an indis-

Naturally, every American citizen and official, regardless of differing political and economic views, are equally anxious to see even temporary, uncertain, and limited conditions of prosperity and to cooperate to the utmost for the accomplishment of this initial step or slight beginning.

It is an outrage upon the great, credulous, and suffering people, however, for the spokesmen of that relatively small but powerful group comprising the chief beneficiaries of tariffs and other special privileges, to preach the brazen economic falsehood that America has not the least concern about the fact that the panic, regardless of how and where it commenced, is now a hopelessly involved and world-related affair, but blatantly proclaim our ability alone to deal adequately with it. Many crushing and overwhelming economic facts and conditions which have been pointed out are contemptuously ignored by these spokesmen, such as the fact that the fall of prices is world-wide; that the stoppage of trade is world-wide; the decline of production is world-wide; the difficulties of both public and private debtors are worldwide; the troubles of creditors are world-wide; unemployment is world-wide; every sort of restriction on trade is world-wide; the breakdown of the processes of exchange and distribution is world-wide. And yet the narrow, blind, selfish, and all-powerful group, comprising the chief tariff and special privilege beneficiaries, which at present have a strangle hold on the Federal Government, hypocritically require their spokesmen to say to the suffering American people that the remedy so far as America is concerned lies chiefly within the power of our people and government alone. Numerous Democrats, I regret to say, have been caught up by these sinister forces, with the result that they are deaf, dumb, and blind when it comes to proposing fundamental remedies for existing fundamental panic causes. I have almost reached the painful conclusion that the President is intimidated by these powerful and insolent forces. This seems possible, in the light of the President's detached utterances on numerous occasions, including those I have already cited.

The President spoke to the International Chamber of Commerce on May 4. I am citing these utterances in order, if possible, to convince somebody in this country that the sound permanent prosperity of America requires not only our impregnable home market but an expanding and prosperous foreign market for the surpluses which many of our greatest industries annually produce. Speaking to the International Chamber of Commerce on May 4, the President said:

It is needless for me to emphasize the high degree of economic interdependence of the world—we require no more emphatic demonstration than the present world-wide depression. Although the United States enjoys a far greater economic independence than any other large country, yet we have been gravely affected by world forces. The consideration and discussion of worldwide economic problems and of the economic relations between nations by men who have had to deal with the results of economic forces can be most helpful to world understanding and world cooperation in their solution.

In his more deliberate moments the President thus confirms in principle my entire contention.

At the time of the moratorium, on June 20, 1931, President Hoover frankly reasserted the same patent economic truths to an important extent, as follows:

From a variety of causes arising out of the depression, such as the fall in the price of foreign commodities and the lack of confidence in economic and political stability abroad, there is an abnormal movement of gold into the United States which is lowering the credit stability of many foreign countries. These and the other difficulties abroad diminish buying power for our exports and in a measure are the cause of our continued unemployment and continued lower prices to our farmers.

Here is the President speaking with all possible deliberation, and yet, Mr. President, this panic has been raging since October, 1929, and no basic program has been adopted by the administration, or by any political party or any cross section of the press or any civic organization. It is true pensable factor in permanent business recovery, and, of that many individuals, including some Democratic leaders, have suggested one, and have in vain asserted its necessity, but no such program has as yet been generally adopted.

I hope I may make a more accurate prediction, though, perhaps, a sadder one, than was made by the distinguished Senator from Indiana on June 13, 1930, at the time the Smoot-Hawley bill was enacted, when I say that the people here and in other important countries that have been pulled down and broken down and held down economically by the pursuit of hopelessly unsound economic policies and palliatives by this and other Governments are doomed to suffer in increasing measure until finally they bestir themselves and see to it that their public servants in every part of this country and in other important countries will feel obliged to sit down and deal with the fundamentals of these awful panic conditions.

Are we going to be content merely to restore some local business activity here at home such as we may be able to restore by the administration of local stimulants? Are we merely going to restore some limited business activity by restoring some semblance of confidence and bringing out from its hiding place some credit? What sane business man does not know that, with these fundamental world-panic conditions still existing, untouched and intact, they may not in a night crash into our American business structure and destroy what new local business they may have thus created? Yet our Federal Government is apparently oblivious to the real and fundamental panic problems that are so vital to the property and to the comfortable living of hundreds of millions here and everywhere.

We are undertaking to sit supinely here at home and to retain our self-centered state of mind, and yet, Mr. President, with 2,000,000,000 population on this planet 75 per cent of them are living to-day in a state of what we would call poverty; but, in the face of that situation, this great productive Nation, with the greatest surplus-producing capacity in history, proposes to face back and inward and pusillanimously confess that it has not the ability to step out in front of the few other industrial nations and supply the world with a large portion of the goods and necessities that would go to make a decent living standard because a few of our chief beneficiaries of the ultrahigh tariff are so blind and selfish as to be utterly without vision.

If we had only had a Cecil Rhodes, without his unlawful methods, or a Warren Hastings, or a Wakefield, who went into Australia—if we had had any person in this country with a creative mind and vision and resolution, he would have gone out and brought within the range of our trade routes and of our surplus products untold markets; but, Mr. President, we have been marching all these 10 or 12 years in precisely the opposite direction.

The President on July 6, 1931, in announcing that the moratorium had been agreed to by important creditor governments, repeated that—

The plan was particularly aimed to economic relief. • • • It means tangible aid to unemployment and agriculture.

Let me make still more clear the deliberate attempt of the world under American leadership to commit economic suicide by reading from the chief publication of the United States Department of Commerce, dated February 22, 1932, in which they seek to describe the causes and effects, to use their own language, of "the dominant forces now prompting these measures of extreme nationalism and apprehensive trade restriction," as follows:

The cumulative effect of the world economic depression as it continued into its second year led many foreign countries to a further tightening up of their markets during the year 1931, by higher tariffs and by a variety of other drastic trade-control measures. The influence of the depression in this direction was accentuated by the general shrinkage of exports, resulting in part from the increased tariffs and other restrictive measures adopted by many countries during 1930, and was aggravated by the financial difficulties of government, which spread rapidly after midsummer of 1931.

Under these exceptional conditions the usually dominant protective motive for the curtailment of imports has been often overshadowed during the past year by the need for increasing governmental revenues, correcting adverse trade balances, protecting currency values, or maintaining the Government's financial solvency altogether. To attain these ends, the trade-control measures taken during 1931 have included not only increases in duties but quota limitations, restrictions on imports in other forms, exchange controls, and even gold embargoes, with all their consequences. On the other hand, among the official measures to stimulate exports, or improve export prices, have been special tariff treaties, export subsidies, and governmental monopolies or controls of trade in particular commodities.

The measures in process and the plans in prospect in various countries early in 1932 foreshadow still greater contraction of international trade during the year ahead, including many markets of primary interest to American exports. In a number of foreign countries evidences are indeed apparent of growing restiveness on the part of commercial interests over the effects of drastic tradecontrol measures—those adopted by their own governments as well as by others. However, the likelihood of definite action during 1932 by foreign countries in the reverse direction, of moderation of trade barriers, appears to depend largely upon the early resolving of the financial crisis and upon the appearance of substantial signs of recovery from the general economic depression, the dominant forces now prompting these measures of extreme nationalism and apprehensive trade restriction.

With overcapacity, if not actual overproduction, shrinking markets, falling prices, increased unemployment, unbalanced budgets, frozen credits, and general financial uncertainty afficting practically every country—and an increasing number of countries finding themselves during the past year facing also heavily adverse trade balances and slipping currencies—and with the difficulties of one country rapidly involving others through reciprocal reaction, many governments have resorted to whatever trade-control measures suggested themselves that promised at least to alleviate their particular immediate difficulties.

Mr. President, these runaway activities and methods of every conceivable kind and description, including economic isolation, under American leadership since 1920, calculated utterly to obstruct and block the transfer of capital, goods, and services across international boundaries everywhere, are each week seriously aggravating the world's economic situation and postponing the day of sound and permanent business recovery.

We find all this network of insurmountable tariffs and exchange restrictions and embargoes and reprisals and retaliations and quotas, together with the complete collapse of the gold standard in most of the countries of the world and the derangement of monetary stability everywhere, and then at home we find that we have an export capacity of from twenty to twenty-five billion dollars. Our great textile industries have from 1 to 300 per cent excess productive capacity; our radio manufacturers, our automobile manufacturers, our oil producers, and lumber producers and coal miners and cement manufacturers and scores of other great industries have a tremendous excess capacity, to say nothing of cotton, tobacco, and wheat and hog products and a long list of other agricultural products the export difficulties of which have utterly impoverished American agriculture in this country under our extreme high-tariff policy.

In the face of these circumstances, who can pretend that there is no fundamental question before this country that we should consider in connection with the solution of these panic conditions except the minor, temporary, and local aids that have been enacted here in the form of what are called "emergency relief measures" submitted by the administration?

Mr. President, the American people have the choice of continuing inert and indifferent to this affliction of creeping economic paralysis until the lack of food and shelter literally drives them to a reexamination of our business and economic ills and the adoption of fundamental remedies, or they can without further delay demand of leaders in all political parties that basic panic causes must not longer be trifled with and ignored simply because a small group of the chief tariff and other special-privilege beneficiaries in this country are too blind and narrow and selfish to permit those whom they control to adopt a broad and patriotic policy of permanent relief for the general American public. In 1922 Republicans in charge of the Government based the Fordney high tariff law measurably upon the alleged necessity of preventing sporadic imports from countries with depreciated currencies, and an important reason for reorganizing the Tariff Commission was impliedly for the purpose of reducing the Fordney rates concededly excessive save for depreciated currency conditions abroad. Virtually all of the nations were then off the gold standard, but they returned to it during the years following.

The price level, it should be admitted, was high when the Fordney law was enacted. In 1929 the Smoot-Hawley measure was conceived upon the theory of benefiting agriculture in the main. The outcome, as usual, however, was that industry secured the lion's share of actual tariff benefits. Two groups of tariff thought, identical in principle and with scarcely distinguishable difference in practice, came conspicuously upon the scene during the Smoot-Hawley tariff movement. One group stood for skyscraping tariffs for industry, with more moderate rates for agriculture, while the other group stood for skyscraping rates for agriculture, with more moderate rates for industry. It was in practical effect a case of "two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one." The inevitable outcome was in strict harmony with all human experience of the past, and that was that both got what they wanted, but, as usual, agriculture was badly buckeyed and bunkoed, as is demonstrated to every sane person by the fact that agriculture has been fundamentally worse off each year since the enactment of the farmers' high tariff in 1921 and the Fordney high tariff in 1922.

Mr. President, the dominant Republican forces which are also in charge of the Government, by their economic record and policy since 1920, raise the acute issue of whether we shall continue our blind and utterly impractical pursuit of economic nationalism, which in addition to high tariffs embraces every sort of obstruction to the transfer of goods, capital, and services across international boundaries, as stated, and which contemplates that apart from some trivial exchanges of raw materials and occasional items of foodstuffs and manufactures, this great country shall restrict its production in manufacturing, mining, and agriculture to its home consumption, or whether with vision and constructive ability we shall pursue the opposite economic policy which recognizes that we are living in a new day in which our impregnable home market must be supplemented by adequate foreign markets for our ever-increasing surpluses, and that the satisfactory disposition of such surplus production has become an indispensable factor in our permanent progress and our sound and balanced prosperity.

You will recall, Mr. President, that in 1922 a great cry went up over the country about some scattering imports, due to the depreciated currencies abroad. We proceeded to enact the Fordney tariff law in order to keep out such sporadic items of imports as were being brought in over our then existing tariff rates. Within two or three years nearly all the nations of the world had been able to get back on the gold standard; conditions were gradually becoming normal so far as price levels were concerned; and yet in the campaign of 1928 the suggestion was made that we should have another tariff revision upward. At that time, it seems to me, the President committed three or four major blunders. The first one was in agreeing to call an extra session of Congress for the purpose of a general tariff revision. After he discovered his mistake, to all appearances, he announced that he would not undertake to curb the movement in Congress to enact excessive rates, but that he would install a "two fisted" Tariff Commission to lower all the rates that were thus about to be raised excessively.

That reminded me of a piece of doggerel I once read which some member of the British Parliament quoted:

I hear a lion in the lobby roar;
Say, Mr. Speaker, shall we shut the door
And keep him there?
Or shall we let him in
In order to see whether
We can put him out ag'in?

So the President was willing for the advocates of unlimited tariff protection to pile rate upon rate, with the complacent announcement that he would not interfere; but that after all the damage had been done he would undertake the utterly absurd and impossible task of calling on that gallant band of "tariff reformers" down yonder, labeled "The Tariff Commission," to ascertain rates that were really not excessive.

A Senator from somewhere was asking a while ago about where it would be possible to find a single one of all these thousands of rates that one would dare lay his impious hand upon with the idea of reducing it. Some days ago I glanced for five minutes over the imports for the first six months of this act, and I ran across rates like these. I just took these as I came to them.

And so on, and so on.

Mr. President, in 1929 we produced $70,000,000,000 worth of manufactured products. We imported into this country during the last calendar year in the way of finished, dutiable manufactures $292,359,000 worth of commodities. That is the infinitesimal amount of imports of this class that are ! really competitive. We bring in a few hundred million dollars' worth of finished manufactures that are not in any sense competitive and that are on the free list; but, with all of this nation-wide propaganda and all these frenzied speeches in our legislative bodies about the danger of this huge manufacturing plant in America being hopelessly overcome and submerged by somebody from somewhere abroad, when we come to examine the actual imports under existing law they consist of the relatively few items to which I have referred, so far as finished dutiable manufactures are concerned. When the distinguished Senator from Indiana rose and announced that 70 per cent of our imports came in duty free, his face lighted up almost as though he had discovered the riddle of the universe; and yet if the present sky-scraping duties on the dutiable items that come in here at present were made just a little higher in a few places, thereby excluding all dutiable imports, we would have no imports except those that are free.

All of the competitive articles, or anything remotely or speculatively competitive, would be kept out; and the rubber and the silk and the tin and all this long list of commodities that we must bring in would come along duty free, because we would not be producing them, and they would not in any remote sense be competitive.

So the statement of the distinguished Senator from Indiana that 70 per cent of our imports are duty free would seem to attribute some virtue or some power in the Smoot-Hawley tariff rates to affect the amount of noncompetitive and non-dutiable imports that come in here free, when in fact they chiefly affect the competitive imports, which last year had shrunk down to the trivial level of around $695,000,000.

Mr. President, I repeat that we must determine these problems in the light of postwar conditions. It is utterly absurd to go back prior to the war and take up tariff or other economic theories that were made entirely obsolete by the complete transformation in our industrial and commercial affairs that took place as a result of the war. As I stated, instead of a provincial country, with some developing manufactures but chiefly with some foodstuffs and raw materials for exports, we became the supreme industrial country of the world, with agriculture and mining almost equally coordinated with the industrial phases of our economic structure.

In 1925 I made this statement on the floor of the House of Representatives:

Vast changes in economic conditions everywhere were wrought by the World War, and most unfortunate will be the nation that falls to recognize and act upon them.

Then I said:

The supreme question is, Shall the economic life of the world during coming years be developed under American leadership on the basis of high tariffs and severe trade restrictions and discriminations, thereby reducing production, diminishing trade, impoverishing nations, and promoting economic wars, or shall it be developed on the basis of moderate tariffs, freedom from economic barriers, and fair and friendly trade relations?

On this occasion, for the second time, I offered in Congress a resolution proposing an international trade agreement or economic congress, the purpose of which was, just as the pending proposal has for its purpose, to deal with the hopelessly confused and complicated trade conditions and methods that exist throughout the world.

Almost all wars for the past 250 years have originated from economic controversies. When the attempted customs union between Germany and Austria was undertaken some months ago, we saw that it created a tense situation in every chancellery of Europe. A most serious threat of increasing armaments in France and other countries was immediately heard; and yet, Mr. President, when we offer to create an international agency for purposes of international conference to work out a better understanding with respect to these ever-increasing tariff complications and these ever-tightening trade restrictions which lead to the completely unbalanced distribution of gold in the important countries of the world—when we seek some international conference in order that this and other nations, wholly within their domestic functions and entirely from the standpoint of the enlightened self-interest of each, may be able by some concerted action to point out steps that each nation might well take to liberalize the present exchange situation, to check this great increase in tariffs everywhere, and face in the opposite direction, and in many other ways by mutual agreements promote fair and friendly trade relations—when this proposal is offered, we get no response either from the administration or from any other important group of thought that is supposed to be out from under the influence of the chief tariff beneficiaries in this country.

Mr. President, I would like to inquire how much longer and how much further this policy can be continued without serious aggravation of the financial and industrial and business conditions here and in other parts of the world. We ought to be able to see by this time that temporary palliatives are not reaching the seat of the disease. We ought to be able by this time to realize that some degree of international conference and concerted action is vitally important, if we would take the first long step in improving conditions, and that is to restore confidence.

I think I said before the Committee on Finance that if there could be one international conference of sound, able business men with vision, who would reach accurate conclusions and proclaim them to the world, conclusions by which we could halt this mad movement which piles restriction and trade barrier upon restriction and trade barrier in every country, if we could face in the opposite direction in a careful and cautious manner, we would see a degree of confidence restored in every part of the world which would make a thousand reconstruction finance corporations utterly insignificant as aids in checking panic conditions and improving them.

I do not desire to go into detail, but I would call attention to the purchasing power of this and other countries. This Nation has the purchasing power of about $750 per capita. China has the purchasing power of $10 per capita, India of $35 per capita. By the way, I notice that this man Bata, who, in the shoe business in Czechoslovakia, is called the Henry Ford of that country, is now over in India teaching millions of those people to wear shoes, in order that he may turn out millions of additional shoes and afford employment to labor and capital in his country.

While we recently saw our great shoe industry in the United States, with a capacity of 850,000,000 pairs a year, and a domestic consumption of only about 300,000,000 pairs, instead of resolutely going out and securing markets for the surplus and giving employment to some of our seven or eight million unemployed, coming to the Capital when the Smoot-Hawley bill was pending and asking for tariffs which would permit it and encourage it, instead of seeking any further foreign trade to utilize the surplus production capacity for the benefit of labor, sitting down supinely behind this tariff wall, while over in little inferior countries like Czechoslovakia the manufacturers are going out among the 75 per cent of the people of the world who are living in poverty and teaching them to want more things to eat and to wear, and to buy them.

Mr. President, I have here a list showing the per capita purchasing power of each of the countries of the world, as best I have been able to get it, and I desire to insert that, with some similar figures, in the Record, without consuming the time of the Senate to read them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, notwithstanding the fact that, as stated, the Fordney Act was enacted primarily and professedly to prevent importations from countries with depreciated currencies, and most of those countries came back to the gold standard; notwithstanding the fact that the Smoot-Hawley Act has increased the rates of the Fordney Act to a surprising extent, we have the same influences coming here now seeking other increases of tariffs upon the theory that they are necessary to keep out imports from countries with depreciated currencies; and I am wondering when this practice of piling Pelion upon Ossa in the way of one layer of tariffs upon another will cease, when they will fail to find some pretext to call for still another increase.

The truth is that there has been virtually no change in the price level of England since she went off the gold standard, and yet the Senator from Pennsylvania came rushing in with resolutions for posthaste Tariff Commission investigations in order to keep the country from being overwhelmed by imaginary imports from England and a few other countries which have gone off the gold standard.

The fact is that so many countries went off with England, and have gone off since, including Japan, and so many countries have placed arbitrary restrictions on exchange and trading in commodities between nations, as to result in keeping prices down artificially, so that the price levels have not materially changed. Yet the commission must stop all the important business of ascertaining the causes of this panic and dealing with them, because, forsooth, some 125-year-old industry in this country which was asking for the same amount of tariffs a hundred years ago comes here and says that by some speculative possibility commodity prices in England or somewhere else might fluctuate and result in some few sporadic imports into this country.

I am not undertaking to minimize this tariff and trade phase of our economic situation. If I had my way, I would create an organization of broad-gauged people in this country who were not under the domination of the chief beneficiaries of these tariffs, but who would give them a square deal, as is often said, by careful and cautious revision downward. I would have them call an immediate halt to all these excesses which are going on, which have hopelessly strangled international trade, a volume of trade that to-day is $245,000,000,000 less than it would have been under the pre-war rate of increase, a volume of trade that is down to below the pitiable sum of $20,000,000,000. It has become a mere thread across the international boundaries of the nations of the world.

All the important countries are loaded down and glutted with surpluses which starving and freezing people in other countries can not get because the blind and the selfish and the rabid economic isolation policy has seen fit hopelessly to block, by dislocating the gold-standard situation, by embargoes and quotas, and by throttling the exchange situation. I would have those conditions liberalized, so that the peoples in every commercial country again could take heart and take hope and recover their confidence. Then we would see, as a second development, credit everywhere coming out from its hiding places, and that in turn would be followed by gradually increasing business activities, and labor once more could resume permanent employment.

I assert, Mr. President, with some degree of confidence, that the nearly 20,000,000 distressed unemployed wage earners of the world to-day will suffer on and on in increasing numbers until some semblance of economic order is brought out of this national and international chaos which exists, and which is utterly preventing capital or goods from being transferred from one country to another for any purpose except to a relatively slight extent.

Yet the American people are being seriously taught that if perchance we should buy something from some other country that we could buy even most profitably by exchanging a barrel of flour or an automobile or a ton of cement or a carload of wheat or other surpluses most damaging and burdensome to us, if somebody wanted to buy some Scotch tweed or other cloth from abroad and let it be balanced against our exports of these tremendously burdensome surpluses here at home—the cry goes up at once that America will be seriously injured, that some imports are coming in.

Mr. President, world trade does not mean that either side would displace any well-established business conditions of the other. It primarily means that a nation with sufficient productive capacity, in addition to mutually profitable exchanges of commodities with another, is willing to go out into the uttermost parts of the earth and locate and develop and establish on a constantly increasing scale markets which will absorb every kind and character of surplus it may be able to produce.

If I may refer to him without quoting him, I was talking with a very able man in this country, who was reared in a remote and very provincial community. He was preaching to me this doctrine of isolation in economics. His idea was that this country should restrict everything to our capacity to consume. His idea, too, was that instead of that old slogan to the farmers of "high tariffs and agricultural prosperity," we should substitute the slogan of "restriction of production or bankruptcy."

The theory was, as it has been published, that every farmer should plow up every third row of cotton and that every tenth cow should be killed. That is the same policy under which Brazil was to dump into the ocean 12,000,000 bags of surplus coffee, and it is said we should adopt it in this country as to every important line of industry, both manufacturing and agricultural.

I said to him that when he grew up back there among those humble people he might have said to them that he was reared among them, that he was one of them, and that he proposed to stay with them thoughout life, touching elbows and keeping step with them. "But," I said, " did not do that. If you had, you would have been sitting on some store front there stroking your long beard, calling to anybody who passed along that would listen to you." said, "You were gifted with a remarkable equipment, with immense ability, great vision, and constructive capacity on a magnificent scale. You moved out in front of those benighted neighbors of yours. You proceeded to travel on and on, far out of the sight of those people. You became a great citizen, a financial leader in the country, and you have accomplished wonderful service in advancing human progress in many important respects."

Then I said, "At the close of the World War your equipment over and above your old neighbors back home was not one-fifth as great proportionately as that of these United States in every essential respect over and above every other nation in the world to spread out, with its finance and its commerce, and make the great commercial countries and cities of the past look insignificant."

The world was helpless. It was at our feet. We were equipped with all the surplus materials, surplus manufacturing plants, and money and credit to improve it, and establish a greatly increasing volume of commerce in every part of the world. Instead of that we fell into the clutches of these blind and dumb economic isolationists who were preying upon the Government and the people. They have assumed to represent American business generally when they really have represented a very small but powerful segment of it. Instead of leading the Nation up to wonderful heights of human progress they have led us in the opposite direction, with the result that to-day the American people are fundamentally worse off in every essential respect than they were in 1920. These 10 or 12 precious years have been thrown away and here we are now at this belated stage confronted yet with the question of what shall be the permanent economic policy of this Nation in the light of its situation as a creditor and great surplus-producing country.

We are going backward under a policy, as I have indicated, of curtailing most of our farm production, most of our automobile and oil and copper and other production in every important line, down to our capacity to consume here at home, with such casual exports as may arise from some interchange of a few raw materials and certain foodstuffs. Under that policy we will pursue that course in the future, with frequently recurring panics, with not 6,000,000 but 10,000,000 of unemployed in the next great catastrophe that comes upon us, with no hope of continuing as a first-class financial and commercial country, but gradually surrendering our leadership and our control to any second or third rate nation that may come along and will take charge of world commerce and world civilization that is interwoven with it, while we proceed to stagnate and to slip and slide backwards industrially, financially, and I would be afraid, in many other respects pertaining to the better phases of civilization.

Under such a policy we are going to pursue that course with every country in the world following our leadership as they are now, every nation attempting with one hand to push on the other its surplus production and at the same time to push back the exports of the other country with the other hand, so that there would be no semblance of international intercourse in the sense that employment of labor and capital may be brought about in full measure, in the sense that the gold standard would again be administered in some intelligent and practical way by a country capable of administering it, and in the sense that natural and normal trade relations between all the nations of the earth might once more be resumed, relations that mean everything in the promotion of a higher state of civilization.

I profoundly believe that the patent economic conditions of this country strongly suggest that the people of this and other nations will suffer on and on until and unless there is an awakening and we check this constant increase of restrictions and barriers of international finance and commerce, and face in the opposite direction, until we gradually reach a level of moderation as to tariffs and a liberalized policy of trading that will once again bring about a state and feeling of fairness and of friendship among the nations of the world.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, because of its important bearing on one feature of the substitute of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison], I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, following the eloquent address of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Hull], an article on Tariff Reciprocity Through International Agreements, prepared by a writer using the pen name of "Democritus." It particu-It particularly discusses the most-favored-nation clause in existing treaties of the United States with other countries. It was written by a lawyer and economist of ability who, because of obligations resting upon him in certain public relations, does not desire his name published in connection with the article. I may say that his excuse, though regrettable, is justified, and that he is unusually competent to speak on the subject under discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is go ordered.

The article is as follows:

TARIFF RECIPROCITY THROUGH INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

The last paragraph of the bill to amend the tariff act of 1930 (H. R. 6662), as introduced by Mr. Collies on January 4, 1932, but omitted from the bill as passed by the House of Representatives five days later, requests the President "to negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual trade concessions." At the hearings on January 7 before the Committee on Ways and Means doubt was expressed as to the compatibility of such a program with the existing obligations of the patibility of such a program with the existing obligations of the United States to countries with which this country is party to treaties containing the most-favored-nation clause. Indeed, it was suggested that such treaties had "nailed down the lid" upon any policy of reciprocity and left the United States "perfectly powerless to negotiate reciprocal treaties."

The attitude of despair indicated by these words is happily unwarranted. Equality of treatment—the objective of the most-favored-nation clause—and reduction of duties—the objective of reciprocity agreements—are twin policies, alike admirable, entirely consistent with each other and particularly adapted to the immediate needs of the United States. The request to the President contained in the last paragraph of Mr. Collier's bill presents, indeed, an admirable opportunity for an enlightened and effective indeed, an admirable opportunity for an enlightened and effective commercial policy, provided—

(1) That the people of the United States have made up their minds that there shall be a substantial revision of their tariff ownward.

(2) That Congress intends the term "trade agreements" to be aderstood in its literal sense and not to imply "treatles" within (2) That Congress intends the term "trade agreements" to be understood in its literal sense and not to imply "treatles" within the requirements of the Constitution governing ratifications; and finally, and by no means of least importance

(3) That the principle of reciprocity within the most-favored-nation clause be maintained.

REVISION DOWNWARD

If language similar to that of the original bill should, as predicted by some, be restored in the Senate, and if the bill should become law, the President would be not only requested but authorized to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with the governments ized to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with the governments of other countries for mutual trade concessions. The chief virtue of such a program is that it seeks world revision downward, not merely American revision downward. From the point of view of the United States this method is doubly advantageous; it provides a method of eliminating the superprotectionism that has so adversely affected American trade; and, while seeking moderation at home, it seeks similar moderation everywhere, to the benefit of all concerned. Tariff moderation, while necessary for the public welfare, is designed primarily to favor the exporter. Obviously the seller of goods to purchasers in other countries will derive no great benefit if international commerce is confronted there with insuperable import tariffs. Like military and naval armament, the sener or goods to purchasers in other countries will derive no great benefit if international commerce is confronted there with insuperable import tariffs. Like military and naval armament, the armament of nationalistic protectionism presents a problem not to be settled without the aid and cooperation of other countries, a fact strikingly recognized in the provision of the bill under consideration, which invites the President to initiate a movement for an international economic conference with a view, among other things, to "lowering excessive tariff duties." "We can no longer legislate, but most negotiate" in tariff matters, a leading business man is reported to have said in a recent address.

Nevertheless, a policy of downward revision through a series of international agreements is not suited for all situations. It must have back of it a popular demand that is consistent and genuine and powerful enough to overcome the opposition of particular interests which, quite regardless of the national welfare, are certain to oppose the reduction of any given rate. Otherwise every agreement with another country would be blocked by the protectionistic stirrings of producers of goods affected by its own special provisions. Revision downward by negotiation requires at least as firm a supporting public opinion as does such revision by legislative enactment. Its success probably requires even stronger popular support. popular support.

Moreover, the method of revision by negotiation is not suited to become a permanent policy unless it entirely supersedes the legislative method of tariff enactment. If legislation continued, rates would inevitably be pushed up for bargaining purposes. Since the negotiations for bringing them down would not always be successful, the result in the long run might be upward, not downward, revision.

At the present time in the United States the tariff wall already scrapes the sky, and the people apparently are in earnest about reduction. The same situation seems to exist in many other countries, and there is evidence that leadership from any powerful government could successfully accomplish its aim of all-around "concessions." Even in cases where new duties are just being imposed there is reason to believe they might be repealed if other countries would take reciprocal measures.

For carrying on perotiations, a group of carefully chosen spe-if other countries would take reciprocal measures.

For carrying on negotiations, a group of carefully chosen specialists should be assembled. Their first duty would be to map out a comprehensive plan for agreements with all important countries. In so far as possible, each separate agreement should be negotiated with a view to having it play its part in an orderly system of American tariff reduction, while also functioning to obtain in other countries reductions calculated to effect a maximum stimulation to trade. Through this process a well-balanced and general lowering of the tariff of the United States could in all probability be consummated. Should the result prove to be otherwise, the situation could be remedied by subsequent legislation. lation.

ACTION BY EXECUTIVE AGREEMENT

The Collier tariff bill, as already observed, authorized the President to negotiate "reciprocal trade agreements." The word "agreement" is commonly used to refer to international arrangements entered into by the President with the specific or tacit authorization of Congress. They are not considered to be treaties and are signed and put in operation without being referred to the Senate or the Congre

Thus, by section 3 of the tariff act of 1897, the President was "authorized," with a view to "reciprocal and equivalent concessions" to enter into "commercial agreements" with other countries reducing duties on certain specified articles. A considerable number of such agreements were entered into by the President and made effective by his proclamation.

and made effective by his proclamation.

By section 4 of the same act, provision was made for the negotiation by the President of commercial "treaties" for reciprocal reduction of duties, within specified limitations. They were to be entered into subject to the approval of Congress and also the advice and consent of the Senate. Many were negotiated; not one was ever approved or consented to.

This result was to be expected. The lesson is obvious. Appro-

This result was to be expected. The lesson is obvious. Appropriate and correct procedure calls for the fixation of policy by Congress and its execution by the President. The policy having been declared, Congress should not be burdened with the consideration of every individual agreement. So long as the Executive stays within the authority granted by Congress, its will prevails. Any abuse of authority can be speedily rectified by subsequent legislation. The language of the Collier bill indicates that it was designed to follow the first of the precedents cited above. The authority granted is, moreover, large and general. This is the wise course; it spells success, just as any other method of procedure would spell failure. cedure would spell failure.

The Congress, should it desire to retain a measure of safeguard, might provide that the agreements should, for a brief period, be subject to congressional veto. When the period expired, they would, unless adversely acted upon, go into effect. Thus all of the force of inertia would lie on the side of letting the agreements stand, whereas positive congressional approval would have to run the gantlet of inertia as well as opposition. Moreover, while broad and ample authority is in every way desirable, the virtually unlimited authority of the Collier bill should, lest there be attempted an unconstitutional delegation of power, give way to definitely prescribed, but very generous, limitations within which presidential rate making through international agreement may proceed.

EQUALITY AND RECIPEOCITY

It is neither necessary nor desirable to depart from the traditional practice of tariff equality in order to promote a policy of tariff revision downward by international reciprocity agreements. Treaty obligations and considerations of sound policy alike forbid such course.

bid such course.

Equality of treatment has been the almost invariable practice of the United States from the beginning. The preamble of the first American commercial treaty, that of 1778 with France, refers to "the most perfect equality and reciprocity" as its guiding principle. Washington, in his Farewell Address, commended a commercial policy that should "hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences."

With very few exceptions, indeed, and these largely for political author than economic nurroses. American statesmapship has found rather than economic purposes, American statesmanship has found the foregoing precedents worthy of emulation. Careful investi-gation by the Tariff Commission has found the exceptions to be attended by only the most meager economic advantage.

Tariff rates that are equally applicable to similar products from whatever country they are imported are administratively advisable—consider the burden upon the customs authorities that would result from different rates upon the same kind of article determined by whether the shipment came from country A, B, C, D, or what not! Equality, however, is of primary concern to exporters, because it enables a government to obtain similar equality, similar freedom from discrimination in other countries. equality, similar freedom from discrimination in other countries. Like tariff moderation, also, it redounds to the general advantage. It is the basis of the good will and friendly relations that spring from fairness and impartiality in a country's dealings with other countries. It is aimed against precisely those "discriminatory" trade practices which the pending tariff bill seeks to eliminate by means of its proposed international economic conference.

means of its proposed international economic conference.

Reciprocity, the reduction by international agreement of import duties on named articles in return for reductions deemed to be of equivalent commercial advantage, connotes, as already pointed out, a policy of careful bargaining with other countries. Each country promises to lower its duties on named products of the other. It may, of course, promise also that these lower duties shall not be applied to similar goods from third countries. But ordinarily it does not do so and is not expected to do so.

Thus in 1927 Germany, which by the treaty of 1923 is obligated

Thus, in 1927, Germany, which by the treaty of 1923 is obligated to accord most-favored-nation treatment to the United States, entered into a very important reciprocity treaty with France. German duties applicable to numerous French goods were reduced. The reduced duties were immediately made applicable to similar goods if and when imported from the United States. But the reductions were of less advantage to American exporters than to French exporters because the treaty dealt with the special needs of Franco-German commerce, not with the needs, different in character, of German-American commerce. The treaty with France also contains the most-favored-nation clause. Should Germany and the United States conclude a reciprocity treaty, Germany would extend to French goods the reduced duties accorded to goods from the United States, but the treaty would not be likely to result in advantage to French commerce comparable with its advantage to American commerce.

For generations reciprocity treatles within the most-favored-nation principle have been the characteristic feature of the com-mercial policies of some of the most important countries. Nearly all countries make the most-favored-nation clause the basis of all countries make the most-favored-nation clause the basis of their ordinary commercial dealings with other countries. The trade of one country with others differs in each particular case. Reduced duties on one article may interest one or more countries and be of no interest to the rest. Moreover, under the world's treaty system, equality is generally sought and advocated and generally exists and has long existed. There is little evidence that its discontinuance in favor of special and exclusive treaties is widely desired. The object of reciprocity treaties or agreements is, as a rule, not preferential treatment so much as lower duties. If the duties are lowered, the main collective is obtained. The If the duties are lowered, the main objective is obtained. The fact that they are lowered to all countries should not and usually does not interfere with the bargain. Discriminations and preferences are breeders of discords and are wholly undesirable in commercial policy.

Accordingly, reciprocity agreements, as apparently contemplated by the Collier bill, are not antagonistic to but rest squarely upon the principle of most-favored-nation treatment, which is the the principle of most-favored-nation treatment, which is the foundation of American commercial policy. So considered, the proposed new policy is a natural development of the old, making it positive and adapting it to the needs of the moment, without impairing its fundamental purpose of preserving equal rights for all and special privileges for none. Reciprocity agreements which would violate the equality of treatment principle present no perceptible advantage as compared with those which would not violate it. They present many comparative disadvantages. It is to be presumed that the bill was intended to institute action consistent with the most-favored-nation treaty obligations of the United States. If there is any doubt, the language deleted by the Ways and Means Committee should be clarified, as well as restored by the Senate.

If the experiment of reciprocity agreements within the most-

If the experiment of reciprocity agreements within the mostfavored-nation clause works successfully, the agreements may some day be rewritten as treaties. At all events, such agreements would be the best means of building toward an international economic conference that could produce results.

ADMINISTRATION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the 9th of this month I presented to the Senate a petition signed by a large number of Indians, as well as by a number of white persons, dealing with the Indian situation and the administration of Indian affairs by the Bureau of Indian Affairs. A number of Indians since then have signified their approval of the petition and, as I am advised, have signed the same. I ask that their names be printed in the RECORD without reading. In addition, there are a number of white persons who have also signed the petition. I ask that the names referred to may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The names are as follows:

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) took a recess until Monday, March 28, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 24, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

This day, our Heavenly Father, bring every Member of this Congress into an experience of that knowledge, understanding, and judgment heretofore unknown. O do Thou support us with the opulence, with the might and the blessedness of a living faith. Lighten the burden that weighs down, that irritates, and drives to discouragement. Make us conscious of that power that can lift up and lead us in the way of a wise success. Most graciously be with our President and Speaker and all others who have been placed in authority over us. The blessed Lord God mercifully regard our country, the land that has filled so many great and profound souls with rapture and for the centuries past has been the asylum for earth's oppressed. Inspire us all to labor and to toil for its greatest good while the groaning, sweating, bleeding aspects of human life are passing by. In Thy holy name we ask mercy and the forgiveness of our sins. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion may I ask the gentleman from Georgia as to the advisability of attempting to secure unanimous consent so that after the amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Georgia, is disposed of-against which, I believe, there is no opposition—we could have a vote on the Doughton amendment, and for this reason: If the Doughton amendment is approved, it would avoid an epidemic of amendments to create further exemptions under the manufacturers' excise tax. If the Doughton amendment is not approved, then, of course, Members would be advised either to favor or oppose further exemptions. I suggest that the real test of this whole matter is on the Doughton amendment, and if the gentleman from Georgia would ask unanimous consent that we dispose of the existing amendment and then take up the Doughton amendment, I think that would save hours and hours of discussion.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, answering the gentleman from Georgia, I am just as anxious to bring this matter to a final show-down as any Member of the House, but I do think that any Member who has an amendment to offer providing for further exemptions should be given that opportunity before a vote is taken on the Doughton amendment.

I appreciate thoroughly the motive of the gentleman from New York, and I am in sympathy with it; but it seems to me that if the House desires to expedite the matter and bring the issue to a vote, it could vote on the amendment I have proposed for the committee and then let any other gentlemen who have amendments offer them. While I have no disposition to curtail their debate, I believe these gentlemen in a few minutes could express the reasons why they were offering those amendments. Then when those amendments have been disposed of I would be perfectly delighted if the House would agree to let the final test come on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina IMr. DOUGHTON] to strike out that paragraph, and personally I will agree that that shall be the test, and that if it prevails, all of the other manufacturers' tax titles or sections be eliminated from the bill.

However, there are three or four matters in this manufacturers' title that are not per se the sales tax. For instance, the tax on oil. There is a tax on imports of gasoline and oil, as well as a tax on lubricating oil. There is a tax on wort; there is a tax on malt; and there is a tax on grape concentrates. Therefore, I do not think that if we should have an agreement to permit the vote on the Doughton amendment to be the test as to the manufacturers' tax it would strike out the items I have named. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen] has an amendment which he wishes to offer levying a tax on beer. Personally, I think it would be in order; but that amendment would not come up until after you had disposed of these matters in connection with the sales tax, and then when we reach that part of the bill my friend's amendment could be offered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am very glad to hear the gentleman's statement as to the rights of those with amendments. I desire to call attention to the fact that by unanimous consent the House agreed to dispense with the reading of certain parts of the bill and take up two particular sections. This leads to a bit of uncertainty. At the right place in the bill, at the right time, I desire to offer two amendments, one of which proposes to place at least a 100 per cent sales tax on any goods made in whole or in part by the type of forced labor prevailing in Russia, where no one is supposed to be unemployed and few paid, and I would like time to explain that amendment. Second, an amendment in the nature of a tax for the purpose of equalizing the depreciated currencles of countries in other parts of the world. I am dependent upon the chairman to assist me in an arrangement by which I will not be foreclosed from offering these amendments at the right place.

Mr. CRISP. Of course, I do not agree to support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, I do not ask that. The distinguished chairman must stand by his bill, but he can help others to help in this important amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Nor do I concede that the gentleman's amendments would be germane to the bill, but the place where they should be offered would be after the vote on that part of the bill placing a tax on oil, gasoline, and so forth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Exactly.

Mr. CRISP. And the suggestion I have made in no wise deprives the gentleman of any of his rights in that respect.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. As a matter of fact, would not all these amendments be germane to a subsequent provision of the bill to that covered by the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. CRISP. I think they would be, but I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that here is the trouble about that. Undoubtedly they would be in order there, but the unanimous-consent agreement we were trying to reach was to act on those amendments with respect to the first section, and then let the vote on striking out the first section be the final and complete test.

Mr. RANKIN. That was not the request, as I understood it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, if they are asking unanimous consent to do that, I shall object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will yield, my suggestion was this: There was an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Georgia and there is an amendment to that amendment pending, and my suggestion was that we dispose of that amendment and then the committee amendment. The next step would be the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Dough-TON]. If that is approved, all the other amendments would not be necessary. Therefore I thought we would save time if, after disposing of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, against which there is no opposition that I know of, we would take a vote on the Doughton amend-

Mr. CRISP. I am perfectly agreeable to that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Some Members may be in the same position I am and may desire to offer an amendment to the gentleman's amendment. For instance, I desire to offer an amendment to the gentleman's amendment with respect to malt sirup, and if this agreement were entered into, disposing of the committee amendment, that might preclude my amendment.

Mr. CRISP. It would not in any wise interfere with that. Mr. O'CONNOR. The logical and appropriate way would be to offer the amendment to the gentleman's amendment. For instance, in the exemptions which the gentleman has proposed to add to the bill, I understand there is included malt sirup used by bakers.

Mr. CRISP. That is correct.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I wish to offer an amendment exempting malt sirup used in the making of malted milk.

Mr. CRISP. I think that would be perfectly in order as an amendment to the amendment when the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Lehlbach] is either voted up or down. The gentleman from New Jersey has an amendment to the committee amendment pending, and when that is voted up or down, I think the gentleman's amendment would be in order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Am I to understand that the gentleman considers that the tax on oil is not a part of the sales tax, and even though the sales tax were stricken out, the tax on oil would still remain?

Mr. CRISP. I may say to my friend that this agreement in no wise intereferes with that. The committee would have a separate chance to vote on whether it is going to eliminate the oil tax or not.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Even though the sales tax per se were eliminated?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me that in the interest of orderly procedure we should start this morning just exactly as we would proceed if we had read the bill up to Title IV, and I would not want to agree to any unanimous-consent request to do anything different.

Mr. CRISP. Well, that settles it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about the parliamentary situation, the Chair will direct the Clerk to report, first, the pending committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP; next the pending amendment to the committee amendment, offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. LEHLBACH; and after that the motion filed by the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. DOUGHTON.

The Clerk again reported the Crisp amendment, as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. CRISP: On page 225, after line 13, insert the following new paragraphs:

"(1) Sales of food for human consumption (including those grades and forms of articles chiefly used as food for human consumption in the form in which sold or after processing or as material for such food; but not including any article enumerated in subsection (d)).

"(2) Sales of wearing apparel for any part of the body.

"(3) Sales of agricultural implements and machinery.

"(4) Sales of medicines.
"(5) Sales of insecticides, fungicides, and herbicides, if chiefly for agricultural purposes.

"(6) Sales of malt sirup, in containers containing not less than 50 pounds each, to a baker for use in the making of bread."

Mr. ABERNETHY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chair-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I have just come into the Hall, and there has been so much confusion I have not understood what was going on. I would like to know what is before the House so that I can vote intelligently.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has directed the Clerk to read the parliamentary situation. He has read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia and was about to read the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by adding just preceding the amendment "sales of," in order to make it conform with the language of the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey: At the beginning, insert the words "sales of," so that the amendment will read "Sales of merchant vessels constructed in American shipyards under the provisions of the merchant marine act of and 1928, as amended, and all material, equipment, furnishings therefor, for which the Government has agreed to loan more than 50 per cent of the cost."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Dough-TON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Doughton: Page 225, strike out paragraph (a), beginning with line 8, on page 225, down to and including line 6, on page 226.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that on Tuesday the gentleman from New Jersey was recognized formally to offer an amendment and that amendment is pending.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I thought the gentleman from New Jersey might yield, as my amendment would take precedence. Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. When will it be in order for me to offer a perfecting amendment to the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this stage, not until the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey is disposed of.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the committee will give its consideration to the pending amendment on its merits, regardless of their views on the subject of manufacturers' sales tax generally.

The manufacturers' sales tax as it is written, applies to merchant vessels.

Immediately at the conclusion of the war, and for the 13 years succeeding, the American Government has expended hundreds of millions of dollars to establish and maintain and develop a merchant marine. To that end it has established certain necessary trade routes, has established steamship lines and operated those lines, even by the Government itself.

From time to time it has sold these lines under contract with the purchasers that they must maintain these trade routes.

In order that this may be done, the Congress in 1928, supplementing the merchant marine act of 1920, provided for the awarding of certain mail contracts. In the administration of the mail-contract policy the money paid out for mail contracts was largely earmarked for new construction, because unless replacements are continually made, the merchant marine will become obsolete, because the life of a ship is only 20 years.

In addition to these mail contracts, the money from which is paid in new construction, the Government, out of the construction loan fund, lends for new construction three-quarters of the cost of the ship, at a rate of interest no greater than that paid by the Government for the use of money.

By this means we have at the present time various ships in the course of construction, and will continue to construct new ships to replace those falling into disuse by reason of superannuation. To make this tax applicable to these ships built under the policy of the Government with the money of the Government, would simply be to knock into a cocked hat the entire merchant-marine policy. It was not within the contemplation of anybody when a manufacturers' sales tax was proposed that it should apply to a merchant vessel any more than to an office building. The amendment is reasonable and fair, and simply protects the Government itself in one of its major enterprises.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I shall take very little time of the committee. First, let me ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Lehlbach] if his amendment covers only sales of ships, or if it covers also the manufacture of ships?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It does. It covers the tax that might otherwise be placed on these ships, and it only covers the tax on ships constructed in our own yards pursuant to the policy laid down in the merchant marine acts of 1920 and 1928, and only where the major part of the money is furnished by the Government.

Mr. BLAND. The result of the tax would be, as the gentleman from New Jersey has pointed out, that the Government in large part would be taking money out of one pocket and transferring it to another pocket. To that extent it might seem unobjectionable, but, nevertheless, there is a serious objection to that tax. We are trying to build up a merchant marine. The purpose of the 1928 act was to build up a merchant marine. The necessity for a merchant marine is to enable the country to be placed in a position of defense, and, in addition to placing the country in a position of defense, to enable the farmers, the agricultural interests, the manufacturing interests, merchants, and other interests to have a domestic carrier for domestic products, and thus help in promoting our foreign business.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should the shipyards of the country that are already receiving a bounty from the Government receive any further bounty as contradistinguished from the manufacturers of locomotives or other lines?

Mr. BLAND. I can not see that there would be a bounty to a shipyard. The money would come out of the shipowner. However, it would materially interfere with the construction of ships so necessary to the defense of the country and for the promotion of our foreign commerce.

Mr. RANKIN. I suggest that the gentleman wait until we vote on the Doughton amendment, and when we adopt that, that will exempt them all.

Mr. BLAND. That may be true, but at the same time there is always the danger of nonadoption. It would seem to be necessary in the development of this particular interest that is so materially for the protection of our country and the protection of our commerce that the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey should prevail.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not a fact that the Government is practically a 75 per cent owner in all such ships that to-day fly the American flag?

Mr. BLAND. Seventy-five per cent of the cost is contributed by the Government, which is to be repaid to the Government.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman from Illinois says the Government is a 75 per cent owner. He should say that it is a 75 per cent donor.

Mr. BLAND. I should say lender rather than donor.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Lehlbach) there were—ayes 130, noes 110.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. Lehlbach and Mr. Stafford to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 149, noes 145.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR to the Crisp amendment: After the word "bread," which is the line in the Crisp amendment, insert "and malt sirups sold and used for the manufacture of malted milk or other medicinal products."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, while malted milk is exempt and medicines are exempt, the committee amendment added an exemption for malt sirup in the making of bread. Malted milk is more of a medicine than a beverage. I also understand that in the hospitals throughout the country a lot of malt sirups are used in the making of medicinal preparations.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from New York. We intended to exempt all those malt sirups.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

might seem unobjectionable, but, nevertheless, there is a serious objection to that tax. We are trying to build up a merchant marine. The purpose of the 1928 act was to build lowing as paragraph (6) of the Crisp amendment add the following as paragraph (7):

"Sales by licensed manufacturers of gases, electricity, or power to be used in production of agriculture crops, and the preparation of seed crops for marketing purposes."

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the only purpose of this amendment is to exempt power used in the production of agriculture. It is a matter to which I called the attention of the chairman a few days ago. At that time the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] said that he thought there was some merit in it, or words to that effect. Here is the situation that I am trying to reach.

In my district there is one of the largest rice fields in the United States. It is in a prairie country. It takes hundreds of pumps to pump the water to overflow the lands or cover the lands so that rice will grow. There are hundreds and hundreds of acres of it. That has to be produced by electric pumps pumping the water to cover the land.

I have a telegram from those people growing rice saying that this tax would possibly put them out of that production. The purpose of this bill all the way through has been to exempt agriculture. The amendment I have offered goes farther than that, and would exempt the gins that are ginning cotton. Every southern man who has a cotton gin in his district ought to be in favor of this amendment.

Why do we want to penalize the man who grows cotton or rice, or the man who grows other agricultural products? All in the world this does is to exempt that part of this power, either gas or electricity, that is used for that purpose. This amendment would also affect the dairying interests, where electric milkers are used. They would be exempted from this tax. I am sure many of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means will be favorable to this, and I can not see why this amendment should not be accepted by the committee.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was very kind in his statement about it the other day, and I am sure he feels it is a worthy amendment. If it were not so, I would not offer it, but this is something that should be exempted. If this bill passes, it is an exception that ought to be put into the bill, and this is the proper place to put it in.

I hope that every man who is interested in agriculture will vote for this amendment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Unless this does pass, it means that practically every bale of cotton will be taxed from 50 to 80 cents a bale?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes.
Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GLOVER. I yield to the gentleman.
Mr. RANKIN. It would not after we adopt the Doughton

Mr. GLOVER. Well, it would not hurt that. I am for the Doughton amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. I will state that I did call this up before the committee, but in the multitudinous things before the committee, no final decision was reached. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to it.

Mr. GLOVER. I thank the gentleman, and I hope the amendment offered by me will be adopted.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from California that an amendment of that sort would not be in order. It would be an amendment in the third degree. We are now considering a committee amendment, and there has been an amendment offered to the committee amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. It would not be in order as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will permit, there are four motions that might be entertained at any time, namely, an amendment, an amendment to that amendment, a substitute, and an amendment to the substitute. As I understand the proposal of the gentleman from California, he offered his amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas. I do not say that it is a substitute; but if it is offered as a substitute, it is in order and is not within the restricted class of being within the third degree

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from California that as the amendment is offered, it is offered to the Crisp amendment. There is already one amendment pending.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then it is an amendment in the third

Mr. BARBOUR. I would like to state that I am offering it as a substitute, but to be added to the Crisp amendment in the event it is passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer it after the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas IMr. GLOVER] is disposed of.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GLOVER) there were ayes 126 and noes 110.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Barbour: Add as a new paragraph to the Crisp amendment the words "electrical power or energy."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee has acted wisely in accepting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER], because electricity used on the ranches is just as necessary in the operation of a farm or ranch and in the production of a crop thereon as is fertilizer or farm implements or feed for livestock, or any of the other things that have been exempted in the bill or in the Crisp amendment. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas is entirely consistent with the position of the committee in regard to the other exemptions, so far as agriculture is concerned.

My amendment will go farther. It will exempt all electricity. Electricity is one of the most necessary things and is used in practically all of the homes of this country. In the country, in the villages, and in the cities we all use electricity. The rich use it and the poor use it, and if we tax electricity that is used in the homes, we are placing a tax on the very people we are trying to exempt in the Crisp amendment by exempting the necessaries of life.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. DYER. If we exempt everything that pertains to agriculture, as we are starting to do, where will we get any money to balance the Budget?

Mr. BARBOUR. This does not exempt everything. It exempts electricity. The committee has adopted a policy, which is evidenced by the Crisp amendment, of exempting the necessaries of life, and I submit this amendment to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in line with the policy of the Crisp amendment, because it exempts another necessary-electricity-which, to my mind, is just as essential in our daily life and just as necessary as clothing or food.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Can the gentleman tell us how much this would mean in reduced revenue?

Mr. BARBOUR. I can not say. I have not those figures. Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understand that the gentleman's amendment exempts all the electricity used in the homes of the people who are out of work?

Mr. BARBOUR. All electricity. In addition to that, I may say that in this country there are many small electric railroad lines that to-day are operating at a loss. They are rendering a real service to the people of this country and are doing so at a loss. If they are taxed under this bill, it would simply add to their operating loss.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman's amendment sufficiently broad to cover cities as well.

Mr. BARBOUR. Everything. It exempts all electrical power or energy.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. In view of the action taken by the committee on the previous amendment, it would seem to me there could be no argument against this amendment.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. The gentleman's statement is correct regarding interurban lines. It is also true regarding mines. Our mines are shut down because they can not keep up expenses, and many of them get their power from electrical

Mr. BARBOUR. Electricity is one of the very necessary things that we use in the home and in practically every activity of our daily life.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield,

Mr. MOUSER. Why does not the gentleman include natural gas?

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman can offer an amendment to that effect. I did not want to try to cover too much ground, but rather to confine my amendment to the one thing-electricity.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Does it not include all use of power?

Mr. BARBOUR. All use of power; yes. That is what I am aiming at.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. If it is adopted, you will lose in revenue $12,000,000. With the exemptions that have already been proposed, practically all of the necessities of life are exempt. All food and all material that goes into the making of human food is exempt. All wearing apparel is exempt. However, under the bill the material that goes into the manufacture of wearing apparel is subject to the 21/4 per cent tax. But, gentlemen, with the exemptions that have been proposed by the committee, the tax will practically apply to basic industries, and as it is reported by the committee, with the committee amendment engrafted into it, it will raise from $450,000,000 to $460,000,000.

Now, this tax on electricity is not burdensome. I regret we have to tax anything. This tax is based on the manufacturers' wholesale cost at the switch-not covering the service and sales agencies-and it is 21/4 per cent on the wholesale manufacturers' price. The average wholesale manufacturers' price of electrical energy at the switch is about half a cent a kilowatt-hour. This tax is not levied on the retail price but on the wholesale price.

There is no need of my discussing it further. I have presented the facts to you, and I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. As I understand the amendmentand I want to see if I am correct—this would exempt all electricity used domestically, agriculturally, and industrially?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Altogether?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. ESTEP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes. Mr. ESTEP. The gentleman stated that if this amendment were adopted it would take about $12,000,000 out of the proposed increase in taxes?

Mr. CRISP. That is what the expert tells me. Mr. ESTEP. Can the gentleman tell us how much the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas will cost?

Mr. CRISP. It is estimated to be about $500,000.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether Canada taxes electrical power?

Mr. CRISP. I will answer the gentleman candidly by say ing I do not know. I did not go to Canada this fall with the Hearst party, so I can not answer that question.

Mr. GIFFORD. May I read one sentence from the report?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD (reading):

Electric power is of such great use in our manufacturing indus which we wish to encourage, that we are not directly taxing it.

I wonder if anybody could inform us whether, if they do not tax it directly, they are indirectly taxing it?

Mr. CRISP. I would answer my friend if I could, but I will not make any statement that I do not know to be accurate. I will not give any misinformation.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. YON. In one community in my district the city is furnished with electricity by a power company under contract. Where would the tax be collected in that instance?

Mr. CRISP. Under the law, where a city performs strictly a governmental function, it is exempt from this tax. Therefore, if the city were operating a municipal electric plant or gas plant, the power or the gas which the city itself consumes would not be subject to the tax, but the gas or electricity which the city sold to private individuals is not strictly a governmental business and the tax would apply in such a case.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, there is no tax on electricity in Canada. The Government has a monopoly on the production of electricity, almost a complete monopoly, and the Government does not tax itself. There is no tax in Canada.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Barbour) there were—ayes 54, noes 153.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Burtness: In paragraph 3 of the committee amendment, after the word "machinery," insert a comma and the following: "including parts thereof; harness and

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment. In the amendment exempting farm machinery was it not the intent of the committee that parts for such machinery were also to be exempted?

Mr. CRISP. It was not, I will say to my friend. The committee felt as if they could not continue to broaden the exemptions and get anything at all from the tax, and the committee felt, and I feel now, that if anyone will consider this bill in its entirety he will see that the farmers have been given every possible consideration.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I have talked with a number of members of the committee with reference to this matter, and most of them told me that they believed that parts of machinery were to be exempted and that the whole would include the elements thereof. I recognize the answer given by the chairman of the committee as being a frank statement of his view of the matter, and, of course, it confirms the doubts I entertained as to the construction that would be placed thereon and what I perceive as the need of adopting my amendment.

The amendment which I am proposing is really two amendments, but I have offered them together in order to I shall ask unanimous consent to have the amendment divided when the vote is taken.

To start with, the first proposal is one of exempting parts of machinery, and I may say to the members of the committee that if they are going to give any particular benefit by this exemption to the farmers of the country during the next two years it is far more necessary to exempt parts of farm machinery from the tax than it is to exempt new machines, for the farmers of the country, at least in our section, are not going to be buying much new machinery but a great many new parts with which to repair old machinery.

A tax upon the repairs needed for a binder or a mower or any other necessary farm implement is a tax almost upon misfortune, and I hope there will be practically no votes against that portion of the amendment which will exempt from the manufacturers' tax the parts that go into farm machinery; the parts that will have to be purchased by all farmers of this country during the next few years and until there is enough restoration of prosperity so that they can afford to buy new machinery. Such parts are very expensive, anyway, and the farmers can not and should not pay a dollar, a nickel, or a penny more for them. Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. No; I can not yield. I do not want to ask for an extension of time, hence must decline to do so.

The second portion of the amendment simply exempts harness and harness hardware. As stated, I will ask that the two propositions be voted on separately, so that the Members may pass upon the merits of each independently.

The same principle which applies to the exemption of farm implements and farm machinery, of course, applies to harness, but in this connection there is even an additional reason. One of the most important things in the restoration of agriculture, it seems to me, in the next few years is to try to get away from vast mass production on the farms through the use of expensive tractors and power equipment. It would be a wonderful thing for all the people of the country if the farmers could get back to the more general use of horses for their motive power. [Applause.]

Let us not put a burden, then, upon the individual farmer who wants to again start using horses in the place of tractors and who has to buy harness in order to do so, but let us in this bill to a slight extent encourage such a change and exempt that portion of the farmer's cost of production represented by the purchase of harness and harness hardware, for, of course, the expenditures therein affect directly the farmer's cost of production, which in turn may affect the price of the crop or product raised to the consumers when they buy it.

I submit the amendments for your consideration with confidence that you will find them meritorious. While I appreciate the consideration given agriculture in this bill, you can not do too much for it, as there is no class in the country in as desperate straits as are the farmers. Remember, too, that whatever is done for them to reestablish their purchasing power will be helpful to all other classes in our population.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be divided, so that the question of exemption as to parts of machinery may be put separately and then the rest of the language voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment contains more than one substantive proposition. The Clerk will report the first part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In paragraph 3 of the committee amendment, after the word machinery," insert a comma and the following: "including parts thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first part of the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the committee divided, and there were-ayes 94, noes 74.

So the first part of the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the remainder of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In paragraph 3 of the committee amendment, after the word "machinery," insert a comma and the following: "harness and harness hardware."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRISP) there were-ayes 62, noes 81.

So the second part of the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the committee amendment offered by Mr. Crisp by adding a new subsection, as follows:

"8. Sales of crates, baskets, boxes, bags used for the handling, packing, or shipping of fruit and vegetables."

Mr. CRISP. We have no objection to that amendment. Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end the following new paragraph:
"7. Sales of articles to be used as containers of any kind for fruit and vegetables in any form."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that this is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. GREEN. This amendment is broader than that offered by the gentleman from Georgia. I was wondering how it can be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be offered as a new paragraph after the other amendment is disposed of. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. GREEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the committee amendment: Insert at the end the following new paragraph:
"Such sales of articles to be used as containers of any kind for fruit or vegetables in any form.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is important. It goes farther than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia. It would exempt any kind of containers used for fruits or vegetables of any kind or any container in any form. In other words, the canning industry of the country is canning the surplus of our vegetables and fruits. This would exempt the container of those goods, as well as barrels and baskets and hampers used for shipping.

Of course, I favored the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox]. In fact, it is in part the amendment I am now offering. The fruit and vegetable growers and shippers favor the amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to oppose this amendment. It will lose us $4,000,000. It will affect the canning of any kind of food products, meat, vegetables, or anything else. The food in them and all parts of the food are exempt. I am willing for the adoption of amendments that will aid in carrying out the full scheme of the bill to exempt the farmers, but when you go as far as this you are exempting the big tinning plants, the mills that make the tin, and this bill will not produce anywhere like the adequate revenue, even if the House adopts it. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. HARE. As I understand, the Cox amendment takes care of baskets and hampers for shipping fruits and vegetables.

Mr. CRISP. It does, and I said that I had no objection to it.

Mr. BLAND. Does it exempt fish products, containers carrying fish for food?

Mr. CRISP. What is the nature of the container?

Mr. BLAND. Usually in crates or barrels.

Mr. CRISP. My information is that it does.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The case of the farmer in connection with these food products has been presented here in consideration of the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has presented opposition to the manufacturers of tin cans. There is still a third element interested in this matter, and that third element consists of the consumers of food. It is my opinion-and I believe this House is in agreement with methat American citizens should be permitted to live before they are compelled to assume the burdens of taxation.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I have not the slightest doubt that this tax on cans, negligible as it is, will be absorbed by the canners and will not affect the consumer at all. Mr. WHITE. I believe we should stand firmly by the principle that the poor people in the cities of the United States as well as in the country should be exempted from taxes until they at least have an opportunity to make a

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. The answer given by the chairman of this committee would apply to everything in the way of a sales tax. It will be absorbed, but it is the poor man who will absorb it, because he is the man who is eating out of the cheap tin can. The poor man lives out of these tin cans, and you are going to put a tax on the users of these food products. Here is a chance for you fellows who are against the sales tax to do something real and tangible and worth while.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Florida will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Green to the committee amendment offered by Mr. Crisp: Insert at the end thereof the following new

"(8) Sales of turpentine or resin."

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I would particularly like to have the attention of those from the naval stores-producing States, and those from the paint, the soap, and the varnish manufacturing States. Naval-stores production for this year has declined because the producers are not realizing the price of production in many cases. There is some question as to whether naval-stores products may be properly classified as farm products. At the last session of Congress we passed a special act bringing gum turpentine and gum resin under the provisions of the marketing act, so that the Federal Farm Board could lend some assistance to this

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Practically all of those resins and turpentines are used in further manufacture. If they are used in further manufacture and sold to licensed manufacturers they are exempt.

Mr. GREEN. Then the chairman should not object to this amendment. We want to be sure that these products are protected. Of the producers in my district, I am informed only a few did not lose money last year. If you want those making soap in your districts, making paint in your district, or making varnish in your district, as well as other manufactured articles to pay more, then put an additional tax on this agricultural product. It is highly important that we protect all lines of the farming industry. This is a line of farming. As an industry it is now distressed, as are some of the wheat and cotton industries.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Can any of the articles mentioned in the amendment be used of and by themselves as such?

Mr. GREEN. Yes. They are used to mix in paint, and for other purposes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If they are, they are not taxed.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, no; the gentleman is wrong. A consumer will buy a gallon of paint and add probably a quart of turpentine.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. It becomes a component part of the paint, and the paint is taxed and the turpentine is not.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I asked for information and I was reliably informed that naval stores would be taxed.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I know something of naval stores, and a great part of them are exported. Under this bill exports are not taxed, and if they are used in further manufacture they do not pay a tax. The amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman knows as well as I do that the naval storesmen are going in the hole every day. I hope the amendment will be adopted. In fact, I am informed that these products are not exempt, and I believe this industry should stand on all fours with other agricultural products.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I am apprehensive that the House is not fully advised as to the full purport of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida. I have the impression that many Members of the House do not recognize turpentine and resin as farm products. In my section of the country turpentine is looked upon as a farm product very much as corn or wheat or cotton. I can best illustrate it by saying that in my boyhood days I assisted in working a turpentine farm. For example, I would plow cotton one day, chip pines the next day, would plow corn the following day, and dip resin the next. We used the same wagons used in our other farm operations in transporting the resin to the still, and we used the same farm team in transporting it to the turpentine still or market. Therefore, it is purely a farm crop. There is no doubt but that the tax will be levied by the man who first processes the resin. The man who distills the resin and places the turpentine on the market will not know whether it is going into a manufactured product or not. He sells it in the raw state. Turpentine is sold primarily in the raw state, and the acting chairman of the committee knows that it is sold primarily by the man who distills it. There is no processing after it passes his hands until it reaches the manufacturer of paint, varnish, or soap, and under the law the distiller would be compelled, as I understand, to pay the tax; but afterwards, if it goes into paint or into soap or into some other product, the second manufacturer would not be required to pay the tax, for the tax is already paid by the original producer and collected from the original producer. I can see a great deal more merit in this amendment than has been credited to it, because if we are going to exempt a farm crop or a farm product or a processed farm product, and I think we should, then turpentine should be included just as flour made out of wheat should be included or just as meal made out of corn should be included. I think the amendment should be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to cut off amendments, but some of the gentlemen who are on the other side of this bill have asked me to see if we could not get some agreement as to the closing of debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto. So, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto shall close at 2 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object-

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object-

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, then I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed at 2 o'clock. That does not prevent the offering of amendments which it is desired to offer.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put, will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

the part of a great many Members to offer amendments to the amendment which the gentleman from Georgia has offered, to exempt from the sales tax certain articles of manufacture. I am interested in offering an amend-

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman not withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, we would all like to make a speech on this. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Regular order is demanded.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto shall close at 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia offered an amendment, which the Clerk reported, as follows:

At the end of the committee amendment offered by Mr. Carsp add the following paragraph: "Shipping containers for farm and garden products produced in the United States."

Mr. CRISP. Is that not the substance of an amendment that has already been adopted?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. No; I think not. My intention was only to include crates for strawberries, kale, potato barrels, and things like that. I am willing to put in the words "wooden containers" in order to try to get the amendment in line with the thought which the gentleman suggested he would not object to a few moments ago.

Mr. CRISP. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] covers the situation.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I was unable to ascertain just what his amendment provided.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] offered an amendment which I stated I had no objection to, and I think it meets the situation.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I at this time in my time find out what that amendment provided?

Mr. CRISP. It provided as follows:

Crates, baskets, boxes, bags, and other containers for handling, packing, and shipping fruits and vegetables.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I was not able to hear it before.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii offered the following amend-

On page 226, line 2, after the word "State," insert the word "Territory."

The CHAIRMAN. The attention of the Chair has been called to the fact that this amendment is not germane at this point. The gentleman can offer it later.

Mr. LaGUARDIA offered the following amendment, which the Clerk reported, as follows:

At the end of the Crisp amendment, as amended, add the follow-

"Provided, That all materials and articles used in the manufacture of articles herein specifically exempted shall likewise be exempt from the manufacturers' excise tax herein imposed.'

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, yesterday or the day before, when the committee announced the exemption of this tax on clothes and food and farm implements, it was generally believed that all such articles were absolutely exempted. Upon looking up the law and upon conferring with officials in the Treasury Department, as well as members of the committee, we find it is not entirely so and that the limited exemptions are a very small concession. For instance, the minute that clothes and garments and suits are exempted, the tax reverts back to the textiles, to the buttons, to the linings, to the trimmings, and everything that goes into a suit, including fuel, light, and heat. The minute the tax on

Mr. MAPES. There seems to have been a disposition on shoes is exempted, the tax reverts back to the leather and everything that goes into a shoe. Therefore I submit that if this exemption is offered in good faith-and I know the gentleman from Georgia is acting absolutely in good faithsome one has slipped in a joker. If we are to exempt food, clothes, and wearing apparel, let us have an honest-to-goodness exemption and exempt everything that goes into the making of such exempt articles. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I will only take about two minutes. There is no joker in this amendment.

The committee knew what it was doing. There was no intention of exempting materials, because such an exemption is not capable of being administered. If we strike out everything in the bill there will be no base on which to compute a tax. The last statistics show the volume of business to be $60,000,000. To-day, with the exemptions we have recommended, you will compute the two and a quarter per cent tax on a base of about $20,000,000. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LaGuardia) there were—ayes 37, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Blanton; At the end of the committee amendment offered by Mr. Crisp, add "(7) ice."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, to save my life, I can not understand why this bill should contain a provision to tax ice. The purpose of my amendment is to prevent a tax on ice. There should be no tax on ice.

Ever since I have been in public life I have been making an earnest uncompromising fight to force all necessities to be furnished the people at the lowest cost possible. The people should get electric light and current at the lowest price possible. They should get gas and other fuel at the lowest price possible. They should get their water at the very lowest possible price. They should have transportation on street cars, busses, and railroads at the very lowest cost possible. And they should have their ice at the lowest price possible.

In my State ice has been sold at the cities of Waco, Austin, and San Antonio at 20 cents per hundred, while in some cities controlled by monopolies it is still sold for 50, 60, and even 75 cents per hundred, which is outrageous.

Mr. Chairman, ice is no longer a luxury. Every poor family in the United States should have ice as cheaply as they can get it, just the same as anybody else. In many places the local water is absolutely unfit to drink unless it has ice in it during the summer months. Why should not ice be exempt from this tax?

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. CRISP. Under such an amendment we will lose about $3,000,000. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], the chairman of the committee, evidences a willingness to accept my amendment, I do not care to use any further time in discussing it, but will ask for a vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Schafer to the committee amendment; Strike out all after the word "sirup" in the amendment and insert a comma and add the following: "liquid mait and malt extract, fluid, solid, or condensed."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is | recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, in three minutes I can merely scratch the surface of this great fundamental principle. The Committee on Ways and Means has recognized the fact that malt sirups are a food product by including them in their list of exemptions when sold to bakers in containers of not less than 50 pounds. Under that exemption a baker who purchases a 50-pound container will not have to pay the 21/4 per cent sales tax, but the little baker and housewife baker will have to pay an extortionate sales tax of approximately 30 per cent under another section of the bill. The big baker who purchases a 50-pound container will get the benefit of the exemption while the housewife with five or six half-starved children who desires to bake bread and other foods for her family, as contained in this voluminous book of recipes, will have to pay a sales tax of 30 per cent. Unless my amendment is adopted you are also going to take powdered malt sirup like that contained in this can and make the purchaser pay a 30 per cent sales tax thereon. You are going to make those who can not keep body and soul together pay a tribute under a 30 per cent sales tax on malt sirups which are used for food and malted milk as well as to manufacture home-brew. I certainly hope that in the name of justice my amendment will be adopted so as to prevent the indefensible sales tax of 30 per cent on essential foods of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Celler: Add to the committee amendment a new subsection, as follows:

"Kitchen utensils and household articles used in the cooking and preparation of food and foodstuffs for human consumption."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARKS. May I inquire of the Chair under what rule the Chair recognizes Members for two minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. By agreement with the gentleman who proposed the amendment, otherwise the gentleman would be recognized for five minutes under the rules of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Chairman, we have declared exempt Mr. CELLER. under the committee amendment agricultural products. We have been dealing very fairly with the agricultural population. I appeal to you now for the teeming millions in the metropolitan centers, a center like New York, from whence I come. I ask that when food is prepared in the kitchen that the media by which it is prepared shall be exempted. We have exempted food, we have exempted clothing, and I think we should go further and exempt the articles by which the food is cooked or boiled in the kitchen.

I appeal to you in this regard for the housewives of the Nation, not only in the cities but also in the country, and ask that my amendment prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLARD: Add a new paragraph to the committee amendment offered by Mr. CRISP and insert "the flag of the United States."

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I notice with great approval that the committee has exempted Bibles, the books of the Old Testament and the New Testament, rosaries, chaplets, medals, and similar articles of religious devotion. Next to religion comes patriotism, and my amendment is to exempt the American flag. There should not be a tax on patriotism. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Gifford to the committee amendment: After the word "machinery" insert "together with implements and machinery used in the fishery industries."

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it should not take more than a minute to convince this House that the fishery industry does nothing but produce food. The fishermen now use power in their small boats, and it is an industry where they work harder, run more risks, and engage in a far more dangerous calling than does the farmer. I think it could only have been an inadvertence on the part of the committee that they were not exempted. Certainly, no lengthy argument ought to be necessary now that the committee has exempted the agricultural interests, who are far better off than those who engage in the fishery industry. I urge that this amendment be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GIFFORD) there were—ayes 40, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Nolan: Add to the list of exemptions in the Crisp amendment "sales of trusses, artificial limbs, and orthopedic appliances."

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that when the committee eliminated necessities from this bill they had any idea of imposing a tax upon these appliances that the crippled, the maimed, and the disabled are forced to use because of their misfortune; and orthopedic appliances are used largely to correct deformities of crippled children.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Bland: Amend the committee amendment offered by Mr. Crisp, as amended, by adding a new subsection, as follows:

"Sales of containers used for shipping any sea-food products shipped for consumption as food."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the only purpose of this amendment is to bring the sea-food industry in line with the agricultural industry, and make the same application to the sea-food products which has been made to fruits and vegetables. I regret that the limit of time which has been fixed by the committee will not permit full discussion of this amendment. Certainly the same rule that applies to fruits and vegetables should apply to sea-food products, which constitute a large part of the food of the country and at reasonable rates. The industry is suffering as severely as other industries, the men engaged have much work and small profits, with frequently no profits at all, and they should not be burdened further. The burden is one that they could not pass on, but would be compelled to absorb.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. Mr. GRANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Granfield: At the end of the committee amendment add the following new paragraph:

"(8) Coal and wood of all kinds for use as fuel in the home."

Mr. GRANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have just offered provides that coal and wood of all kinds used as fuel in the home be exempted from the imposition of the 21/4 per cent tax. This is a very proper and necessary amendment.

The distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], in behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means, has recommended that foods, clothing, and medicine be tax exempt. Just a few moments ago the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] offered an amendment which would include ice in the list of exemptions. I am impressed that coal and wood are in the same category as food, clothing, and medicine, and ice, and for that reason I offer this amendment.

I wish, further, to call to the attention of the House that coal and wood are the poor man's fuel, and that to-day many of our citizens are buying coal and wood by the bag. I regard these commodities just as necessary to the welfare of our people as other necessities of life, and I trust the House will adopt my amendment.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. GRANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What does the gentleman's amendment cover?

Mr. GRANFIELD. My amendment covers coal and wood used only in the home for fuel purposes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does the gentleman think that ought to be taken off?

Mr. GRANFIELD. Yes. I am convinced that the exemptions which are provided for by my amendment should be accepted by the House. Without any question a tax on coal and wood is a burden which will be borne by the poorer class of our people. This class should not be forced to bear a tax of this character during these times of great financial distress. Most of our people are having all they can do to obtain sufficient money to purchase the bare necessities of life. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GRANFIELD. I am happy to yield to my colleague.

Mr. McCORMACK. I hope the committee will accept it.

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a substitute, exempting coal entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that would be an amendment in the third degree. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GRANFIELD].

The question was taken; and on a division there were 87 ayes and 7 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the Crisp amendment a new paragraph, as follows:

"Sales of coal."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I will make no argument in one minute on this subject, but I will try to give you the coal statistics, from which you can derive your own argument.

The statistics show that the anthracite coal of 1929 brought $400,000,000 in round numbers, and the bituminous coal brought $1,000,000,000 in round numbers. Perhaps one-third of the bituminous coal produced goes into manufacture, so that would be caught later in the tax. The exempting amendment just adopted, just restricted to coal used for fuel in the homes, would not cover more than one-third of the coal produced in the United States. It would not reach any of the coal sold to the railroads. They have done more than any other single cause to prevent reasonable coal prices and wreck the coal-mining industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the Crisp amendment, after the word "medicine," the words "animal vaccines and serums."

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment, but I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether the word "medicine" in the Crisp amendment would cover vaccines and serums?

Mr. CRISP. I think the gentleman's amendment is unnecessary, and the Treasury expert agrees with me.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amend-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia if under his amendment cottonseed oil would be exempt?

Mr. CRISP. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the committee amendment the following: "Sales of cottonseed oil, peanut oil, or other American-grown agricultural products."

Mr. CRISP. My understanding is that these commodities are used principally for human food, and they are exempt.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. These are not always used in

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Withhow to the Crisp amendment: After the words "(1) sales of food for human consumption," insert "except oleomargarine and other substitutes for butter,

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of the Crisp amendment as amended oleomargarine and other substitutes for butter are exempt from the provisions of the manufacturers' excise tax. My amendment will place the manufacturers' tax on oleomargarine and other substitutes for butter. In 1931 there were manufactured in the United States approximately 275,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine. This amendment if adopted will bring to the Treasury of the United States more than $850,000 annually. This will be an aid to dairying, which is one of the basic agricultural industries of the country, and in all fairness I believe this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. Oleomargarine is the poor man's food, and to-day it bears a 10-cent special tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Lankford of Georgia: On page 225, after the committee amendments offered by Mr. Crisp, insert:

"(1) Crossties, lumber, shingles, and other forms of construction material manufactured or produced from timber of any kind.

"(2) Turpentine, resin, and all other naval-stores products.

(2) Imperating resin, and an other havar-stores products.

(3) Cottonseed meal, cottonseed oil, and all other forms of prepared or processed cottonseed products."

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment contains subject matter that has been already passed upon by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not offered in the proper place in the pending amendment. We have adopted numerous amendments to the Crisp amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Harlan: Page 226, after line 6, add a new subparagraph, to be numbered consecutively, as follows:

"Sales to municipally or privately owned or operated railways which furnish urban, suburban, interurban, or other transportation service as common carriers."

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to try to save for labor and for public service a great many of our common carriers that are now hanging on through receiverships. Every common carrier that operates on rails has everything to purchase that the bus lines have to purchase, and, in addition to that, has to purchase a great many commodities that the bus lines do not purchase. We have all witnessed our railway lines, urban and interurban, and our street-railway lines going out of business or going into the hands of receivers. A short time ago we passed a Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill to lend money to keep these organizations going, and now we are about to pass a bill to tax the things they buy in such a way as to destroy them.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Has the gentleman drawn his amendment carefully enough to take care of these street-car lines which are practically going broke, but at the same time to not exempt these street-car companies?

Mr. HARLAN. My amendment does not have anything to do with the power companies. I am not talking about power. Everything that is purchased by any common carrier, street-car line, interurban line, or railroad that goes on rails is embraced within my amendment. If we do not do something of that kind, then the securities invested in these companies are not going to be worth anything in the very near future. Of course, we have helped them a little. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co. has made a big loan to electrify their lines, and now we turn around and put a tax on the commodities they are going to buy. It seems to me in the interest of the public that are using our street-car lines, in the interest of the companies themselves, and the investors, this amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will lose $40,000,000. It will lose twice as much as all of the other amendments we have adopted to-day will lose. We have just made an appropriation of $500,000,000 under the Reconstruction Corporation bill, and a large part of that is going to the railroads. We have done enough for the railroads for one session of Congress.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, there is a large continuing annual national deficit due to the maladministration of the affairs of Government during the past 11 years. This should not be charged to the Republican Party as a whole, but should be laid specifically to the billionaire wing of that party, which brazenly took charge of this Nation some 11 years ago, with Andrew Mellon at the helm.

Whether Mr. Mellon was acting through Mr. Harding, Mr. Coolidge, or Mr. Hoover, the result was the same. His efforts were directed to the service of only one class of the American people—the cult of Mammon. Mr. Mellon's selection was an unfortunate departure from the traditions of the past. Before the advent of Mellonism the men who held the great key place of Government as Secretaries of the Treasury had never been possessed of stupendous wealth.

Commencing with Alexander Hamilton, of the Washington administration, down to Andrew Mellon, of the Harding administration, the men who have held this important post have been, as a rule, men of limited means but great in their knowledge of finances. This can be seen by a review of the names of those who have held this position since the beginning of our Government.

The big rich prior to 1921, in dealing with government, had to act through a Secretary of the Treasury chosen from the ranks of the people, and one whose wealth was not sufficient to separate him from them.

Mr. Mellon took charge just 11 years ago. He recently slipped out under cover of darkness. Then the thing that definitely fixes the present administration as being wedded to a government of the big rich is the selection of Mr. Mellon's successor. Mr. Ogden Mills was not selected from the ranks of the moderately well-to-do, as those great Secretaries of the past, such as John Sherman, John G. Carlisle, and men of that stamp, but Mr. Mills was cut off the same piece of cloth as Mr. Mellon. Well might it be said that he is a worthy representative of the big rich and fits into Mellon's shoes perfectly. Mr. Mills, like Mr. Mellon, is a man of fabulous wealth.

I wish to read here the names of those who have in the past held the important position of Secretary of the Treasury:

The sales tax is a movement of the big rich to displace from their shoulders the burden that rightfully belongs there. This is no time to put additional taxes on the masses. The people are already overburdened with taxes.

No additional burden should be placed on any class or on anyone if it can be avoided. Additional taxes can be avoided. Issue 10-year 3¾ per cent interest Government bonds, one-fifth payable each two years, for the full amount of the anticipated deficit, with income from bonds exempt from income taxes. Then ascertain the lowest estimate of Federal income for the next two years, and deduct 20 per cent from this estimate; abolish enough bureaus, commissions, and sinecures, and cut expenses of all kinds, until Government estimated income will meet the expenses, and then stop. Add no taxes of any kind to any class. The deficit bonds can be taken care of when times are good in the future. It is unsound to increase taxes if avoidable. This course will meet with the approval of the people and add prestige to this Congress.

Why attempt to wipe out in one year an annual deficit that the administration has allowed to accumulate for almost 12 years? During these years the Government has been squandering the public wealth. Now this is to be a year of jubilee. The people are going to repudiate the nearly 12 years of Government—not of the Republican Party but of the billionaire wing of it.

The soft, willing, and glad hand of the administration was given to the bankers, the railroads, and so forth, in the way of relief. Now the boot is to be given to the thousands of clerks in the Government employ, in the way of salary reductions.

When this revenue bill was first reported, it placed a tax grabber between the mouths of the poor and the grocery store; a stamp between medicine and the sick; and a tax between the shivering body and the clothing store.

The conduct of the administration and of the so-called leaders of this Congress gives an apt illustration of what takes place in legislation when it discriminates between the fortunes of the rich and the daily wants of the poor.

The Chief Executive violated proper conduct in legislation when he had secret conferences with selected Members of this Congress, prior to the convening thereof, and lobbied with and exacted pledges from them. These Members, also, were not doing right, either by the people or this body, in permitting the Executive to bind them. It is now plain that all these preliminary meetings on the part of the administration were for the purpose of financing the financiers who had brought this terrible depression upon the people of this country.

All of these financial measures—the moratorium, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, and the Steagall bill—were intended to serve concerns like the Chase National Bank

How repellent this all is when it is realized that the Chase National Bank was represented in everything that went on in Europe by having on the ground its representatives, as it did when it had Albert H. Wiggin, head of the Chase National Bank, sitting as the American member of a committee to discuss cancellation or reduction of the interallied debts. And then the infamy is consummated by the President naming as one of the managing directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation a director of the Chase National Bank.

The safety of this Nation and of government in this country is dependent upon having political parties, one to watch the other, with no bipartisan arrangement. It was with amusement that I learned of the bipartisan activities. First, with secret meetings with the Executive; second, with breakfasts with the Executive; and third, as each measure was proposed, a sufficient number slipping over from this side of the Chamber to put through the banking bills. It was with much chagrin that I watched, on many occasions, seasoned old legislative servants of privilege, who had rendered services and granted favors to privilege from year to year, coming over from the other side of the Chamber to congratulate Members on this side whenever a gentleman from this side announced he was going to support a banking measure as a patriotic duty. When a Member from this side would thus commit himself, invariably there was a rush from the other side of these friends of privilege, frequently even following the patriot into the cloakroom to congratulate him. There was so much of this that at first it puzzled me as to which was which, and it reminded me of the old story of days in the past when times were hard and the prudent mothers, to make ends meet, would clothe the boy with trousers patched both fore and aft, so that when you looked at the tow-headed boy on the highway you could not tell if he was going to school or coming home.

When I see those from the minority side going to Members on the majority side and congratulating them as patriots I would not know which was which except for this: When those from the other side come over to this side it is with a solemn mien, and with a more solemn declaration they take the hand of the obliging and serving Member from this side and congratulate him on his patriotism; but when they depart I can distinguish them, because they have a smirk of joy on their faces, as much as to say, "We have another one of them."

To me there is danger to this Republic from those gentlemen "whose politics are cross-eyed, whose right political foot is on the left political leg," who pose as Democrats and vote as Republicans.

This Congress seems to feel that it must be most respectful of Mammon. The great jurist, Jeremiah S. Black, once said:

Wealth always did make it to everybody's interest to stand well with it. Wealth is power, and power is always honored. It is said of Satan himself that he is sometimes worshiped for his burning throne.

Capital jealously guards her interest, and is cruel in the exercise of her power, and cowardly withal.

There should be less lip patriotism on the part of the Members of this Congress and more common sense exercised in action.

Government by the big rich, through its Mellons, has proven a colossal failure.

This Congress has taken care of the big bankers; this Congress has taken care of the big insurance companies; this Congress has taken care of the steam railroads; but this Congress has been woefully negligent of the rights of the individual and the struggling little merchants of our Commonwealth.

From Springfield, Mo., Mr. J. W. Brownlow, of the Hermann-Brownlow Co., referring to the sales tax, writes me of this case:

Although harness leather and all harness goods are being sold to the farmers at about one-half of the price that he paid a few years ago the low price of his products makes it a serious burden on him if he buys the equipment he needs, and he is not in a position to assume this extra burden that this tax imposes on him.

As an illustration, a few days ago a farmer came into our store and wanted to buy a horse collar. We sold him this collar for $2.25. He had just sold a case of eggs consisting of 30 dozen for 7 cents per dozen, or $2.10. Therefore, he lacked 15 cents of getting as much for the 30 dozen of eggs as he paid for the horse collar. A few years ago the price of this collar was $4.50. However, at that time if this farmer had brought his 30 dozen of eggs into town he could have sold them for 30 cents per dozen, or $9, and he could have paid $4.50 for the horse collar and still had $4.50 left in money. This is a good illustration of what the farmer is up against in buying equipment in order to produce his crops.

What bothers me is where the farmer will get the additional 15 cents to complete the sale for the horse collar. I know very well he will not get it from the Chase National Bank, nor from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii offered an amendment, which the Clerk reported, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Houston of Hawaii: Page 226, line 2, after the word "State," insert the word "Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, when I moved a few minutes ago to close debate on my amendment and all amendments thereto, I overlooked also saying closing debate on amendments offered to the paragraph. Now, I move that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments, and this does not apply nor is it intended to apply to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] to strike out the amended paragraph—I move that all debate on the paragraph be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] is recognized on his motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can not reach some understanding with the gentleman from Georgia, the acting chairman of the committee, as to the debate on my motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman will find me quite acquiescent to closing debate as soon as possible. I welcome a suggestion from the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Several gentlemen have expressed the hope that they could have some time. Would 30 minutes on a side be agreeable?

Mr. CRISP. I will agree to it or will agree to less.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I will suggest 20 minutes on a side.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on my amendment be limited to 20 minutes on a side, 40 minutes in all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate be closed on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina in 40 minutes, and, of course, I know the Chair will divide the time equally between those for and against.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there has been no debate on this amendment, and therefore the motion for the present is out of order.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] has taken the floor, he has been recognized, and he has said a few words and made a unanimous-consent request. If the gentleman from Tennessee wishes to be technical, so will I.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I have been in committee attending to other matters, and I would like to have a little time on this amendment myself. [Applause.] I do not think we ought to cut off debate in this fashion.

Mr. CRISP. Well, I had hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would use five minutes of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that he will recognize him for five minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the motion, that the time be extended to 30 minutes to the side.

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the time be limited to 1 hour—30 minutes on a side.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to eliminate the sales-tax provision of the pending bill. My reason for opposing a sales tax is that I know it is unsound in principle and will be harsh, burdensome, and unjust in its operation. It contravenes every accepted theory of taxation. Not even in the emergency of the great World War did our Government seriously consider such a tax. The war emergency tax measures unanimously adopted under the leadership of the great Claude Kitchin as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee; the gentleman from Illinois, Henry T. Rainey; Hon. Lincoln Dickson; Cordell Hull; J. N. Garner; J. W. Collier; C. C. DICKINSON; W. A. Oldfield; CHARLES R. CRISP; on the Democratic side; and with such distinguished Republicans as the late Joseph W. Fordney, and William R. Green, both of whom later became chairmen of the Ways and Means Committeenone of these gentlemen, so far as I know, ever suggested a sales tax in that crisis in our Nation's history.

Are we willing now, with our boasted wealth, to admit that conditions are so desperate and that other sources of taxation have been exhausted and are inadequate and we must violate the time-honored policy of our Government, as advocated by both the great parties, and adopt a sales tax? Are we Democrats willing to make a record in this House, after being out of power for 12 years, and accept the responsibility for the enactment of the sales tax, notwithstanding the fact that such bill has been recommended by the Ways and Means Committee? I served notice when the bill was reported by the committee that I would offer an amendment to strike out this part of the bill; and if it were not stricken out, that I would vote against the bill on final roll call. But I say, are we Democrats willing to take the responsibility for foisting on the country at any time a sales tax—a policy we have always opposed and severely condemned? What would, or could be, our justification for such course before the people? Surely we could not justify it in "peace times" if we did not resort to it in the greatest emergency of our Nation's history.

And to you, Republicans—my friends on the minority side—may I say, are you willing to go before your constituents in the coming campaign and explain how it is that you, the party of boasted prosperity, having capitalized the "prosperity" issue in every campaign since the days of President Cleveland—are you willing to have it made a matter of public record that, as a result of 12 years of unbroken service and control in every branch of the Government, the country is so bankrupt and the Treasury so depleted that you are forced to vote for a sales tax—a tax on consumption and the necessities of life—in order to save the credit of the Government?

Remember, if you do this, you will be writing on the statute books of the Nation a record that you never can explain-never can justify-and it can be justly capitalized as a campaign issue against you for generations. But let me make this prediction: If this sales-tax provision remains in the bill and becomes a law, you Republicans will not only have to take the blame for its necessity, if there be one, but also the responsibility of its enactment; for certainly a majority of the Democrats in this House will by their action this day demonstrate that they not only do not approve but will not accept this unjust, unreasonable, unnecessary, and unconscionable form of taxation. Who are urging this sales tax anyway and where did it have its birth or inception? That Andrew Mellon, William Randolph Hearst, and the millionaires and mutimillionaires have had for their sole purpose and determination for years to get a sales tax fastened on the country in order that they may be relieved of paying income taxes, everyone knows. Its proponents now say it will only be temporary; but, verily, verily, I say unto you, that the influences that are now so desperately striving to have this sales tax written into this bill will, if successful, be sufficiently potential with all the facilities and resources at their command to prevent its repeal. Oh, but the committee says they have made certain exemptions which greatly improve the bill; but while these exemptions will, of course, modify some of the harsh features of the bill, still we should say to such suggestions, "Get thee behind me, Satan." These exemptions are not offered by the committee because they desire or are willing to offer them but because they saw certain defeat and hoped by this strategy to beguile us into swallowing the sales tax. But, my comrades-on both sides of the aisle-you with whom I have fought in this desperate battle—let me now appeal to you those of us who have stood together and forced these concessions—that we still stand shoulder to shoulder and defeat the entire iniquity. The people of the country expect us to do this. Small manufacturers of the country are all opposed to a sales tax; the farmers are opposed to it; the farm organizations, to wit: The American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Farmers Union, the National Grange, also the Consumers Counsel, the American Federation of Labor. the Railway Laborer Executives' Association-in fact, all farm organizations and all labor organizations in the United States—are up in arms and have addressed communications to Congress protesting against this legislation.

Now is the time and the accepted time to demonstrate to the American people that their Representatives have heard their voice and know their will and will obey it. Let us kill it now, kill it dead, and trust it is killed forever.

We are told that a sales tax has worked successfully in Canada. This may be true from the standpoint of raising revenue; but I am reliably informed there is a great deal of dissatisfaction among the consumers. However, the Canadian law bears very little similarity to the sales-tax provision of this bill. In Canada it is primarily a luxury tax; in fact, almost everything that could be classed as a necessity is exempted—the list is too long to mention—there are thousands of exemptions.

I had thought, and am still of the opinion, that there is enough statesmanship in the United States to write our own tax laws without modeling them after Canada, Australia, Czechoslovakia, or even Spitzbergen.

I see in the papers this morning we are told that unless we accept the sales tax we will be forced to accept the recommendations made by the Treasury Department. They try to get us to vote for this bill first by sugar-coating it with a few exemptions, and, failing in this, they then threaten us with what they say is something even worse; but let me say in answer that when we defeat the sales tax we will resist to the limit the imposition of other unsatisfactory taxes. The duty of the hour is to defeat the sales tax, and cross other bridges as we come to them.

Mr. RAINEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'CONNOR). The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, this, of course, is the crucial point in the manufacturers' sales-tax proposition. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina carries, it absolutely destroys the manufacturers' sales-tax provision

The exemptions you have made this morning amount to a little less than $20,000,000. You made some other exemptions recently, but as nearly as the experts are able to figure out the exemptions already made, if you vote for this proposition, you leave over $500,000,000 that you must yet raise by some other kind of taxation than the manufacturers' sales tax.

We have exempted food and clothing, farm machinery, and medicines. This morning we exempted malt sirup used in milk and medicines. We have exempted agricultural products. We have exempted all those things which affect agriculture and those things which affect power.

I have been following the debates, and I am satisfied the fight to balance the Budget has been won. You are going to balance this Budget, but if you vote for the Doughton amendment these are the kinds of taxes you must vote forsomething like the following: Increased postage, a tax on automobiles-of course, you are all against this, but if you are to balance the Budget you can not avoid these taxesa stamp tax on checks, taxes on telephone and telegraph messages, and taxes on gasoline, or something of that kind. You have an immense amount to raise, gentlemen, and there may be also taxes on conveyances of real estate.

Of course, we had no sales taxes during the war, as the gentleman from North Carolina has suggested. There were no sales taxes anywhere in this world during the war. Along toward the close of the war Germany adopted them, and France followed, and then after the war every other great nation in the world, trying to find some method of taxation to meet the urgent needs of government, except the United States and Great Britain, adopted the manufacturers' sales tax, and it all came after the war. But during the war we had these objectionable taxes to which I have been calling attention, and when you vote for this motion you are voting for the kind of taxes we had during the war, and which I have endeavored, in part, to enumerate to you to-day.

We now take our choice and we go back to our constituents and we make our defense, if we can.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. All along in the consideration of this tax bill we go along seemingly under the impression that it is absolutely necessary to balance the Budget. Does the gentleman think it is absolutely necessary that we take all this money off of the American people simply to balance the Budget or that it is not absolutely necessary to do that?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, it is absolutely necessary to balance the Budget. At the end of this year we will have an added interest charge of $210,000,000. We can not borrow now except on short-term loans of 7 months or 1 year. This Government can not borrow money at four and a quarter per cent on long-term loans. Every business is depressed in this country, and it is depressed because this great Government of ours can not sell its securities on the market. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to have anything to say on this subject. I regret very much that I am unable to agree with the distinguished gentlemen upon the Ways and Means Committee who have reported this bill. but I can not surrender the convictions of a lifetime [applausel nor can I forget that the Democratic Party has consistently throughout its career, except in a war-time emergency, opposed anything like a sales tax. [Applause.] It so declared in 1924, and the party to which I belong has always stood for taxation upon those who are best able to

I am opposed to the sales tax on principle. I am opposed to it because it promotes extravagance in appropriations. [Applause.] It is too easily imposed, it is too easily collected, it is too easily and cheaply collected not to promote extravagance in our legislative bodies, and for that reason I am against it.

Why, they tell us it is necessary to impose this tax in order to balance the Budget. Gentlemen, I have never subscribed to that idea for one moment. For two or three years we have been laboring under a deficit, and you can not make me believe that the credit of our Government and the credit of business are going to fail merely because we do not balance the Budget on June 30, 1933! Why not impose a reasonable tax upon wealth and upon business and upon all those who are best able to stand it and then issue certificates for the balance until this Government gets in a better condition to pay for its current operations. [Applause.] The issuance of certificates of indebtedness would not serve to depress the price of our Government's securities. Only recently a very large amount of certificates was oversubscribed to a great extent. The people and the country ought to be permitted to recover to some extent before we rush into an imposition of taxes which they are so little able to pay at this time. This country has such resources and such great wealth that it seems preposterous to me for anyone to argue that unless the Budget is balanced within the next year our credit will fail and chaos result.

The people of this country, and particularly those who are now finding it so hard to procure the actual necessities of life, should not be expected to take care of the great orgy of extravagance and expenditures of the last 10 years in the short space of a year. This argument that the Budget must be balanced found its origin among those who have been seeking for years to impose the sales tax in order to be relieved of the income tax, and it has been repeated so often that it has been accepted as a fact by many. Mr. Arthur Brisbane, the great columnist and editor, said the other day:

Like children with a puzzle trying to get one metal ring out of another, this country is intent on "balancing the Budget." An additional income tax that discourages initiative, taxation of theattern already in distress, and a thousand other plans are suggested to "balance the Budget" and unbalance business generally. Why balance the Budget? When a man is sick you do not make him run a mile. You wait until he is better. Why not borrow what the Government needs beyond its normal income, issuing bonds and calling them in gradually as conditions improve? It is said, "We must balance our Budget to maintain credit with foreign nations." Why worry about foreign nations? If they paid what they owe, our Budget would be balanced easily.

I want to tell you, gentlemen, if you impose this sales tax, you will be confronted with the proposal to repeal the income tax and the Federal corporation tax in a very few years. [Applause.] Put the nose of this camel under the tent, even for a small period of time, and the same arguments will be used here a year from now or two years from now in order to retain it upon our statute books.

Let me read to you a paragraph from a letter which I received from the Philadelphia Board of Trade, in which an officer of that board frankly expresses his position and the position of the board with reference to the income tax.

On the question of a final sales tax, so specified to avoid duplication or pyramiding of taxes, it is conceded, as we understand it, that in the event Congress does—and we sincerely hope it will—enact the sales-tax legislation, that automatically Congress will repeal the Federal income and the Federal corporation taxes.

Let me say to you gentlemen who have stood on Democratic platforms, if you please, you gentlemen who have advocated an income tax upon every stump in your districts and in your States and throughout the country, that in undertaking to impose a sales tax as a policy of this Nation you are lending yourselves, unintentionally, of course, to the schemes of those who have it in their minds to repeal the income tax, the most equitable and just tax ever imposed. [Applause.]

I know the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] has relieved a few of the objections to a certain extent, but do not forget this, gentlemen. You are still confronted with the fact that if you pass this bill as it is now written, you are voting over $400,000,000, by the admission of its author, on the backs of those people who are least able to bear it. [Applause.] Some one has said that the action of the committee has brought us nearer to communism than any other nation except Russia. Let me say that communism will never result from the taxing of wealth even though it is made higher than it should be. If communism gains a serious hold in this country, it will be because of the continual piling up of burdens upon the backs of those so little able to bear them. But lest I be misunderstood, let me say that I do not fear communism at any time in this country. Our people are too loyal and too much imbued with the spirit of liberty to ever yield to any such pernicious doctrine.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the Committee of the Whole has had under consideration the proposed revenue bill for several days and has made certain amendments to it. The estimates of the increased revenue of the four chief amendments so far made are as follows. These estimates I am giving now are additional earnings above that that would be earned under the bill as reported by the committee:

On the normal tax on individuals the increase due to change in the higher brackets from 6 to 7 per cent is $3,000,000.

The change in the surtax rates represents an increased amount earned over that proposed in the bill of $17,000,000.

The elimination of the credit for taxes paid in foreign countries increases the amount earned over that proposed in the bill by $12,000,000.

The increases in estate taxes by the rates proposed in the Ramseyer amendment would add $8,000,000.

Adding these together, we have a total of $40,000,000 of revenue from these sources additional to that earned from the same sources as proposed by the committee.

These figures apply to the fiscal year 1933. More money will be received from them in the subsequent years; but we are now endeavoring to balance the Budget by the end of the fiscal year 1933.

The manufacturers' excise tax as proposed in the bill as reported by the committee was intended to earn $595,000,000. Subtracting this $40,000,000 of the additional revenue, there remains yet to be obtained either from the manufacturers' excise tax or in some other way the sum of $555,000,000 in order to balance the Budget by June 30, 1933.

There are only three ways by which we can balance the Budget—by raising the taxes necessary, by issuing bonds, or by a combination of the two.

I think it is generally conceded that the credit of the country, industrially and economically, depends for its stability on the credit of the Government, and that continued issuance of securities to pay current expenditures will further impair the public credit.

The committee, having that in mind, made the proposals contained in the bill.

The committee did not come in here with any other purpose in mind than to submit for the consideration of this distinguished body the needs of the Government and what, in our judgment, was the most equitable method of providing for them. We had no intention of imposing on any part of the people any greater burdens than the lowest amount possible by which the Budget could be balanced.

If the Committee of the Whole and the House decide to eliminate the manufacturers' excise tax, it will be necessary to raise $555,000,000 in order to balance the Budget. From what other source can we obtain this amount? The committee concluded that this tax equitably distributed the burden and that by reason of the low rate proposed and its wide distribution it could be more easily borne and retard as little as possible the economic recovery.

If this tax is stricken from the bill, let me emphasize by repetition we are then confronted by the necessity of raising $555,000,000, or we say to the world and the country that we do not propose to protect the credit of the United States, and that a dollar of its indebtedness shall not be paid by a dollar in money but rather paid out of the proceeds of increases in the public indebtedness. The credit crisis will not be ended by further increase of the public debt. The sale of Government securities will absorb great amounts of money needed for the rehabilitation of industry, trade, and commerce; will continue low prices to the farmers, and defer the reemployment of labor. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Chairman, although a new and inexperienced Member of this body, I dare trespass for a few moments upon your time to state my views on the pending bill. I rise as the Representative of the seventh North Carolina district under the highest form of compulsion, a sense of public duty—"stern daughter of the voice of God."

I have given this bill my conscientious consideration and earnest study for days and weeks, but I can not consistently give it my vote. I recognize the tremendous responsibility which has devolved upon the members of the Ways and Means Committee, and particularly upon the acting chairman [Mr. Crisp], whose patriotism and devotion to the public service are unexcelled in this body. In registering my objections to their work, I have no criticism of their motives or unselfish service.

Judging by the many letters of protest received by every Congressman and reading the voluminous hearings held by the committee, one is convinced that the perfectly natural reaction of all taxpayers to any increase in taxation is aptly stated in the following couplet:

Congress, Congress, don't tax me, Tax that fellow behind the tree.

Mr. Chairman, I came here with the highest admiration, respect, and even reverence for the splendid leaders of our party, having recently become the majority party of this House, and I came here with the expectation of following their leadership without hesitation or faltering one step of the way, but I can not follow them in this matter.

We have heard and read much in recent years of the conflict between Hamilton and Jefferson in the beginnings of this Republic; but I have never heard of such a paradox as Hamiltonian Democracy until it lifted its ugly head in this bill.

Leaders of this House, in their desperation to rally their deserting followers, have stigmatized the opposition to the sales-tax feature of this bill as socialism, bolshevism, and communism.

It is a historial fact that when the system of free public schools was first evolved the Bourbons of my State denounced it as socialistic. When the first public waterworks plant was built in my little city there were those who called it socialism. If opposition to this bill constitutes socialism then for myself I accept the label and wear it proudly, for it would make Thomas Jefferson a socialist, Andrew Jackson a bolshevist, and Woodrow Wilson a comwith them.

Before a vote is taken on this important feature of the bill I would like to say a few words setting forth my views in explanation of my opposition to the sales-tax section, as well as other items of the bill. I can not but believe that it violates the fundamental tenet of taxation-ability to payas enunciated by economists and other authorities on taxation from Adam Smith down through John Stuart Mill and Ricardo to Edwin R. A. Seligman. A sales tax is an income tax in reverse. In principle it is grossly unfair. It is no pleasure to call upon people to make sacrifices or to bear additional burdens but the task is made more difficult when the method selected to make the sacrifice is as intolerable and unconscionable as that presented to us in this bill.

I do not consider that a deficit itself is necessarily a matter of serious import because unexpected expenditures may become necessary during the currency of the fiscal year. The deficit at the end of the year is not so important as whether or not policies are inaugurated looking to meet that deficit. The serious thing is whether the country will take steps to balance its Budget. Failure to do this would cause grave doubts to arise as to the financial stability of the country. To my mind, the fundamental question is not the balancing of the Budget at any given immediate date, but that we pursue such a course as to bring about this balancing within a reasonable period.

Now, this is the problem we have to solve and it can be solved only in two ways-either by reducing expenditures or by increasing taxes, or a combination of both. I would approach this problem of the deficit first from the angle of further reducing in a drastic manner Federal expenditures by not less than $250,000,000. When that has been accomplished, I would then write the most equitable tax measure possible to raise the balance of the deficit upon the principle that the favored and wealthy classes should first be levied against to provide sufficient funds to bring up the revenues to meet the reduced expenses. When, after these means had been exhausted, including, if necessary, the levying of specific limited excise taxes against articles which are not of first necessity, then and then only would I resort to the general sales tax as a final unavoidable means of raising sufficient money to balance the Budget.

As late as January 13 of this year the Secretary of the Treasury testified as follows:

[Hearings on Revenue Revision, 1932, before Ways and Means Committee, p. 4.]

In the development of our program many possible forms of taxation were considered. We laid aside all thought of a general sales or turnover tax, not only because generally speaking it bears no relation to ability to pay and is regressive in character, but because of the great administrative difficulties involved and the almost inevitable pyramiding of the tax in the course of successive sales. The objections to a general sales tax are not in this respect applicable to a tax on selective articles of the character hereofore employed in this country and now recomcharacter heretofore employed in this country and now recommended.

We have studied the limited manufacturers' or producers' sales tax, which is being administered with a fair degree of success in Canada. There a tax is imposed at the rate of 4 per cent of the manufacturers' sales price or the import value of all goods not manufacturers' sales price or the import value of all goods not exempt which are produced or manufactured in Canada or imported into Canada. It is distinctly not a turnover tax. Retailers are exempt. Indeed the extent of the exemptions is very great, covering thousands of specific items and classes of items. Pyramiding is avoided by a mechanism of licenses and certificates, the effect of which is to collect the tax when the last licensed taxpayer sells to an unlicensed purchaser. The success of the tax appears to be due not only to good administration but to very wide administrative discretion. The tax is passed on and therefore must add to the cost of living.

therefore must add to the cost of living.

With some 200,000 manufacturing establishments in the United States, our much more extensive and complicated industrial mechanism, our tendency to set out administrative procedure with almost meticulous accuracy in our statutes, and our reluctance to grant administrative discretion or authority to administrative officers to make final decisions, it is extremely doubtful whether the Canadian sales tax would meet with the success in our country that it has across the border.

It is politically inexpedient for the Democratic Party to be used as a pawn by a few rich men in this country who are now seeking to take advantage of this crisis and in the munist, and I am perfectly willing to be put in that category | guise of balancing the Budget to deceive gullible Congressmen under a spurious appeal to their patriotism to vote a form of taxation which is absolutely contrary to all the principles of democracy and the greatest principle of all, that of equality of opportunity.

> Organizations representing half the total population of the country-including labor, farmers, merchants, manufacturers, and consumers—have registered their opposition to the sales tax. It is fair to assume that the overwhelming majority of the remainder of the people wish to see it defeated. Who favors the sales tax? That is a question yet to be answered by its proponents.

> Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the tremendous hue and cry which is going up here "that the Budget must be balanced," and I well realize that an unbalanced Budget is regarded as one of the symptoms of national financial instability. However, there are more important things than balancing the Budget. The confidence of the people in the fairness of their own Government and the maintenance of that confidence are far more important than the mere balancing of a Budget in any single year; and this will not be accomplished in the least degree by writing into this bill a tax as vicious and as obnoxious as the so-called manufacturers' sales tax. It is a poor man's tax, due to the fact that 90 per cent of all the manufactured products in this country are purchased by persons with incomes of less than $5,000.

> These people spend the bulk of their incomes in consumption, and this tax bill will place upon them a burden fifty times as heavy as that which it imposes upon the rich. Is such a tax equitable? Is it fair? Is it just? Do my friends on the committee think this tax equitable when we are told that notwithstanding the fact that 4 per cent of the population own 80 per cent of the entire wealth, those with incomes over $100,000 will only pay $20,000,000 of the proposed sales tax of $595,000,000. That is one reason why I say it violates the principle of ability to pay.

> Mr. Chairman, there is at the present time in this country probably a greater concentration of wealth than in any other country in the entire world, and notwithstanding this fact there is only being paid into the Treasury of both the Federal Government and the States $165,000,000 from inheritance taxes, while in England $400,000,000 is derived from this source. Think of that, a country like Great Britain, with only about one-fourth of our national wealth, obtaining two and one-half times as much revenue from death taxes. Do not the gentlemen of the committee believe that part of this deficit could be raised from a reasonable further increase in the inheritance-tax schedule without disturbing business or the employment of labor?

> Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to the committee report on page 9, where it is stated that the tax paid by the head of a family with an income of $2,000 would be negligible due to the fact that probably one-half of this sum would be spent on foodstuffs exempt under the sales tax and that the remaining one-half would be spent for articles on which the manufacturers had paid a tax. That is a most ridiculous and absurd statement to have been prepared by so-called experts; to make this body believe that a man with an average family of four or five and making only $2,000 a year, would consume half of it for food is grossly incorrect as the correct figure is 25 per centnot 50 per cent. There is an adage that a half truth is worse than an untruth, because it misleads uninformed persons. But, Mr. Chairman, it is just another instance of the subterfuges which have been employed to make those Members who still have the interest of the masses at heart, believe that a manufacturers' sales tax would not affect the little man, and then if it did, it would not be burdensome.

> To know that the people of North Carolina would be burdened with an additional tax of not less than $18,000,000, from the sales tax alone, only goes to intensify my determination to oppose this feature to the utmost of my ability. Gentlemen, I know the conditions that exist in my State to-day; I know the condition of the people of my own district. Of course, the $18,000,000 referred to is only one part of the increase in taxes which this bill will place upon the citizens of my State and then to realize that the yield of the gasoline tax in North Carolina, which is the main source for paying off the enormous indebtedness of the State, will be decreased materially as the price of oil and gas goes up due to the attempt to write into this bill a tariff on oil imported into this country-something which never has been done before by Democrats-my sense of justice and my responsibility to the people of my district compel me to rebel against such a bill.

Are we in favor of a tax in this country which in a great many ways would be comparable to the likin system in China, which has done more to retard that backward country's progress than anything else? This tax is one which makes it too easy for the price to be pyramided to the consumer. I know that we have been told of the wonderful success of the sales tax in Canada and about the wonderful advantages of such a method of raising revenue; but, regardless of what we have been told, I am opposed to it because I know it is wrong in principle. Why did they not borrow also the Canadian surtax rates on incomes? Under the committee bill a net earned income of $25,000 to a married man with no dependents would be taxed only $1,660, whereas in Canada the tax would be $3,160, or virtually double.

Comparison of actual income tax paid under the following laws and in the following countries by married men with no depend-ents (income assumed to be all earned)

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point an editorial from the Greensboro Daily News, March 19, 1932, on the Canadian sales tax:

[Editorial from the Greensboro (N. C.) Daily News, March 19, 1932] THE OTHER SIDE

Canada's opinion of the sales tax, which congressional leaders would emulate in the United States, is, to all appearances, not as Canada's opinion of the sales tax, which congressional leaders would emulate in the United States, is, to all appearances, not as unanimously favorable to the levy as the testimony given by certain witnesses before the House Ways and Means Committee would indicate. Perhaps it is safest to say that Canadian views are as variegated as those which prevail upon the same topic in North Carolina; they depend entirely upon the attitude and connections of the person from whom they are obtained.

But be that as it may, the New York World-Telegram, which is opposing the sales levy, has gathered information from its Canadian correspondents which is antipodal to the glorification given the Dominion plan in congressional hearings and which, it is claimed, comes directly from the people who have to pay the tax and not from officials and representatives of the Government which was forced to resort to it in times of financial exigency.

The tax, the World-Telegram learns, is hailed as a war baby and has been denounced by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Trade and Labor Congress, all the major farm organizations, and many boards of trade and chambers of commerce on the grounds that it "is cumbersome and intricate, acts unfairly as between certain commodities, loads the tax on those least able to bear it, and encourages profiteering and pyramiding."

That the levy has not enjoyed any political blessing is to be expected, but the manner in which it has been handled by the Canadian parties is nevertheless enlightening. During the Liberal regime it was constantly under fire from the conservatives and progressives, and so vigorous became the opposition that in 1930 it was reduced to 1 per cent. When the conservatives came into power, however, the rate was raised to 4 per cent, Prime Minister Bennett himself terming the tax "undependable," but expressing power, however, the rate was raised to 4 per cent, Prime Minister Bennett himself terming the tax "undependable," but expressing fear that a readjustment of the Dominion's fiscal system would "further dislocate business during the depression"—a thought which apparently has not entered the mind of American legislators who would completely overhaul the program under which the entire citizenry operates.

The Canadian tax, which raises $65,000,000 during the current year, is estimated to place a burden of $30 on every family in the Dominion with the actual cost eventually raised to $55 by the pyramided increases of commodity costs. Perhaps the declaration of "a Montreal tax expert" should be stricken from the record as incompetent or hearsay evidence, but nevertheless his assertion that "the sales-tax victims would gladly exchange it blindfold for almost any other kind of tax" is included in the opposition

The greatest deliberative body in the world can hardly fall to give these reports consideration, for whatever they may be worth, before final vote upon the pending revenue measure,

I also know that England, faced with a deficit of nearly a billion dollars-think of it, a country only one-fourth as rich in national wealth as ours-balanced its budget in the fall of 1931, and did so without the imposition of such an obnoxious tax as this sales tax.

The committee say they have sought in vain for another source of revenue. May I suggest that before they tax the men who toil honestly for their living, why do they not go to the street called "Wall" and single out the big gamblers of this country, unconscionable in their mad rush to make profits for themselves, who would even go to the extent of selling securities short when the banks of this country were fighting for their very existence? These men-public enemies-made during 1931 the largest profits they ever made by selling securities short, and I commend to the consideration of this body an amendment, which I shall offer to the bill at the proper section, which will wrest from their greedy hands at least a part of the profits which they have wrung from the misery and suffering of the people of this country.

Mr. Chairman, the thanks of the overwhelming majority of the Democratic Members of this House are due "FARMER Bob " Doughton for his determined and unrelenting opposition to the objectionable features of this bill. He has played a lone hand among the 25 members of the Ways and Means Committee. In doing so he has not only been a true Representative of North Carolina but he has also deserved well of all the American people.

In closing I can not overlook the aspersion cast upon the opposition to this bill last Friday when it was said we were being guided by an invisible lobby. Yes, an invisible lobby to those who have eyes to see but see not and ears to hear but do not hear the voice of the masses of the American people lifted in one mighty chorus reaching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf to Canada in opposition to this indefensible system of taxation.

> When wilt Thou save the people? O God of Mercy! When? Not kings and lords but nations, Not thrones and crowns but men. Flowers of Thy heart, O God, are they, Let them not pass like weeds away, Their heritage a sunless day, God save the people.

> Shall crime bring crime forever, Strength aiding still the strong, Is it Thy will, O Father, That man shall toil for wrong? "No," say the mountains; "No," Thy skies; "Man's clouded sun shall brightly rise And songs be heard instead of sighs. God save the people.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is rather a poor time to indulge in partisan speeches. I do not think in a crisis of this kind it is the time to make a comparison between Jeffersonian Democracy and Hamiltonian Republicanism. Since the Congress opened there has been a constant appeal from the President, from the country, and from everybody interested that you and the majority on your side of the House would go along with the President's program and that both sides of the House would lay aside politics for the time being. Greatly to the credit of the membership on the Democratic side of the House, that plan has been very splendidly followed. The minority and the people of the country commend your action, and I congratulate your side of the House for their cooperation. In exactly the same spirit the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee agreed to work with the distinguished acting chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and the other Democratic members of the committee, along precisely the same lines, agreeing that we would have no cross-firing on political subjects during the discussion and that we would try to have just one common viewpoint, namely, the balancing of the Budget.

The adoption of a sales tax was not a pleasant thing for the Democratic members of the committee or for the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. When we started in on the hearings you could not have secured a corporal's guard-I do not know that you could have found a single Member in favor of a sales tax; but after we had gone over the ground, combed every source of revenue with a fine-tooth comb, put income and estate tax rates where we thought they were dangerously near the point of diminishing returns, we found some other method had to be adopted to raise revenue, and we all came to the conclusion, after studying the effect of the tax in other countries, that it was in a sense equitable and not an unfair tax. If you do not buy very much, you do not pay very much in sales taxes.

The more you buy the larger tax you pay in proportion. Many men on the Democratic side of the House, and one in particular, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Connery], still reiterate the statement that it is not necessary to balance the Budget. They say that we can get along by the issuance of bonds. Day by day we see the currency of other nations depreciate in value, and we have seen 19 of them go off the gold standard. The necessity of keeping the American dollar at par ought to be our main objective. It is unthinkable that this Government should go along on a borrowing basis, creating new debts in the overhead of interest, and sinking-fund charges. It ought not to be done. It is not merely a $600,000,000 deficit that some of you men talk about. We have charged off nearly a billion dollars for 1931, charged it back to the national debt. On June 30 of this year we shall charge back over $2,000,000,000 more, which, with the estimated deficit in the fiscal year 1933, will be $5,000,000,000 added to the national debt, which we reduced by over $9,000,000,000 during the period of 11 years following the war.

The people of this country are looking to this Congress for a constructive program. You are their elected Representatives, and they expect us to lay aside party politics and petty prejudices in an effort to stabilize the credit of the United States by balancing the Budget. For the good of our country I appeal for your cooperation. [Applause.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my colleague from New York [Mr. Crowther], that there should be no partisan feeling in this, and I join in an appeal to make this a bipartisan movement and follow the American people against the sales tax. The gentleman from New York with seeming pride to-day points to the example of other countries, and yet the same gentleman from New York, in pleading for a tariff, will point to the impoverished condition of the working people of other countries. There is not a country in the world where the standard of living is as high as it is in the United States, and we are not going to permit anyone with a sales tax to lower that standard of living. [Applause.] It has been stated that the purpose of a sales tax is to destroy the income-tax system. That is true to-day as it was 10 years ago. That is the real purpose of it, and I quote as my authority for a recognized authority no less than the able and distinguished statesman who is the majority floor leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who, in a discussion of the tax bill on December 16, 1926 (Congres-SIONAL RECORD, page 928), when opposing a reduction of income taxes, said with prophetic wisdom:

You have secured a reduction in taxes which even the greatest malefactor among the malefactors of great wealth in this country dared not even to expect. In order to accomplish this you have removed the real captains of industry in this country far from the hope of reduction in their surtax rates, the men paying surtaxes on $44,000 and under. In order to accomplish this you have contemptuously hurled a present, a gift, a bribe of $10 each to 2,300,000 men in this country and have said to them, "We propose to go on in our career; we propose to steer in the direction of a to go on in our career; we propose to steer in the direction of a sales tax; and we have bribed you with $10; we have given you that, and you can continue to pay these sales taxes, and we are going to eventually increase them in periods of distress, when we need more money." You will surely need more money. The ordinary are sales to the continue to the continue to pay these sales taxes, and we are going to eventually increase them in periods of distress, when we need more money." need more money." You will surely need more money. The ordinary expenses of this Government have been increasing all of the time. * * The cost is increasing in almost geometrical ratio, and in time you will need more money, and you know it; and in time you expect to go to sales taxes, and as a step in that direction you strike down the income-taxing system of the country by striking the blow at both ends of it, at the top and at the bottom.

The other day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] the sales tax and referred to the American Taxpayers' League. We all know the Mr. Arnold and his league. I took the list of the American Taxpayers' League as contained in the report of the Senate lobby investigation. I took the 66 largest contributors to the American Taxpayers' League—that insidious lobby mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois—and I telegraphed all, asking their stand on a sales tax, and 63 of them I find are in favor of the sales tax, and here is a list of the largest contributors to Arnold's American Taxpayers' League and their stand on a sales tax:

Kellogg Co.....

300 Battle Creek, Mich.

I want now to point out in the few moments I have the unfairness exhibited in stating figures in estimates. Every time that an exemption was made the figures were exaggerated, and every time we added a tax or increased a rate the figures were minimized. Even though the increased pointed to the insidious lobbying and propaganda against rates on incomes will bring in no revenue, I say the new rates are not only useful but extremely necessary in the future. I am sure, however, that the increase which will be realized by the higher rates will be considerably more than now estimated by the Treasury Department. I again call the attention of the House to the estimates of experts made as to anticipated incomes in 1932, which I read to the House last Friday, and may be found in the RECORD of March 18, 1932. In the brackets between $100,000 incomes, up to the very limit of incomes over $1,000,000, the estimated income is no less than $1,006,000,000. This figure allows a most generous decrease from the known figures of 1930. It was based on the amounts of income in 1930 in accordance with the returns filed August 31, 1931. I mention this because of the ridiculously low estimate of the Treasury Department, the experts, and advocates of the sales tax. Figures are being distorted, scrambled, if not juggled, in order to create the idea that there will be little or no revenue from income taxes and that therefore a sales tax is essential. That is not so. I am certain and confident that the future will prove that a sales tax was not necessary, and that the increased rates on income, aside from the beneficial social purpose, will bring substantial increases in revenue. That is true also of the new schedules approved by the House in the Ramseyer amendment on inheritance.

It is true that in the case of inheritance tax the revenue or increased revenue may not be seen immediately, but, again, this is social legislation so obvious in its necessity and purpose that comment at this late hour is not necessary. We are by no means finished with this bill. Many new sources of revenue will be written into this bill. Many changes, I hope, in administrative features will likewise be written into the bill which will also bring additional revenue. I propose to offer an amendment to section 104 which embraces the subject of personal holding companies and surpluses created by undivided profits for the purpose of evading income taxes. This section has been a dead letter for many years. It has been only feebly, half-heartedly, and ineffectively invoked during the past few years. I propose to make it effective, to put teeth in it, and to add several millions of dollars annually to our revenue. I have already announced a proposed amendment providing a one-quarter of 1 per cent tax on the sales price of all stocks and securities sold on the various exchanges throughout the country and an additional one-quarter, making it a one-half of 1 per cent tax on all short sales made on the various exchanges. This alone, even in the period of depression, will bring in about $150,000,000, and in normal times will bring in well over $300,000,000 a year. Other suggestions which I have made are known to the House. I am confident that this odious sales-tax provision will be stricken from the bill. After that I will be glad to join and cooperate with the committee in bringing to the House other provisions less objectionable to raise the necessary revenue to meet the exigencies of our depleted Treasury. May I in passing recall that many of us predicted this very condition when we voted against tax reductions of 1924 and 1926, and particularly the last reduction of 1928? Many of us joined with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and the distinguished Speaker of the House [Mr. GARNER] in opposing income-tax reductions in the past to prevent sales tax in the future. As I have quoted from Mr. RAINEY, he pointed that policy out in 1926. We were against the sales tax then, we are against the sales tax to-day, and the opposition presented at this time by the House is indicative that we will defeat it within the next few minutes.

A great deal has been said about "soaking the rich." That, of course, is nothing but inspired propaganda, repeated with parrotlike stupidity. In one breath it is said the added rates will bring no income and the next breath that we are soaking the rich. Then it is said we are opposing a sales tax because we are soaking the rich. That, indeed, is a sad confession for these wise, trained, influential, and powerful patrons of intrenched wealth to make. How anyone could be so simple as to believe that this Congress of experienced and trained legislators will swallow a sales tax and believe the vicious propaganda against an income-tax system indicates only an arrogance and conceit created by successes of the past in obtaining legislation for a privileged class and protection for legalized exploitation. The depression at least has provided a liberal economic education for the people of this country. It will provide the planning and the beginning for an economic readjustment, and that beginning is right now in eliminating a sales tax and providing social legislation to eventually break up the concentration of the national wealth in the hands of a few individuals.

Reference has been made that a sales tax has never been approved or indorsed in any political platform of any party. That is so. It has never been openly advocated before any committee of Congress. It was brought in by imposition, misrepresentation, misstatements, false information, and veiled threats of what might happen in the future. It was exposed in public sessions of the House of Representatives after free, full, and frank debates, and the vote within a very few minutes, I am sure, will put an end for many years to come to any thought of a sales tax law in this country.

In closing, I submit that a great deal was said about the so-called generous offer of exemptions. Exempted food and wearing apparel, farm implements, and medicines were promised, and we rejoice with that. But when we took it home that night and analyzed what it meant, when we consulted with the so-called experts and officials of the Treasury Department, we found that instead of taxing a suit of clothes they taxed the textiles, the linings, the trimmings, the cloths, the buttons, and everything that goes into a garment, a dress, a coat, or a suit of clothes. Instead of taxing shoes they would tax the leather; so that all this is only a sham exemption, and the only way to protect the American public now is for all of us to stand together and completely knock this sales tax out of the bill. [Applause.] This is the big victory of a united and indignant protest. It is not only a victory against the sales tax, but for the first time we have been able to tear down sectional barriers, and the exploited people of the North have joined hands with the suffering folks of the South, and we have joined forces with the suffering farmer of the West, and for the first time special-privileged wealth has not been able to write a revenue bill in the American Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] is recognized for five minutes, which will consume all the time allotted under the unanimous-consent agree-

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, obviously I can not argue this bill in five minutes. I simply desire to assert again that in my judgment it is the most equitable way to balance the Budget, the way least injurious to the people and the least harmful to business.

I concede that all of the gentlemen opposing this bill are actuated by intelligence, patriotism, character, and love of humanity; but, gentlemen, you do not possess it all. [Applause.] Those who are advocating this bill also have those same attributes, and my record in this House for 20 years shows that I have stood for the masses of the people, and my life at home is an open book, and you can not make any of the working people down home believe I am not their friend. [Applause.]

Now, in normal times you can raise money from income and corporation taxes, and if business were normal to-day we could raise two and one-half or three billion dollars from the rates in this committee bill; but it can not be done today. With these increases, with the increase adopted on the floor of the House, only $295,000,000 additional has been raised, according to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. I had a letter from him this morning, in response to telephonic inquiry, saying that the receipts on March 15 were about $184,000,000. They had estimated $200,000,000 to be received during March. The payments up to date are $184,000,000. He says he does not believe the receipts would necessitate a lowering of the estimates, but it demonstrates conclusively the accuracy of the estimates, or that they are low, that they are conservative, and that the Government could not get any more money.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. No; I can not yield now.

If we can not get the money from these high taxes, if we are going to get it at all, we must go to some excise tax. Whether that is called a tariff, a sales tax, or a special levy on automobiles, tobacco, or any other property, it is a sales tax; and an income tax from corporations and individuals in business, so far as it is possible to pass it on, is also a

Now, Mr. Chairman, the die is cast. I am quiescent in your judgment. I have performed my duty. I hold no titular place of leadership on the Democratic side. During this Congress I have been given no preferment. I occupy the same place on the Ways and Means Committee that I did in the last Congress. By virtue of the illness of the chairman a responsibility was thrust upon me, and I have measured up to it to the best of my ability. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Any influence I may have in this House, be that little or naught, I have in my capacity as an individual Member, and in this conflict I have criticized no one. I have been true to my convictions, for what is best for my country, and I have no regrets and I have no apologies to make for my course. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement all time has expired.

The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] to strike from the bill the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon] be appointed as teller in my place.

The Chair appointed Mr. Ragon and Mr. Doughton as

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were-ayes 223, noes 153.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield for that purpose?

Mr. McKEOWN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that he may address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, what I am about to say is not said in any spirit of pique, of discontent, and with no criticism of any Member of this House who voted differently from me on the vote just had. That vote is conclusive. Under the understanding we had, as far as I am concerned, I shall not resist an effort to strike out any of the remaining paragraphs of the manufacturers'

I rise, gentlemen, to say this, and I say it impelled by a spirit of manliness and of fairness, that I have been turned down three or four times on the heart of this bill-the income tax, the normal and the surtax, the estate tax, and now the manufacturers' tax. Under the parliamentary law and rules of this House I have lost the right to further manage the bill. If any Member of the opposition desires to take charge, I will be only too willing for him to have that right. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

If the House desires me to do so, I am quite content to continue, as I have done in the past, to pilot the bill through the House as best I can, and I know that no Member of this body can truthfully say I have been discourteous to or critical of any Member of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, responding to what the gentleman from Georgia, the able acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has said, there is no desire on my part, and I am sure there is no desire upon the part of anyone-especially those of my comrades who fought with me in this battle on the sales tax—to take charge of the bill. I made my fight on the sales tax. I have had no disagreement with the committee as to any other provisions of this bill. I, of course, do not favor the oil tax.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. In view of the situation which now exists in the House in reference to this most important piece of legislation, and in view of the fact that the gentleman whom I am interrogating is a member of the committee, understands the necessities and prerequisites for writing a tax bill, and understands, I am sure, that no tax bill can be written on the floor of the House-I am sure the gentleman will agree with me in that—and that being true I would ask him if he will not now take the lead to recommit this bill to the committee where it may be studied and reported back to the House, so that we may have a bill which is not written in turmoil and under conditions where each man feels called upon to make a speech in behalf of something in his own district.

Mr. DOUGHTON. In response to the gentleman's inquiry I will say that I have never assumed, and do not now assume, to be a leader so far as this tax bill is concerned. Whatever disposition is to be made of the bill now I think should be decided by the House. That is too much responsibility for me to take.

I do not think it would be wise to recommit it to the Committee on Ways and Means; but if the Ways and Means Committee will suggest amendments that are constructive to take the place of those which have been stricken out, that will be entirely satisfactory to me. Whatever action the House takes will be my pleasure.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The other day, when we arrived at a point where the will of the House had been demonstrated, the committee rose and we met the next day. It seems to me we have arrived at a point now where it might be well for the committee to rise.

We can resume the consideration of this bill to-morrow, and by that time it will be pretty well known what the House desires to do.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma has the floor, but I want to announce that I have an amendment which I would like to offer as soon as the gentleman from Oklahoma offers his amendment.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I have some amendments to offer, and I think we can dispose of this amendment very easily.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. Under the action of the committee, paragraph (a) having been stricken out as amended, the next order of business is that the Clerk shall report paragraph (b), on page 226. Pending that, the gentleman from Oklahoma has offered a new paragraph to the bill, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield for that purpose?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will ask the gentleman from Washington to wait until my amendment has been read, and then I will answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKeown: Before paragraph (b) insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"(a) For the privilege of manufacturing for sale in interstate commerce, $50 for each $10,000 or major fraction thereof on articles manufactured and sold in interstate commerce;

"For the selling at wholesale goods, wares, and merchandise in interstate commerce, the sum of $50 for each $10,000 or major fraction thereof of goods, wares, and merchandise sold in inter-

"For the manufacture and sale of articles direct from manufacturer to consumer in interstate commerce, $100 for each $10,000 or major fraction thereof of articles manufactured and sold direct to consumer from manufacturer;

"For selling in retail in interstate commerce in the United States by national chain stores, $100 for each $10,000 or major fraction thereof of goods sold in retail in interstate commerce; "For sales by mail order, the sum of $100 for every $10,000 or major fraction thereof of articles sold in interstate commerce.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. This is clearly a matter to regulate interstate commerce, and is not germane to a tax bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. This is a privilege tax.
Mr. BLANTON. It is not germane at this point.

Mr. McKEOWN. It is as germane here as it is anywhere in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

This section is a manufacturers' tax, and my amendment is simply a tax upon the privilege of doing business in interstate commerce. My amendment is a tax not only upon the manufacturer with respect to the amount of interstate business, but it is also a tax upon the wholesaler engaged in business, and the amendment will raise the money. This amendment will balance the Budget.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the committee is engaged in the consideration of section 601, of which paragraph (a) has been read and has been stricken out upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, with notice that in the event that the paragraph was stricken out he would proceed to move to strike out the remaining paragraphs of the section. The amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma may be in order at some other point, but it is not germane to the matter which is now under consideration, nor does it come in its proper place immediately following the notice given by the gentleman from North Carolina, that in the consideration of section 601, after disposition of his motion to strike out paragraph (a), we will proceed with paragraph (b), and it is not germane to the subject matter that is now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Oklahoma is entitled to be heard upon his amendment offered as a new paragraph of the bill. The gentleman from North Carolina will be recognized as soon as that is disposed of. If the Chair had known the gentleman from North Carolina desired to offer a motion, the Chair, of course, would have recognized the gentleman.

The Chair overrules the point of order, and the gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I had no intention of trespassing upon his rights. I want to show you what my amendment does.

The proposition you are faced with is one of balancing the Budget, and we have been told that that was the necessity for the sales tax.

The proposal I have offered here is not a sales tax but is simply a privilege tax. It does not put all the burden on the manufacturer. It only costs the manufacturer or wholesaler $50, which is paid on each $10,000 or major fraction thereof on the business done in interstate commerce.

In other words, a factory in New York, if it did no business outside of New York, would pay no tax. If it did a business outside of New York it would pay $50 on every $10,000 worth of business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask you gentlemen one question. Are you in favor of going ahead and balancing the Budget? If you are, here is how you can do it. This proposal is not a sales tax, it is simply a privilege tax on manufacturers, wholesalers, mail-order houses, and chain stores for doing business in interstate commerce.

Mr. EVANS of California. How much will it raise?

Mr. McKEOWN. Over $700,000,000-enough to balance the Budget. You will have no trouble with the Budget if you adopt this amendment. There are $40,000,000,000 of business in the United States, a large part of which is done in interstate commerce, and if you put this amendment in your bill, you put a fair tax on the privilege of doing business in interstate commerce, your local manufacturer and your local wholesaler will not have to pay anything but their State tax-and that is heavy enough-and you will raise $700,000,000.

Let me tell you how much retail business national chain stores do in Texas. They sell in Texas $137,000,000 a year, a large portion of which is not taxed in Texas, $174,000,000 in Missouri, and these mail-order houses sell anywhere from 5 to 12 per cent of the retail trade of the United States. If you want something that will get money by a fair tax spread all over the territory, you should adopt this amendment.

Mr. MEAD. And it will have a tendency to localize business.

Mr. McKEOWN. It will have that effect. There are 354 national chain systems in this country, and this will bring in about $12,500,000. The manufacturer that sells direct to the consumer will pay $100 on every $10,000 of business.

Now, you say you want to balance the Budget. This will balance all of it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McKEOWN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. SWING. I object.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is necessary to discuss the objections to this amendment. I just want to call to the attention of the House the fact that by an impressive majority it has been indicated that this House is opposed to anything that will impose a burden of increased taxation on the consumer in the shape of a sales tax. A sales tax is a license to a person to do business. My friend from Oklahoma [Mr. McKeown] seeks to make a distinction and calls his plan a privilege tax and not a plain license.

The paragraph you have just defeated here carried a percentage of 21/4. The gentleman from Oklahoma submits one for one-half of 1 per cent. The only thing that you can make of it is that it is simply a sales tax on a smaller scale of percentage. There is a danger in his suggestion, not in the paragraph which has just been defeated, and that is the matter of pyramiding. The gentleman permits the manufacturer to pyramid, he permits the wholesaler to pyramid, and he permits the broker to pyramid, because he puts a tax on each one of them; and as the manufacturer sells to the wholesaler he would incorporate his tax, and as the wholesaler sells to the broker or the retailer he would not only incorporate his own tax but also the manufacturers' tax. So you would have a triple pyramiding right there at the beginning before it goes into the hands of the retailer; and if the retailer happens to be a chain store, he will pyramid it again. I greatly regret to be compelled to disagree with my friend from Oklahoma, but I think his amendment should be defeated.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAGON. With pleasure.

Mr. McKEOWN. The purpose of this amendment was obvious. It had no other purpose than to raise money to balance the Budget.

Mr. RAGON. And that is just exactly what we thought of the manufacturers' excise tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report paragraph (b). The Clerk read as follows:

(b) In addition to any other tax or duty imposed by law, there shall be imposed a tax of 2½ per cent ad valorem (except as provided in subsection (d)) on every article imported into the United States, unless—

(1) The consignee (within the meaning of the tariff act of 1930) is a licensed manufacturer (or his agent) and the article is an article for further manufacture; or

(2) The consignee (within the meaning of such act) is a registered dealer (or his agent) and the article is an article for further manufacture to be resold to a licensed manufacturer;

(3) The article is imported by a State or political subdivision thereof, or any agency thereof, for use solely in the exercise of a governmental function; or

(4) The article is specifically hereinafter exempted.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Doughton: Page 226, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "of 2½ per cent ad valorem (except," and in line 10, strike out all after the word "States" down to and including the word "exempted," in line 22.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to get rid of the import taxes, except on those enumerated in subsection (d). It strikes out the tax on everything else contained in this sales tax.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEWIS. If the amendment should be adopted, would that mean that the oil section of this sales tax bill would be also adopted?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It would be left as it is, for future action of the committee.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I appeal to the gentleman from North Carolina, that until we know more about what we have done this afternoon, either through the newspapers or through the RECORD or by radio or in some other manner, we better not adopt any more amendments. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina or the gentleman from Georgia or the gentleman from Illinois, to move that the committee do now rise, so that we may have a chance to ascertain what we have done, and I do this in the interest of orderly procedure and in the interest of the reputation of this House.

Mr. DOUGHTON. This merely completes the action proposed in my first amendment. I insist on a vote.

Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. In support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, and the paragraph as it will read if the amendment be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Doughton: Page 226, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "of 2½ per cent ad valorem (except," and in line 10 strike out all after the word "States," down to and including the word "exempted," in line 22.

So that the paragraph will read:

(b) In addition to any other tax or duty imposed by law there shall be imposed a tax as provided in subsection (d) on every article imported into the United States.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time simply to recall to the committee the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], that the real test on the sales tax will be made on paragraph (a). It will be recalled the gentleman stated that he would abide by the vote on the Doughton amendment and that he would not oppose further amendments to carry out the will of the House eliminating all sales tax provisions. That has just been stricken from the bill by the committee. The amendments which will follow are simply carrying out the will of the committee. I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts does not want the record to show, to use his own words, that "no one here knows what the committee has done today." I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if he does not know what we did to-day he is the only person in the United States who does not know it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. For the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UnderHill], I will say that what we did was to strike out paragraph (a) of section 601, which means that the House disapproves of the sales tax and that it is entirely stricken from the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield, now? Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. Mr. UNDERHILL. What did we do before that?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Before that we adopted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], with other amendments exempting additional articles, and now it all went out of the window. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I know the gentleman from New York is trying to be fair.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The confusion for the moment was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] to strike out certain words, from line 7 to line 10, reading-

In addition to any other tax duty imposed by law there shall be imposed a tax as provided in subsection (d) on every article imported in the United States.

Now, we are ready to start writing a tariff bill. Let us write it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The section before the House, which the gentleman from North Carolina would strike out, is simply a compensating tariff to make up the 21/4 per cent manufacturers' tax, if that had been accepted. It is, so to speak, the enacting clause of the provisions that follow. That leaves sufficient wording in the paragraph to carry out the intent as to the import tax, in the event that paragraph (d) remains in the bill. Please note that all that is left is the necessary enacting clause for the import provisions of paragraph (d). If paragraph (d) goes out of the bill, then according to the unanimous consent already obtained by the gentleman from Georgia we revert back to (b), and the remaining provision goes out, too.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It was the understanding between the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and with the committee that if the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to strike out paragraph (a) prevailed, then the gentleman from Georgia and his committee would offer no resistance whatever to the other motions of the gentleman from North Carolina to strike out succeeding paragraphs in the sales-tax section, and they are offering no resistance.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; of course not. That is clear. The House having voted against the sales tax, all reference to it by agreement will go out, as a matter of course.

Mr. BLANTON. So there ought not be any trouble about this present motion to strike out that portion of paragraph (b) within the agreement made.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course not.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, may I make this suggestion. in the interest of all of us and in the interest of the bill: I think, according to the vote of the committee a while ago, the manufacturers' tax title is eliminated, and, as far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to give unanimous consent to strike out all of the remaining paragraphs relating to the manufacturers' sales tax.

There are three or four other items in that title that are not connected in any way with the 21/4 per cent manufacturers' sales tax. For instance, there is a provision there levying a specific tax upon lubricating oil, on imported oil and gasoline, on wort, and on grape concentrate. I would like to see this done, if it is agreeable to the House-to strike out the remaining sections of that paragraph, then let the committee rise and to-morrow begin consideration of these special items left in the tax title. I will call the Ways and Means Committee to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. If this agreement is accepted, this will be notice to the Committee on Ways and Means that they are called to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. Then I hope the Committee on Ways and Means may be able to recommend to you again some other provisions to raise revenue. Whether or not it meets your approval is for you to decide when it comes in.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the gentleman think that after his meeting to-morrow morning in the Committee on Ways and Means the committee is at all likely to give serious consideration to that revenue-collecting measure called a tax on beer, that will provide five or six or seven hundred million dollars of easy money for the Treasury?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think so, but the gentleman from New York to-morrow is going to offer an amendment to that effect, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will have an opportunity to express its view about it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Do I understand that the gentleman states he has agreed to take out all the manufacturers' sales tax provisions of this title, and that will also include the 30 per cent manufacturers' sales tax on malt and malt sirup used for food, used by bakers, and used for medicine for children?

Mr. CRISP. No. My request would be to leave in all these special excise taxes for the committee to consider when they next get the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Well, that is a manufacturers' sales tax of 30 per cent.

Mr. CRISP. Instead of being 21/4 per cent, that is 30 per cent.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] begins with section (b). Under the gentleman's arrangement, the gentleman would propose to strike out the remaining part of the section down to (d), line 9, page 228; beginning with line 7, page 226, strike out down to and including line 8 on page

Mr. BLANTON. But the pending motion ought to be adopted first.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, after conference with the majority leader and some of the others, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the situation is perfectly simple. The sales tax has been defeated. There is no question about that. Nobody knows that better than I do. The motion offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] is a perfecting motion. It is to take from the bill every vestige of the sales tax and leave these other things, like malt sirup and the rest of them.

The whole matter is settled when there is an affirmative vote on Mr. Doughton's amendment. It ought to be unanimous and get through with it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE SALES TAX

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the result of the long and hard fought "consumption-tax" proposal is found in the vote by tellers that rejected the tax 223 to 153, or a majority of 70 against the tax. This speaks for itself.

For many years foes of the income-tax proposal have contested at every step every effort to "tax according to ability to pay." With annual incomes ranging from below $10,000 to $10,000,000, and with $3,500 exemptions for married couples, many of these men bitterly fought the first income tax law at every step. Finally they won the first battle by a 5 to 4 decision in the Supreme Court, which declared that law unconstitutional. Then the people of this country became aroused and wrote into the Constitution the sixteenth amendment, which contained a specific provision that "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes." This Congress did a second time.

Again great opposition influences sought to have the Supreme Court set aside the will of the people by a decision exempting undistributed corporation profits and "stock dividends" that thereby avoided distribution of profits. Again the Supreme Court by a 5 to 4 decision partially emasculated the income tax law by holding such tax evasions could not be reached by Congress. Thereupon an estate tax law to reach tax-free securities, and when avoided by gifts during life a tax has been placed in the pending bill to prevent evasion of the tax.

In the RECORD of March 11 and 17 I disclosed at length how favored holders of large wealth have constantly sought to evade this law in Congress and in the courts. That tax now graduated from 1 to 20 per cent, with $3,500 exemption, only averages 10 per cent on incomes of $100,000 annually and 20 per cent above that large return. Graduated increases should be averaged accordingly. I absolve the committee from any unfair purpose, but its unanimous and sudden report to lay a $600,000,000 increased tax on consumption necessities of 120,000,000 people, whether rich or poor, with an estimated increase in prices on such necessities of possibly over $2,000,000,000 annually, is hard to understand. Many men of large wealth have heretofore advocated a sales tax to be substituted for the Federal income tax.

A sales tax with increased rates is urged by Mr. Hearst and many others "to replace the income tax." Not one tax expert of standing has recommended this unjust tax, while I have offered testimony from a score of high-class experts who in the past have appeared against any such indefensible proposal that tax is now defeated.

Letters of commendation are many. One at hand reads:

Dear Mr. Frear: I congratulate you on the letter opposing a sales tax you sent your fellow Members. If you will furnish me

* * of this letter I will mail one to every official of the Farmers Union * * *.

Yours truly, JOHN A. SIMPSON, President.

In support of the splendid contest waged by others who took over the burden that was largely mine, when last before the House, I sent the letter which reads:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., March 21, 1932.

Washington, D. C., March 21, 1932.

Dear Colleague: The Democratic leader closed a tax debate Saturday, March 19, by charging that House action resenting a sales tax and increasing income taxes was "nearer communism than any other country in the world except Russia." That same day the politically powerful Hearst papers demanded a "Federal sales tax and excise tax, to replace the income tax." That is the issue. The income tax has always been fought in Congress and in the courts by wealth. What about "communism."

Shortly after the revolution, with Senators King and Ladd, I traveled 8 000 miles through Russia interviewing workers on farms.

traveled 8,000 miles through Russia interviewing workers on farms, in mines, in factories, President Kalinin, and others. Their revolution, they alleged, resulted from concentration of practically all wealth in the hands of the czar and nobility, accompanied by extreme poverty of the masses and cruel oppression. That resulted in Russian communism.

Our Government is founded on the Constitution and equal rights of its citizens. We are representatives of the people, responsible in part for their welfare, and none would exchange this Government for any other. In this land, however, men like Rockefeller, Ford, the Mellon, have amassed wealth in single families reported to reach 10 figures. Thousands of others have accumulated large fortunes until we are advised 5 per cent of our people now own or control 75 per cent of all the fluid wealth of the country. A balanced Budget is also now demanded.

The issue is a $600,000,000, with added profits, consumption tax suddenly presented. It is offered as an alternative for a "Treasury tax" program. No reason is offered for confining legislative action to either.

In the Record of March 17 President Green, American Federation of Labor, is quoted saying this tax will increase cost of "clothes, shoes, necessities, including a large percentage of foodstuffs. It will "add to the misery, want, and woe now in the land." The National Grange writes 27,000,000 people on farms will be further oppressed by the proposed tax. The Farm Bureau says a sales tax is based on "the necessity to consume." The Farmers Union says this tax has aroused more apprehension than any other measure since the war. The National Democratic Convention, 1924, declared, "We oppose the so-called sales tax * * that unfairly shifts to the consumer the burdens of taxation."

England has always rejected it. Our income-tax ra'es are far lower than those of England, France, or Germany. (Record, p. 6393.) So, too, our estate and other taxes. Tax experts and eminent authorities quoted in above Record all denounce a consumption tax, now planned to relieve the rich by "soaking the poor." If once adopted, it can not be removed. Green, Simpson, Gray, Brenckman, and others warn us against a tax that encourages "communists" more than any act ever before pressed on Congress Congress. These officers speak for many millions of our people.

Lest we forget, we represent them too.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES A. FREAR.

I do not believe any further attempt will occur this session at either end of the Capitol to enact a consumption tax. After some experience in the circuitous methods of procedure used by agencies that have attacked the income tax repeatedly in Congress and the courts, I do say the tax will again bob up and find many supporters, who again will seek with holders of large wealth and large incomes to substitute some form of sales tax for the tax on incomes and estates.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1590. An act granting certain public lands to the State of New Mexico for the use and benefit of the Eastern New Mexico Normal School, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

4890. By Mr. ALDRICH: Resolution of Polish-American Citizens Club, of Anthony, R. I., urging passage of House Joint Resolution 144, directing the President to proclaim October 11 of each year as General Pulaski Memorial Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4891. By Mr. BEAM: Resolution by Group No. 110 of the Polish National Alliance, memorializing Congress to enact House Joint Resolution 144, to proclaim October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4892. Also, resolution by Group No. 2653 of the Polish National Alliance, memorializing Congress to enact House Joint Resolution 144, to proclaim October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4894. By Mr. BOHN: Petition of McArthur Auxiliary, No. 29, United Spanish War Veterans, Cheboygan, Mich., indorsing the Gasque bill, H. R. 7230, granting pensions to widows of all wars; to the Committee on Pensions.

4895. By Mr. CRAIL: Petition of the Women's Law Observance Association of Los Angeles, Calif., protesting against the repeal, resubmission, revision, or nullification of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4896. By Mr. EVANS of California: Petition signed by the Granada Park Woman's Christian Temperance Union, protesting against any resubmission of the eighteenth amendment: to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4897. Also, petition signed by approximately 29 residents, protesting against compulsory Sunday observance; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

4898. By Mr. EVANS of Montana. Resolution of Montana State branch of the National Woman's Party, urging submission to the States for ratification the equal rights amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4899. By Mr. FRENCH: Petition of 12 citizens of Washington County, Idaho, protesting against compulsory Sunday observance; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4900. By Mr. GARBER: Petition of Beaver Post, No. 149, American Legion, Beaver, Okla., supporting the payment of adjusted-compensation certificates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4901. By Mr. GILCHRIST: Petition signed by 112 citizens of Burt, Iowa, and vicinity, protesting against the admission tax on the lower admission classifications and any sales tax, stating that such tax would be injurious and detrimental to the business in their community; also stating that such a tax would result in the closing of many theaters in their territory and further increase the number of unemployed; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. John Compton Ball, pastor of the Metropolitan Baptist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, as we bow in Thy divine presence this morning, we are not unmindful of the solemnity of this day and what it commemorates in the history of the world. As far as we are able to measure time, one thousand nine hundred and two years ago Thou didst reveal unto us, through Thy Son, the greatest evidence of love which our hearts have ever known; and we come in deep gratitude to Thee and thank Thee for what was done by the Lord Jesus Christ for us on Calvary's cross and to pray, as He prayed, that not His will but Thine might be done. So in our hearts and in our lives may our will be submitted to Thine in our own personal affairs and with regard to the greater affairs that have to do with our land. Let Thy blessing rest upon all our deliberations to-day that we may look upon Thee, not merely as a God of power and of might and of wisdom but a God of love who is leading us, we believe, among the nations, and who hast for us the desire that we usher in the kingdom that shall bring peace throughout the length and breadth of the earth. To this end, guide every one of us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, evidently there is not a quorum present. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 33]

Abernethy	Dyer	Kennedy	Sirovich

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty-four Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that my colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Lozier] is absent in Missouri, where he will deliver the keynote speech as temporary chairman of the Democratic State convention.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert a very instructive cartoon in the Record.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BOYLAN. I understood, Mr. Speaker, it was optional or discretionary with the Committee on Printing, and may the matter be referred to them, sir?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's remedy is to apply to the Joint Committee on Printing or to change the statute in this particular.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

THE UNKNOWN SOLDIER

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the Record a speech made at the auditorium in the Arlington National Cemetery on May 10, 1931—Mother's Day—on the subject "I Knew the Unknown Soldier," by Hon. Ruth Bryan Owen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. RUTH BRYAN OWEN, OF FLORIDA, AT ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY, MAY 10, 1931

I knew the Unknown Soldier, that composite of the youth of our Nation and of other nations who answered the call to arms in the World War.

I first saw him as he marched through the streets of London, one of the "first hundred thousand." The sky was heavy with clouds and the pavements dark and shiny with rain. Only a few of the troops were clad in military uniforms. Many marched just as they had left the bench in the factory or the stool in the office. We were almost within sound of the guns there—thundering guns heralding the oncoming storm of war. So certainly were these first troops under sentence of death that there was no cheering in the streets as they passed. Bystanders with bared heads stood at attention in silence. But the Unknown Soldier was singing as he strode along. "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary," he sang to the thud of tramping feet on the wet pavement.

I saw him again where he was sent back to a rest camp on the edge of the desert after months of fighting. There was not much to suggest repose in that cluster of blisteringly hot tents set down

I saw him again where he was sent back to a rest camp on the edge of the desert after months of fighting. There was not much to suggest repose in that cluster of blisteringly hot tents set down in a waste of yellow sand. But there was a chance to slacken taut nerves and tired muscles. In the big recreation pavilion there were concerts under the flare of gas lights, while silver moonlight whitened the sands of the desert all around us. I wondered why the troops liked to sing these plaintive home and mother songs, with an ocean and a battle front separating them from their own firesides. Leaning back against the rough benches, with half-closed eyes, they sang about the long, long trail a winding to the land of their dreams. And they whistled tunes from the music halls with a lilf and a swing to them, and forgot for an hour the mud and blood and anguish of the front line.

I next saw the Unknown Soldier when a slight wound had sent

I next saw the Unknown Soldier when a slight wound had sent him into one of the stationary hospitals. Neither wound nor hospital discipline could quench his infectious good spirits. I remember we had a little table on wheels which carried surgical dressings from one bedside to another. When the nurses were out of the ward for a moment he would parade down the aisle between the beds, pushing the table before him in a wonderful burlesque of a proud father wheeling his baby through the park. He patted the carbolic bottle on its head and straightened the bows of its imaginary cap, to the noisy delight of the bedridden patients. He had smuggled a banjo into the ward, and at moments when no watchful eye was on him, out it would come from under his pillow and the patients who should have been resting quietly were waving a hand or nodding a head in time to his music. Although the nurses were obliged to repeat the rules to him severely, we could scarcely hide our smiles. to him severely, we could scarcely hide our smiles.

And how we all crowded to the window for a last glimpse of him

And now we all crowded to the window for a last glimpse of him when he was well enough to leave the hospital!

A strong offensive was about to begin. Train after train carried new reinforcements toward the firing line. Our discharged patients, with all their active-service kits swinging from their shoulders, were crowding the station platform, and while we watched them swinging along, we heard the order, "Get ready 500 beds; they will be needed after this attack."

I did not see the Unknown Soldier as he met the last shock of battle, but I received a letter which was taken from his pocket as he fell. A wave of our troops was sweeping forward when a as he fell. A wave of our troops was sweeping forward when a bursting shraphel halted him. A comrade stooped over him where he had fallen with a mortal wound. There was only time to seize the little metal disk with his name and to take from his pocket two letters which were all addressed for posting—one letter to his mother and the other which came to me. A little later when the tide of battle turned, retreating regiments swept back over the same ground, obliterating every trace which would identify him. identify him.

It is not necessary to read his letter. Its words are indelibly ritten in my memory • • • . "I send this on the eve of the written in my memory * * * . "I send this on the eve of the offensive," the letter ran. "I have been thinking how fortunate my life has always been. I have had the best parents in the world and a wonderful home. So far my life has been all accepting. I've never given back, in return, any service to society. But while I have been out here at the front, I have had a lot of But while I have been out here at the front, I have had a lot of time to think, and I have been planning ways in which I believe I can justify the opportunities I have had. I have thought out how this life of mine can be made to fit usefully into the Bigger Plan * * *."

Then there was a line drawn across the page, with these words:

"But if you receive this letter, it means that I will never be able to pay my debt to scolety."

able to pay my debt to society."

He could not know how fully he paid that debt, but all the world knows. That is why they have raised a memorial to him in Westminster Abbey, where a nation's great lie sleeping, and at the heart of Paris's Arch of Triumph. It is the reason why our own Nation has built and dedicated this marble amphitheater above the Potomac, within sight of the Nation's Capitol, and all the world comes here to pay him tribute.

Heroes returning from the conquest of the sea or the earth or air share their laurels here. Presidents and kings bring their wreaths of palm, and little children with field flowers in their hands, come to learn their first lessons of devotion to country. To-day the mothers of America, recipients of the Nation's affection, lay their wreaths upon the tomb of this sleeping boy

"Sleep on, brave heart, the drums are mute, The birds in woodland call Where cannons roared, the summer's flute Holds listening world in thrall, he glory yours. The night's deep calm The glory yours. Her wings your field enfold. Sleep on, unknown, beyond life's harm Beyond the dawning's gold.

"Mourn not, dear ones, the tears will pass The requiem chant is sweet, But I sleep not beneath the grass, Beneath the poppies' feet. Beyond the shining morning bars, Where phantom hosts have trod, I walk the highway of the stars And I have seen my God."

THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. My understanding under the unanimousconsent agreement is that when we finish this section of the bill we are to turn back to page 36 and begin reading where we left off: is that correct?

Mr. CRISP. No; it is not exactly correct. The understanding was that we were to first finish this title.

Mr. RANKIN. I meant the title; yes.

Mr. CRISP. And then we are to turn back to page 36. Mr. RANKIN. Is this the last amendment to this title?

Mr. CRISP. I can not tell how many amendments to the amendment will be offered or how long the debate may run, but when this title is finished, then, under the unanimous-consent agreement, we turn back to page 36.

Mr. RANKIN. And begin reading where the Clerk left off?

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that we will not now finish this title and take up the oil paragraph?

Mr. CRISP. No; oil is in this title, and I think that will be disposed of before we turn back to page 36.

Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment to offer. The CHAIRMAN. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that paragraph (b) has not been read.

Mr. CRISP. My amendment is to paragraph (d). I shall have to wait until the Clerk has read the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it. Mr. STAFFORD. In the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina striking out certain portions of the first part of subsection (b) no reference in the amendment was made to the last parenthesis. Can the Chair inform the committee what the status of the amendment is so far as the parenthesis is concerned?

The CHAIRMAN. Referring to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, the Chair will state that unanimous consent was given for the Clerk to make any typographical corrections that may be necessary.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) The tax imposed under subsection (b) shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the tariff act of 1930, and shall be treated for the purposes of all provisions of law relating to the customs revenue as a duty imposed by such act, except that—

(1) the value on which such tax shall be based shall be the dutiable value (under section 503 of such act) of the article, plus the customs duties, if any, imposed thereon under any provision of law:

(2) for the purposes of section 489 of such act (relating to additional duties in certain cases of undervaluation) such tax shall not be considered an ad valorem rate of duty or a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value of the

(3) such tax shall not be imposed upon any article imported prior to the date on which this title takes effect;

(4) no drawback of such tax (except tax paid upon the importation of an article described in subsection (d) (4)) shall be allowed under section 313 (a), (b), or (f) of the tariff act of 1930 or any provision of law allowing a drawback of customs duties on articles manufactured or produced with the use of duty-paid materials;

(5) such tax shall be imposed in full notwithstanding any provision of law or treaty granting exemption from or reduction of duties to products of any possession of the United States or

of any country; and

(6) when he deems such action to be in the interest of the revenue, the Secretary may direct that such tax with respect to any class of articles designated by him shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law as the tax imposed by subsection (a).

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, yesterday when we had the test vote on the manufacturers' tax title, which was eliminated, it was understood that the remaining sections in the paragraph of the manufacturers' tax title were to be eliminated. The gentleman from North Carolina offered an amendment to strike out the paragraph, and incidentally it was so drafted that it had the effect of removing other excise taxes to be levied in the United States on wort, malt, lubricating oil, and that was not intended by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The effect of that amendment was to leave these items in the bill and make them subject to these high rates of duty for import and no tax on them at all if domestically produced.

Of course, that was not intended. The intention was to eliminate all of the manufacturers' tax proposition and leave these items in the bill for this committee to consider, if the committee desires to amend them or strike them out entirely. It was to leave the matter for your determination as to these matters.

Now, to try and carry out what was really intended and to put the matter before you where you will have the opportunity to consider these items as to whether or not you desire to leave these high taxes on domestic production of these commodities, the committee has prepared an amendment, which I desire to offer as a substitute to paragraph (d).

That amendment simply proposes that there should be levied and collected on these articles—lubricating oil, malt sirup, wort, concentrates of grapes, and imported oil, just as it was in the original bill.

It will be subject to amendment, just as in the original bill. You can offer amendments to it or move to strike it out.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that the tax embodied in the gentleman's amendment referring to malt, is the same in principle as the manufacturers' sales tax of  $2\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, which has been stricken from the bill, only it is more obnoxious, for instead of having a tax of  $2\frac{1}{4}$  per cent, you have singled out malt, including that which is used by the housewife and children for food and medicine, and put a manufacturers' sales tax of from 30 to 40 per cent on it.

Mr. CRISP. I think it is a sales tax.

Mr. SCHAFER. It will be subject to 30 or 40 per cent manufacturers' sales tax.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

I want to get the matter clear as to what is really to be collected on imported articles. The Clerk has read paragraphs (c) and (d), which pertain to imported articles, with a tax of 2¼ per cent in addition to present tariff duties.

They must be still in the bill, because the Clerk has read them. Will a motion be made to strike them out, or is it the intention to keep that tax on imported articles?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman's inquiry is an intelligent one, and I shall try to answer it. That is kept in temporarily because in this amendment, that was in the bill and is a tax on imported oil and gasoline. If this committee should decide to retain the tax on imported oils and gasoline, that section is necessary. If the committee should decide not to tax imported oils and gasoline, then we will go back and move to strike out.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Following that up, subdivision (b) puts a tax on every imported article. Why do you have to retain that in the bill if you want to tax only oil?

Mr. CRISP. It is because in the scheme of the bill that is to apply to imported articles, and this text deals with imported articles, and if the committee retains this text on imported articles, this is necessary; if it does not, it is unnecessary.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that in the adoption of the Doughton motion with respect to striking out portions of paragraph (b), and in such connection reforming the provisions of paragraph (d), that the provisions of paragraph (d) in effect were adopted by the committee already?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. If they were adopted, as the gentleman knows, if the parliamentary effect of the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina in striking out portions of paragraph (b) affecting paragraph (d) is to approve of paragraph (d), then there could be no action now by the committee to affect that paragraph.

Mr. CRISP. I do not think it has that parliamentary effect. The parliamentary effect of this bill up to date is that there would be these high tariffs levied on imported wort, malt, and no tax whatever on domestically produced wort, malt, and so forth. Under the bill as written there would be a tax on imported oil, but the whole policy of the Committee on Ways and Means—and I have tried to acquiesce in it—has been to give Members full opportunity to express their will, to vote on everything that they wanted to vote on, and the effect of the amendment I shall offer is simply to give the House a chance to vote as to whether or not it desires to place these high taxes on wort, lubricating oil, grape concentrates, and the tax on gasoline, and this will be subject to amendment just the same as the original text.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not also subject to a point of order because the gentleman is trying to put into the bill what we took out yesterday?

Mr. CRISP. Oh, no; we did not take that out.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman made the statement that we took out the excise levy on the products manufactured in this country, and left in the bill provisions for the tax on imported products. Therefore, if the gentleman's statement is correct, his amendment is not in order because he is trying to put back into the bill an excise tax on products manufactured in this country, that we took out yesterday.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is in error. The committee has never passed on whether there would be this special excise tax on wort. The committee under the parliamentary rules of this House voted to strike out the provision levying the two and a quarter per cent manufacturers' sales tax. It had nothing to do with this wort proposition. This wort simply happens to be in the same title. I can not yield further to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yesterday in the preliminary process, prior to the beginning of the reading of the bill, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] undertook to guarantee quite a number of us with regard to our requests to offer certain amendments.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, I never guaranteed anything.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the gentleman was good enough and said that he would try to protect us in the right to introduce amendments.

Mr. CRISP. I shall do that, but I can not guarantee anything that this House will do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Quite true. Mr. Chairman, a great many Members are here with amendments with regard to goods from a country where convict or near convict labor is used. One gentleman will offer an amendment pertaining to matches, another amendment will be offered on coal, one on oil, one on manganese, one on lumber, and thereafter I expect to offer a blanket amendment for all, as a substitute for any of the 1-item amendments that may be adopted. Now, under the plan of the gentleman from Georgia, will there be an opportunity to offer these amendments, or should they be offered as amendments to the amendment the gentleman proposes now?

Mr. CRISP. I think they could be offered either way, provided they are germane. I think this proposition has nothing to do with that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But the amendments could be offered as amendments to the amendment the gentleman from Georgia is offering.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; if they are germane.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Do I understand the manufacturers' tax is taken off wort and malt by the gentleman's amendment, and that then there is a tax on imported wort only?

Mr. CRISP. Under the technical effect of the drafting! of the amendment yesterday, that is the effect of it. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] will confirm me that it was not intended to do that. It is intended to still leave us those subjects in the bill, subject to special excise taxes, for the committee to decide whether or not it wants to keep them.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Do I understand that the gentleman's amendment will place malt and wort in the bill again subject

Mr. CRISP. The amendment I shall offer, if the committee adopts it as written, yes; but when that amendment is under consideration the Committee of the Whole has a perfect right to move to strike out any of these paragraphs and eliminate them from the amendment.

Mr. LARSEN. And how much revenue does that involve?

Mr. CRISP. About $50,000,000.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Without going into the merits of the provisions now, I believe the gentleman is trying to straighten out the parliamentary situation. After the amendment was offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] I called the attention of the House to the fact that there was some confusion as to its meaning. and I called the attention of the House to the fact that what it did was to strike out the sales-tax provision in section (b), leaving in it the import provision.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman has seen this amendment. Does not the gentleman think what I am trying to do is to get the matter fairly before the House?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I think what the gentleman's amendment does is to bring back the articles enumerated in paragraph (d) before the House as they were originally intended in the bill.

Mr. CRISP. That is exactly what it does.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. For a decision on the merits?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I will say for those on this side of the House who supported my amendment that it is not the purpose and intention to have this paragraph covered by my amendment. I will say distinctly that that should not be covered by my amendment. In order to be consistent I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia should be adopted.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman said in reply to the gentleman from Maryland that this amendment would restore the 21/4 per cent sales tax on these items.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, no. The excise tax. The sales tax is eliminated, gentlemen. I am not going to advocate that.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. LaGUARDIA. The statement made by the gentleman from Georgia; I have seen his amendment and it is an amendment to paragraph (d). We have not yet reached paragraph (d).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) In the case of the following articles, the tax imposed by this title shall be at the following rates:

title shall be at the following rates:

(1) Lubricating oils, of the grades designated (at the time of the enactment of this act) by Society of Automotive Engineers viscosity Nos. 20 to 70, inclusive, 4 cents a gallon.

(2) Brewer's wort, liquid malt, malt sirup, and malt extract, fluid, solid, or condensed, if containing less than 15 per cent of solids by weight, 5 cents a gallon; if containing 15 per cent or more of solids by weight, 35 cents a gallon.

(3) Grape sirup, grape concentrate, and evaporated grape juice, if containing more than 35 per cent of sugars by weight, 40 per cent of the basis on which the tax is computed under subsection (a) or (b) of this section or section 603, as the case may be.

(4) Crude petroleum, fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil

(4) Crude petroleum, fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and gasoline, imported into the United States, 1 cent a gallon; but no article described in this paragraph shall be exempted upon importation from tax under this title as an article for further manufacture, and no credit or refund of tax imposed upon the importation of any article described in this paragraph shall be allowed under section 605 (a).

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OSIAS. Has paragraph (c) been acted upon, or should it not be acted upon before the committee amendment to paragraph (d) is acted upon? I wanted to offer an amendment to paragraph (c).

The CHAIRMAN. Paragraph (c) has been passed. It is too late to offer an amendment now. The gentleman should have offered it when the paragraph was read, which the gentleman did not do.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRISP: Page 228, strike out lines 9 to 24, both inclusive, and lines 1 to 5, both inclusive, on page 229, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(d) There is hereby imposed upon the following articles sold in the United States by the manufacturer or producers, or imported into the United States, a tax at the rates hereinafter set forth, to be paid by the manufacturer, producer, or importer:

"(1) Lubricating oils, of the grades designated (at the time of the enactment of this act) by Society of Automotive Engineers viscosity Nos. 20 to 70, inclusive, 4 cents a gallon.

"(2) Brewer's wort, liquid malt, malt sirup, and malt extract, fluid, solid, or condensed (unless sold to a baker for use in baking or to a manufacturer of malted milk or medicinal products for use in the manufacture of such products), if containing less than 15 per cent of solids by weight, 5 cents a gallon; if containing 15 per cent or more of solids by weight, 35 cents a gallon.

"(3) Grape sirup, grape concentrate, and evaporated grape juice, if containing more than 35 per cent of sugars by weight and not containing preservative sufficient to prevent fermentation when diluted, 40 per cent of the price for which sold or, in case of such articles imported into the United States, 40 per cent ad

"(4) Crude petroleum, fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and gasoline, 1 cent a gallon; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles."

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I make a point of order against the amendment, that the amendment is an attempt to place into this bill and before this committee for action a provision which this committee had before it yesterday and acted upon and removed from the bill. I do not believe we require any more authority than the statement already made on the floor of the House to-day by the distinguished parliamentarian, the gentleman from Georgia, the acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. CRISP.

The gentleman calls the tax, as enumerated in this section, an excise tax. When we refer to this section we find that it refers to the manufacturers' sales tax of 21/4 per cent, and particularly refers to that tax in such a manner as makes this section a manufacturers' sales tax. In fact, the section, instead of providing for 21/4 per cent manufacturers' sales tax, directly and specifically provides for a manufacturers' sales tax in some cases as high as 30 and 40 per cent.

The distinguished parliamentarian, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp], a few moments ago on the floor of the House indicated that it was necessary to adopt the pending amendment which he has offered, and incorporate it in the bill in order to tax the products enumerated in his amendment, if they were produced in this country.

The gentleman maintained the position that without this amendment the tax would be levied only on these products listed in the gentleman's amendment in case they were imported, and therefore it is necessary to adopt the gentleman's amendment in order to place a tax on those commodities manufactured in this country. We therefore admitted that on yesterday when we adopted the Doughton amendment. We struck this sales-tax provision from this title in so far as relating to American-made products. Very clear and logical reasoning, because, reading the entire title of the section, the language which refers to these various items upon which it is proposed to levy an excise or sales tax refers to a manufacturers' sales tax as provided in this title shall be along the line of the amounts enumerated in the gentleman's amendment.

It is clear that if the Chairman follows the position of the expert parliamentarian, the acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. Crisp], the Chair should have no reluctance in holding that the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has given consideration to the question raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin as the debate proceeded. The Chair is clear that the amendments are germane and in order, and the Chair overrules the points of order.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Cullen to the Crisp amendment: At the end of the Crisp amendment insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"That there shall be levied and collected on all nonintoxicating beer, lager beer, ale, porter, or other similar nonintoxicating fermented liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight brewed or manufactured and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a tax at the rate of 3 cents per pint, such article to be bottled at the brewery: Provided, That no such article shall contain more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight: And provided further, That the manufacture and transportation of such articles shall be conducted under permits to be issued in accordance with the national prohibition act and under such regulations, including assessment and collection of the tax, as shall be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General of the United States: And provided further, That no such article shall be permitted to be transported into any State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, the laws of which forbid the manufacture or sale thereof."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the amendment, that it is not germane either to the bill itself or to the section to which it is offered, or to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, and that it is clearly in contravention of the Constitution of the United States and of the Volstead Enforcement Act. I want to be heard on the point of order just a few minutes, if the Chair pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I know it has been ruled by several very distinguished parliamentarians who have occupied the chair at various times, and also by several Speakers, that neither the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union nor the Speaker had anything to do with constitutional question. I realize that; but it seems to me that for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to do that or for the committee, following his ruling, to do that which is a futile thing, which is a useless thing, and which will cause nothing but trouble, expense, and harassment to the Nation, would be out of all reason and ridiculous.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman is out of order in not discussing the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I am addressing my remarks to the Chair on my point of order and I submit to the Chair that I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is in order. Mr. BLANTON. That which is a futile and useless thing and that can only cause trouble and expense to the Nation should not be done by chairmen of committees or by Speakers. If an attempt were made to carry out the amendment and manufacturing of 2.75 per cent beer should occur thereunder by brewers, as is suggested by this amendment, it would be in clear violation of the Constitution of the United States, and the Supreme Court would so hold. So the whole action of the House in passing such an amendment would be a futile thing, and the Chairman has the prerogative and the right, if he sees fit, to disregard these precedents and to establish a new and proper precedent of his own.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas permit the Chair to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman making the point that the Chair should capriciously and of his own motion undertake to set aside well-established precedents of the House?

Mr. BLANTON. If in doing so the Chair would do the right thing; yes. I want to call the Chair's attention to a precedent on that point, which was finally upheld by the House and is the rule to-day of this House. For many years, if the Chair pleases, there were points of order made to what was known as the garden-seed appropriation in the agricultural bill. Chairman after Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had ruled that it was in order, and different Speakers of the House had sustained the rulings of such Chairmen. Speakers, on motions to recommit, had held it in order. There were precedents after precedents upholding it by some of the very best parliamentarians in the country. Then one day there sat in that chair a distinguished parliamentarian from Connecticut, who was once the distinguished leader of the Republican Party, our colleague the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Tilson], than whom there is no better parliamentarian in the United States nor one more honest or fearless. [Applause.] He sat in that chair, and a point of order was made against the garden-seed appropriation and he disregarded the previous precedents and sustained the point on the ground that the appropriation was against the law; that there was no substantive law authorizing it. There was an appeal taken from his ruling to the Committee of the Whole, and the Committee of the Whole voted to sustain his action. Then the question went to the Speaker, and Mr. Speaker Gillett sustained the action of Chairman Tilson and of the committee and held it was against the law. That is the ruling to-day. So bad precedents may be set aside and disregarded.

While I am not sure that I even have hopes that the present Chairman will exercise that prerogative on this question, and he may have decided that there should be a vote on it, yet he has that right to disregard existing precedents if he wants to exercise it. He can overrule these precedents; and if he believes this is clearly unconstitutional and that it is really a futile thing, he has the right to rule that this amendment is unconstitutional and to rule it is out of order.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLANTON. I will yield if I still have the floor. I have the floor by the sufferance of the Chair.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has been designated by the Supreme Court to make this advance ruling?

Mr. BLANTON. No. But I am a practitioner before the Supreme Court and have been such a sworn officer of the Supreme Court of the United States for quite a number of years. I have the right to speak as a lawyer in this case.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But not for the court.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is my duty as a lawyer and a Representative in Congress of the people of the United States not to vote for and help to pass a law which I firmly believe to be in contravention and violation of the Constitution of the United States, which I am under solemn oath to uphold and defend without evasion or equivocation. We can defeat this proposed beer amendment, but it is my opinion that the Chair should sustain the point of order.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the Chair only a moment in making one or two observations on the point of order.

I believe the amendment is germane to this bill. The Committee on Ways and Means, which prepared the bill, considered it and voted it down, but that committee considered it as being germane.

This is a general bill raising taxes and many items are enumerated in it; for instance, wort, malt, and other things. Whether a constitutional question is involved or not is a matter for the House to consider as to the merits of the amendment, and it is for the House to determine whether they will adopt the amendment. I believe it is germane.

I simply desire to share any responsibility that might attach to the Chair should he rule it is germane by making this statement. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair bear with me very briefly on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOCH. It seems to me that the question is not entirely free from doubt from a parliamentary standpoint. On the question of whether it involves something unconstitutional, of course, we will agree that an amendment which may be unconstitutional may at the same time be germane, but it seems to me it is not the Constitution that is involved here but rather the enforcement act.

Now, what does this amendment propose to do? It proposes to levy a tax upon the sale of certain liquors with alcoholic content of more than one-half of 1 per cent. Under existing law the sale of such liquors is unlawful. I am not talking about the Constitution; I am talking about the enforcement act.

Now, one of two things must be true. Either this amendment involves a change of existing law, and if it does, clearly it is not germane to the bill; if it involves an amendment to the Volstead Act, clearly it is not germane to this bill; or if we take the other view of it and say that the result will be that no tax will be collected, since it will still be unlawful to offer any of these liquors for sale, then we have declared that the amendment is an utterly futile thing and can be nothing but a mere gesture. Now, you have to take one of the two horns of that dilemma—either it is not germane or it is an utterly futile thing.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Do not some of the States, for example, tax gambling devices, the use of which would be unlawful and illegal, and does not, for example, the Income Tax Unit collect an income tax upon the profits of bootleggers?

Mr. HOCH. I do not think that has anything to do with the parliamentary question, but I might ask the gentleman whether he believes we should try to collect a tax upon a thing which it is illegal to do?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; we do that all the time.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman will permit, if the language of the bill to which the pending amendment is directed is germane, certainly, the amendment is germane, for this reason. You can not hold that the amendment is not germane on the ground of interfering with prohibition enforcement, because there is not one Member of this House who can name one thing that you can use brewers' wort for except to make wildcat brewery beer, in many cases by the Capone gangsters with an alcoholic content of 9 per cent. With respect to the enforcement of prohibition angle, to-day there are 60 gentlemen in the dry State of Michigan under indictment for violating the prohibition law by reason of their activity in the wort industry.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, of course I am not debating the merits of the matter at all. I was simply attempting to present this point as to the change of existing law involved in the amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I took part in the ruling to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] referred, on the seed amendment, having made the point of order which was sustained by the gentleman from Connecticut, I merely want to remark that there was no settled, definite, or final determination of the House upon that question. It had been ruled on variously from time to time, and the question was recognized as largely political.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen] has offered an amendment, which has been reported at the Clerk's desk and which now appears in the Record. A point of order is interposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] that the amendment is not germane either to the bill or to the amendment to which it is proposed.

The Chair is very clearly of the opinion, from an examination not only of the precedents but of the bill itself and the amendment, that the amendment is germane at the place at which it is offered, and the Chair will very briefly state the reasons that have led him to this conclusion.

It is not the purpose of the Chair to render any elaborate decision upon the proposition. In its very essence the bill pending before the House is a bill to raise revenue. It is entitled "To provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes." The section of the pending bill to which the amendment is offered undertakes to raise taxes by levying an excise duty on a number of enumerated articles. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the additional article of taxation sought to be set up by the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen] merely provides another and an additional source of revenue. The Chair is very clearly of the opinion, and believes he is sustained by precedent and reason, that it comes clearly within the proposition heretofore decided, and decided many times in the Committee of the Whole, "that to a bill raising revenue by several methods of taxation, the Committee of the Whole "-and in this instance they overruled the decision of the Chairman of the committee-" held an amendment proposing an additional method of taxation to be germane."

It seems to the Chair that this precedent, which could be supported by many others, clearly announces a general proposition of germaneness with reference to revenue bills.

It is not the legitimate province of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to set himself up as a judge to determine whether or not a proposed amendment is constitutional or unconstitutional. It is not the proper province of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to undertake to determine whether or not it may, by inference, repeal some other existing law. As a matter of fact, for aught appearing on the fact of this amendment, it makes no reference whatever to any existing law and, as stated, in the amendment, only refers to nonintoxicating beverages, and, so far as the Chair has learned, the Supreme Court of the United States itself has not gone to the point of determining that 2.75 per cent beer is, as a matter of fact, an intoxicating beverage. So that although, of course, this amendment does not express the personal views of the Chair, the Chair feels inclined, by precedent and by reason, to hold the amendment germane, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. CRISP rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. CRISP. To see if we can get some agreement as to the time for debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I will ask unanimous consent that there be 40 minutes' debate on a side, the time for those in favor to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen], and in opposition, the time to be controlled by myself, for I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that debate on the Cullen amendment shall be limited to 80 minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen] and one-half by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I make the point of order that the arrangement to control the time can not be agreed to in committee. The agreement as to the time to be used in debate can be, but its distribution should be controlled by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Texas, that it is usual primarily, where the time is limited in committee, that the time shall be controlled by the Chair, but the Chair feels that there is no hard and fast rule in regard to it, and especially where the Chair desires to be relieved of the responsibility.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen] for five minutes.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the Government of the United States at this time faces a most grave and serious economic crisis. We all know that the operating expenses of our Government exceed its income, and this deplorable condition not only affects the stability of our Government but likewise affects the welfare of each individual citizen.

With that realization in mind, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House has reported to the House a revenue bill, H. R. 10236, after months of careful consideration which has been of a wholly nonpartisan nature.

As a member of this committee and as one who has taken an active part in its many deliberations on the subject of revenue, I feel that I am well qualified to speak of the wonderful cooperation and spirit shown by my colleagues, and which I am thoroughly convinced has by this time been amply demonstrated to the House in Committee of the Whole.

We have endeavored to the best of our ability to present to the House for its consideration a revenue bill which has for its purpose the balancing of our National Budget. I, for one, am willing to admit that any revenue bill is deemed obnoxious and unpopular with the Congress and the people. However, those of us who have our country's welfare at heart fully realize the necessity of the passage of such a measure.

I want to reiterate that the bill has been prepared by our committee without a feeling of partisanship, and we have endeavored to the best of our ability to report to the House a bill which would not in any way be unjust or discriminatory against any class or group of individuals.

It is my purpose at this time to submit to the House for consideration an amendment which, if adopted, will bring into the Treasury in the neighborhood of $450,000,000 without disturbing any industry but the bootlegging industry. My amendment would permit the manufacture of 2.75 per cent beer, and taxing it would yield the Treasury between $350,000,000 and $450,000,000 in revenue.

What could be more fair and equitable and at the same time would not be an additional burden upon industry but, on the contrary, would lighten the burden of industry and give employment to several hundred thousand people.

The Congress could adopt my amendment without any constitutional difficulty. We need only define the difference between the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment to prove my contention. To amend the eighteenth amendment we would have to get a two-thirds vote of Congress, while as to the Volstead Act we only need a majority vote to legalize and define what should constitute intoxicating beverages.

If we are rational and fair-minded we must realize that legalizing 2.75 per cent beer would meet with the approval of the vast majority of our people.

The American Federation of Labor, which in its adopted policies represents the viewpoint of the poor man, has gone on record favoring the return of beer. In addition we have the great American Legion, the American Medical Society, the American Bar Association; and numerous other prominent and reputable organizations are advocating the restoration of the beer industry, not only as a means of raising revenue but also to give real relief to a vast number of our people who are at present unemployed. The legalization of beer would make a new industry in the United States; it would bring to this industry new capital and incidentally bring happiness to millions of our people.

I would like to discuss for a few moments the situation as it exists in other countries in regard to the industry. In Great Britain approximately one person out of every six finds employment in connection with the brewing of beer in that country. In France and Germany, by reason of the numerous sidewalk restaurants, gardens, and entertainment halls, the ratio is substantially greater.

It is important to know that in addition to the persons directly employed in the brewing of beer there are others who are vitally affected, such as the railroads, farmers, truck drivers, glass workers, bottle manufacturers, and any number of other industries which time does not permit me to enumerate.

In connection with these remarks I am primarily concerned with the revenue features of this proposed amendment, although I realize there are many other important features in an amendment of this kind.

The sanest way of approaching this tax problem would be by way of spreading the tax burden in such a way as not to lay an undue burden upon any particular class of people in the country. I am thoroughly convinced that if my amendment is adopted and a tax is placed on 2.75 per cent beer, the burden will be lifted considerably, and, furthermore, the revenue can be easily checked because we collect it at its source and the Government could have in its Treasury within 30 days after the passage of the bill the revenue from this industry for the purpose of the necessary functions of Government.

In conclusion I would like to quote you a paragraph from the life and writings of Thomas Jefferson on the question of taxation:

I rejoice, as a moralist, at the prospect of a reduction of the duties on wine by our National Legislature. It is an error to view a tax on that liquor as merely a tax on the rich. It is a prohibition of its use to the middling class of our citizens and a condemnation of them to the poison of whisky, which is desolating their houses. No nation is drunken where wine is cheap, and none sober where the dearness of wine substitutes ardent spirits as the common beverage. It is, in truth, the only antidote to the bane of whisky. Fix but the duty at the rate of other merchandise, and we can drink wine here as cheap as we do grog; and who will not prefer it? Its extended use will carry grog; and who will not prefer it? Its extended use will carry health and comfort to a much-enlarged circle. Everyone in easy circumstances (as the bulk of our citizens are) will prefer it to the poison to which they are now driven by their Government. And the Treasury itself will find that a penny apiece from a dozen is more than a groat from a single one.

[Applause.]

Mr. GRANFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield.

Mr. GRANFIELD. The gentleman's amendment will provide about $350,000,000 in revenue in the course of a year.

Mr. CULLEN. Up to $450,000,000.

Mr. GRANFIELD. And may I further suggest to the gentleman from New York that it is authoritatively computed, and these figures are reliable estimates, that our Federal Government, and our State governments, and their political subdivisions have sustained a loss in revenue since the enactment of the eighteenth amendment, a sum equivalent to $12,000,000,000. This sum, as the gentleman well knows, would stem the ever-increasing tide of deficit. The adoption of the gentleman's amendment would prove a real stimulus to business in our country, as well as giving replenishment to our depleted Treasury.

Mr. CULLEN. The gentleman is right. I want to say further, that if my amendment is adopted, it will bring nearly $450,000,000 a year toward the amount stricken out by the sales-tax provision.

Mr. CELLER. The tax provided for in the gentleman's amendment amounts to about $7.50 a barrel?

Mr. CULLEN. About that.

Mr. CELLER. And during the war, the tax was $6, and this will be higher than the war tax?

Mr. CULLEN. On the basis of $7.50.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLEN. I yield. Mr. BOYLAN. Is it not a fact that the tax collected on beer, according to the gentleman's amendment, would only come from the consumers of the beer? Those who did not consume the beer would not pay any tax.

Mr. CULLEN. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I accord to my colleagues who are proposing and supporting this amendment the same sincerity of purpose as I claim for myself in opposing it.

If it were just a question of raising revenue, with equal excuse and propriety we could pass a law establishing and taxing an international lottery here in the city of Washington that would easily raise revenue of several billions of dollars a year; but it would not be wise, it would be against the best interest of our people, and not a colleague here would entertain that proposition for one moment, regardless of the amount of revenue that it would raise.

If it were just a question of raising revenue, we could pass a law providing for and taxing prize fights and cock fights and bull fights here in the Nation's Capital and have every expert along those lines come here from Germany, Spain, and Mexico to compete, and such taxes would raise lots of revenue.

We could legalize and tax many other demoralizing attractions, such as open gambling houses, that would provide revenue. We could out-Reno Reno and provide for divorces here in the Nation's Capital that could be gotten overnight, filing the bill one day and getting the decree rendered the next day, and thousands of rich spouses would gladly pay an enormous tax for that privilege, and people would no longer go westward to Reno but would flock to Washington. But who here among us would entertain for one moment a proposition of that kind?

It is against the fundamental law of the land to manufacture or sell intoxicating liquors. That is the Constitution of the United States, that we are sworn under solemn oath to uphold, without evasion and without equivocation. Is this proposed amendment to legalize beer, that we all know will be intoxicating, upholding the Constitution without evasion? My friend from New York [Mr. Cullen] is frank enough and intelligent enough to admit that if you were to pass this amendment, you would legalize the manufacture and sale of beer of 2.75 per cent alcoholic content, and that such beer would have plenty of kick in it to satisfy.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. He admits that.

Mr. CELLER. Does the gentleman admit it? Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I admit it. And all of us admit it. That is just what is intended. That would be a violation of the Constitution. My friends know it, and my friends here know that 2.75 per cent beer is intoxicating. My friends here know, and I know, that if we were to authorize 2.75 per cent beer the manufacturers would fudge a little just as they have always fudged in the past, and they would have 4.75 per cent and 5.75 per cent whenever they got ready, and whenever they were haled into court they would bring in their expert chemists, who would swear that it was only 2.75 per cent alcoholic content. Would not that be a ridiculous situation?

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. BLANTON. Please let me finish my statement, and then I will yield. I have only five minutes and would like to make a connected statement, then I will gladly yield to any and all questioners. Would not that be a ridiculous situation? And just how would we square ourselves with the oath we have taken to uphold and defend the Constitution without evasion?

Mr. CELLER rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Just one moment, please. I hope my friend will first let me finish my statement. I see every distinguished wet in Congress here to-day. They are all here, and they are here for a particular purpose. They are here to try to vote intoxicating beer into the law of the land against the Constitution and against the Volstead Act, even though they designate and call it "nonintoxicating."

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Please let me first make my connected statement, and then I will gladly yield. I want to make my statement in a connected form. I am allowed only five minutes and have been interrupted repeatedly. If you were to bring in a bill here to amend the Volstead Act, my friend from New York [Mr. Black], whom we call "the great chief justice," knows that that would go not to the Committee on Ways and Means but to a committee of lawyers, the Committee on the Judiciary. It could not go to the Ways and Means Committee, yet this bill comes from the Ways and Means Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more so that I may yield to answer questions. The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CELLER. I object.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means for 8 weeks and the Members of the House during the past 10 days or 2 weeks have had a very serious responsibility. None of us have any desire to increase taxes. There is not one of us who wants to vote for any item going into the revenue bill which increases taxes upon any particular class of our citizens, and particularly upon the worker or upon business.

This is a time when we should, if possible, relieve the burdens of taxation, but unfortunately the state of our Treasury is such that the best interests of the country compel thinking minds to a realization that it is essential to balance the Budget for the fiscal year 1933. The Committee on Ways and Means considered the problem just the same as you gentlemen here are considering it, and practically every member of that committee, in my opinion-and I am not undertaking to quote any member of the committee—as well as practically every Member of this House, would like to be able to modify or repeal the Volstead Act if he had the opportunity. In my opinion, within 10 days the Volstead Act would be repealed if the Representatives in both branches of Congress felt that they could carry out the views of the people of their various districts or States. I realize the difficulty that confronts some Members of the House that come from districts where the sentiment is considered to be in favor of prohibition, or where the division is close. Under the theory of representative government, some Members feel that they should carry out the wishes and will of the people of their districts. I realize, in talking with many of them, that if they felt the sentiment of the people of their districts was different they would have no hesitation in trying to bring about a more rational condition under our prohibition laws.

We are now confronted with a national emergency, where we have to raise money, and the proposition before the committee now will raise from $350,000,000 to $400,000,000. It is the proposition to legally permit the manufacture and sale of 2.75 per cent beer. That is what the liberals on this question have in mind. I do not believe in making an idle gesture. When the motion was made, it was for the purpose of manufacturing and selling beer if the amendment should pass both branches of the Congress. The adoption of this amendment would assure the balancing of the Budget and lift a great load from the shoulders of the taxpayers. But I have also in mind another important aspect, and that is the problem of unemployment. At the present time there are approximately six to eight millions of our citizens out of work, with millions of others on part-time employment. We know from actual experience that machinery has been intensely and extensively used in industry during the past 10 years, and that the result of such use has produced an evil that we must solve. It is conservatively estimated that at least 2,000,000 workers are unemployed at the present time as a result of the substitution of machinery for human labor. This is a big problem and is connected up with the economic feature of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York. We need new business in order to reabsorb into industry our workers who have been displaced by the extensive use of machinery. This is the only industry that I see on the horizon which, as a result of its recreation, would tend, directly or indirectly, to afford employment to at least 500,000 of the workers who have been displaced. The adoption of this amendment will also bring about a great reduction in the cost of government—not only to the Federal Government but to the several States of the Union.

Not only will this amendment bring revenue into the Federal Treasury, but it will also produce revenue for the several States of the Union and their subdivisions, whose people view this question from a liberal angle.

I respect the viewpoint of the men who differ with me; but, frankly, under our dual system of Government, I can not see where, if one State desires to have prohibition exist, it should say to a neighboring State or some other State or States in other parts of the Union, "You shall not." There is much more that could be said on this question, but five minutes is a very limited period to make a detailed statement of my views. However, the adoption of this amendment, from an economic angle, will result in the raising of a tremendous sum of money for the Treasury at a time when we need it, will likewise similarly assist some of our States and their subdivisions, relieve the burden of taxation for all of our people, and permanently help to solve the problem of unemployment.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I favor the relegalization of beer at 2.75 per cent alcohol by weight, which is equal to 3.46 per cent alcohol by volume. This beer would be nonintoxicating and would yield the Government, on a basis of 66,000,000 barrels of beer per year that was brewed in 1917, $500,000,000.

The first clause of this amendment taxes an article described as—Nonintoxicating beer, lager beer, ale, porter, or other similar non-intoxicating fermented liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight.

The article is stated to be nonintoxicating within the limit of 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight.

It may be "brewed or manufactured" and sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States by whatever name called. The tax is then imposed at 3 cents per pint, and the article must be bottled at the brewery. This language alone would be sufficient to legalize any such product as nonintoxicating and therefore valid under the eighteenth amendment, which forbids only intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. The first proviso, however, expressly forbids a greater alcoholic content than 2.75 per cent by weight. This plainly amends the national prohibition act as to alcoholic limit.

But the proposed amendment goes further. Its second proviso requires that—

The manufacture and transportation of such articles shall be conducted under permits to be issued in accordance with the national prohibition act and under such regulations, including assessment and collection of the tax, as shall be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General of the United States.

Thus the entire system of the present national prohibition act governing issuance of permits is made applicable to the manufacture and shipment of these nonintoxicating articles within the limit of 2.75 per cent of alcoholic content by weight. The present law regulates and controls and requires permits for the manufacture of one-half per cent alcoholic fermented liquor. The language last quoted, therefore, amends the national prohibition act by applying the permit system thereof to the manufacture of the proposed non-intoxicating beer. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General are given power to make regulations governing the manufacture of the newly authorized product as well as governing the assessment and collection of the tax thereon.

The last proviso of this proposed amendment states that-

No such article shall be permitted to be transported into any State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, the laws of which forbid the manufacture or sale thereof.

This final language adds to the national prohibition act an appropriate provision under the powers of Congress by which a State forbidding the manufacture of any beverage containing one-half per cent or more of alcohol is fully protected from the importation into its territory of proposed nonintoxicating 2.75 per cent beer.

In other words, no brewer would be authorized by his permit to ship his product into a State forbidding manufacture or sale of such an article. His Federal permit would be revoked if he made such shipments.

This amendment, if adopted, will by its simple language simultaneously amend the national prohibition act as to alcoholic limit in nonintoxicating beer and tax the product made thereunder.

The enactment of this amendment will result in the investment of between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000 in the rehabilitation of breweries, the greater part of which will go to labor, including, as the American Federation of Labor states, employment in all the building and mechanical trades. It will restore a great tonnage to railroad traffic in the way of materials into the breweries, products shipped out, and returned bottles and boxes. It will benefit the coal industry. It will result in the immense purchases of bottles, boxes, labels, and other supplies. It will greatly benefit agriculture. It means the purchase of thousands of automobile trucks by the breweries. [Applause.]

Stuyvesant Fish, president of the Illinois Central Railroad, when the national prohibition act was enacted, stated the loss of the brewery business would be disastrous to the railroads. Time has demonstrated the truth of his prophesy.

This amendment means the restoration of an industry to the United States without violation of the principle of the eighteenth amendment. This will be a continuing industry, with vast expenditures in the rehabilitation of the industry and thereafter continued benefits to farmers, to the building and mechanical trades, and all of the host of industries that would be called to the assistance of the brewing trade in rebuilding the breweries and in continuing their operation.

This will also aid agriculture on a basis of one bushel of barley for every barrel of beer that is manufactured, which would on a basis of 1917 output give the farmer the sale of 66,000,000 bushels of barley; that is, aside from hops and other ingredients used in beer. As this business grows, as it surely will grow, the farmer will have the advantage of any increase in the sale of his product. Within a 2-year period, it was estimated, it will run to at least 120,000,000 bushels of grain. Taking 120,000,000 bushels of grain as a basis of all the grain that goes to the primary market, it would take away from the cash sales of grain at least one-third of the grain sold on a cash market, and that would increase the price of the product of the American farm equal to 15 cents a bushel.

Gentlemen, considering all of the advantages in starting a new industry on such an extensive basis as opening the breweries and starting the wheels of progress going to make a product that is nonintoxicating, that will drive out the bootlegger, do away with the illicit sale of beer, and give the people of the United States a good, wholesome health beverage, it seems to me that any Congressman, regardless of what his district contends, could see his way clear to vote for a bill of this character, and I hope everybody on the floor of the House who desires to bring back prosperity will support this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Then the Sugar Trust is getting the benefit of the sale of the product rather than the farmer?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. To that extent; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, the wets offer to drink up the deficit. If that offer is not accepted, then we are going to ask the drys to balance the Budget. [Laughter and applause.]

They say prohibition is the child of the church. As soon as the child was born it was turned over to the Government, and then the Government brought it up as a bandit. Now we want to take away the swords and pistols from the bandit and send it back to the church, and at the same time we want to turn to the underworld of criminals and assassins and bootleggers and highjackers, to whom we have given the great liquor traffic of the United States, and say to them, "Prohibition has financed crime, and we intend to take back from you this magnificent industry and make it finance the Government of the United States." [Applause.]

It is time for the drys to be patriotic.

I listened in the debates to the demand made on everybody to sacrifice economic views in order to balance the Budget. I say to you now with wealth facing crushing taxes, and with the effort by the sales tax to levy on the back of poverty the deficit of the Government, prohibition is on the spot. Wealth, to save itself, must drive prohibition from the statute books. Poverty, to save itself, must drive prohibition from the statute books. Those who stand in the way will be swept aside, for this Nation will no longer permit prohibition to finance crime and drag down Government; will no longer permit prohibition to have a deficit in the Federal Treasury. We have had dry Congressmen, dry Senators, and dry Presidents for 10 years, and now we are faced with a dry deficit.

The drys have got to back up from their law of hypocrisy and folly and balance the Budget of the United States.

To-day business after business is crashing down into bankruptcy because of the weight of the taxes levied to support the Government. The only business that is not crashing down is the business of crime. Crime, if we want to hit it a death blow, must be broken by breaking the back of prohibition.

Every economic argument of prohibition and every spiritual argument of prohibition has been found fallacious. You have not closed jails and insane asylums; you have not brought prosperity to the people; you have not bettered government; you have not bettered the home; and you have not lifted up the ideals of the people. All of this is false, and America in this dread hour facing the insolvency of the Government, intends to take back from the world of crime and hypocrisy one of its greatest business enterprises, tax it, and make the Government sound, solvent, and secure. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, this matter of modification of the prohibition enforcement act, so as to permit the manufacture and sale of a nonintoxicating beverage, with 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, has been before the Judiciary Committee of the House for a good many years. I was on that committee when the resolution was presented for the eighteenth amendment and during the days when the enforcement act was considered. During all of this time and since it has been given consideration.

I was one of those—and probably the first one—who introduced a bill, years ago, to modify the enforcement act so that this beverage could be manufactured and sold. We had extensive hearings for weeks in a number of sessions. The evidence before the committee showed that 2.75 per cent of beer by weight is not intoxicating. We had before us scientists, chemists, and people from all sections of the country who were capable of testifying upon that subject, and not in one single instance was any substantial evidence presented contrary to the fact that it is nonintoxicating. I think that is established. I think that is accepted by the whole country.

When the matter was brought before the House for consideration, I was one of those who urged that we confine it to the percentage of which I have spoken, because I do not think there is any question about the fact that 2.75 per cent by weight is nonintoxicating.

The testimony before the committee went into other matters. One was upon the question of temperance. Every man and every woman in America is in favor of temperance. It was shown by men and women who testified before that committee that if we would permit the manufacture and sale of a nonintoxicating beverage, it would result in a lot of people quitting the speak-easies, drinking corn liquor, and patronizing illicit stills, as well as drinking the highly alcoholic beer that is now available. Also that it would result in 60 per cent of the people who want something of that nature to drink being satisfied with this beverage.

Gentlemen of the committee, this is a most important matter for us to consider, especially in view of the conditions which exist in this country to-day. You can not go into any community without being able to buy highly intoxicating beverages and alcoholic drinks of all kinds. You find stills in every city; you find speak-easies in every city and in most every State of this Union. You find that in the South they have 40,000 bootleggers who sell corn liquor. Therefore, we must all agree that the bootleggers, the stills, and the speak-easies are now sapping the lifeblood of this country, financially and otherwise.

If we will enact this legislation, it will bring temperance. It will not only bring about temperance but it will aid in the enforcement of law.

The people of the United States, Mr. Chairman, as they have expressed themselves many times in various elections upon referendums and otherwise, have shown that they do not consider that the Government was fair to the people when it enacted into law the Volstead Act that says that one-half of 1 per cent or more is intoxicating and shall not be manufactured. They agree that the definition of one-half of 1 per cent, as put in the enforcement act defining what is intoxicating liquor, is neither scientific, honest, or truthful. They say, in effect, that if you place in the law such a dishonest and untruthful statement touching what is intoxicating they will not participate in the enforcement of such a statute.

I call your special attention to the question of revenue. The Wickersham Commission estimated that in 1930 the Department of Justice, exclusive of the Prohibition Bureau. spent $12,137,239 in the prosecution of prohibition cases and in the handling of prohibition prisoners. To the Wickersham estimate for 1930 we have added the increase in the department's budget for 1931, exclusive of the Prohibition Bureau. This increase, $3,200,000, if added to the Wickersham Commission's estimate for 1930, brings the total to a little over $15,000,000. This sum is less than half of the total budget of the Department of Justice, exclusive of the cost of maintaining the Prohibition Bureau. In 1931 twothirds of all criminal cases in the Federal courts and onehalf of the civil cases to which the United States was a party were prohibition cases. Over two-thirds of all Federal prisoners were sentenced for violating national prohibition laws.

The direct cost of prohibition enforcement may be safely estimated at $51,000,000. If we deduct $4,000,000 for fines and penalties collected annually, the net cost of enforcement for 1931 comes to roughly $47,000,000.

The total cost of prohibition enforcement from 1920 to 1931 may safely be estimated at $370,000,000. Of this, $233,000,000 involves outlays of the Prohibition Bureau, the Industrial Alcohol Division, and the Coast Guard. These figures are official. During this period we estimate that the Customs Bureau has spent $35,000,000, while the Department of Justice has spent $97,000,000. If we deduct fines and penalties collected during this period, approximately $60,000,000, the net cost of prohibition enforcement for the first 12 years has been $310,000,000.

The Federal Government ended the fiscal year 1931 with a deficit of $903,000,000. According to Secretary Mellon, we shall incur a deficit of $2,123,000,000 in 1932, and a deficit of $1,417,000,000 in 1933. The inability of our Federal Government to balance its Budget for a 3-year period has made Federal taxation and finance a national emergency.

When we complain of mounting taxes, we seldom think that in preprohibition days the United States Treasury used to receive $600,000,000 yearly in internal revenue from a moderate tax on liquor. Since 1918 the Government has passed up about $7,800,000,000 from this source alone. This astounding total does not include the revenue lost by States and municipalities—also running into billions.

Restoration of legal beer, according to informal opinion of the late Actuary McCoy, of the Treasury Department, whose estimates were accepted as gospel by the House Ways and Means Committee, will produce $1,000,000,000 a year in additional income for the United States.

Of this sum the Treasury would get about $250,000,000 annually, assuming that the tax on beer will be between $3 and $5 a barrel. Beer was taxed $3 a barrel in 1918, and in that fiscal year a total of 50,266,216 barrels was consumed, providing Federal revenue of $150,789,648. During the war the tax was raised to $6 a barrel. Additional revenues would be provided States and municipalities through license | to manufacture 2.75 per cent beer. One hundred and fees, thereby helping to relieve the deficits faced by the States and cities.

In 1914, the peak year of the brewing industry, when 66,-189.473 barrels of beer were manufactured, there was a total of $792,914,000 invested in the industry and $46,767,000 in the malting industry. There were 1,347 brewing and malting establishments employing 77,364 men whose wages totaled $83,378,000.

The Fuel Administration estimated in 1917 that 123,666 carloads of freight were involved in the beer industry, including coal, brewers' materials, machinery, beer in kegs and bottles, and grain.

Restoration of beer would stimulate markets for grain, for automobiles, for cooperage, machinery, bottles, coal, building materials, and real estate. Restoration of beer probably would place 100,000 men at work at a minimum

Taxes have been raised on the farmer, the home owner, the manufacturer, the business man to make up for the revenue lost through the adoption of the eighteenth amend-

England has increased her internal-revenue tax substantially in order to meet budget needs. If the United States imposed the same rate, it would receive at least $3,000,000,000 annually and our national liquor bill would not be half what it is to-day under the tribute levied by bootleggers, gangsters, and corrupt politicians in the Federal service, States, and municipalities. Towns and cities would get an income from licenses that would ease the burden on real estate, industry, and business.

Whatever else prohibition may have done or not done, it has certainly convinced hotel men that they are in the wrong business. One New York hotel that was making a profit of $800,000 a year a few years ago is now in the hands of a receiver. Another big hotel lost a million dollars last year, and another lost $1,200,000. It may interest you to know what has happened to income taxes formerly paid by corporations operating hotels. There will be no income from that source in 1931 or 1932.

This is stated merely as a matter of interesting fact. Nothing will be done about it, or can be done about it, for the present. Customers of New York hotels sleep in the hotel, eat and drink in the speak-easy.

This reference to hotels can be made to apply equally to other lines of industry and business.

How long, Mr. Chairman, will the people of the United States stand for this? Shall we return to normalcy and saneness or continue to be fooled and deceived by the proponents of prohibition, most of whom have no other object in life but to deceive and misrepresent as to this eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if it is possible to assess a painless tax, you have it here. This is a tax which will be cheerfully paid. It is the only tax you can conceive of that you can assess where you can help the unemployment situation. [Applause.]

The city which I have the honor to represent has over 100,000 people out of employment. Before the eighteenth amendment became a part of the Constitution the brewing industry was one of our industries. Picture, if you will, one plant that takes in as much ground as the acreage from the Lincoln Memorial to the Navy Yard and from Pennsylvania Avenue to the Potomac River, with 32 railroad tracks running into its yards and 125 buildings upon its property, employing 25,000 or more people. You put it out of business overnight. It was sending its products to every corner of the globe; and when you enacted prohibition, you simply destroyed the trade of that corporation and transferred it to some other corporation in a foreign land. You put 200,000 people out of employment in this country. Did you stop the making of beer? No; some foreign country increased its output and took over the trade this St. Louis brewery formerly controlled.

Two hundred thousand people, at the lowest estimate, will be placed at work if the brewing industry is permitted over the convention which wrote it. Without him it could twenty-eight million bushels of grain which your farmers raise will be used in the manufacture of beer.

You have an opportunity here to-day to bring to the Treasury of the United States between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000. to place men to work, to provide a market for your surplus grain. The amendment protects the dry States. No permit can be issued by the Prohibition Unit unless the State laws permit the manufacture and sale of 2.75 beer. Your position will be the same as it is to-day, provided you desire to remain dry. Could anything be more fair?

You tax malt and wort to be used for the manufacture of illegal beer. Why do you draw the line; and why not provide for legal beer? Oh, some say, it will impede the progress of the bill if you add the amendment. On the contrary, it will hasten the enactment of the bill, because it will provide the additional money needed to balance the Budget.

You say you need money. Here you can secure the money, and the only industry that will be affected is the bootlegging industry. A vote against this amendment is a vote for the bootlegger. A vote for this amendment will help the farmer. will increase the price of his grain.

I want to ask some of the gentlemen from the rural districts to realize how many farmers it takes to raise 128,-000,000 bushels of grain. I get the figures from the Treasury Department. Then vote for this amendment and put your farmers to work. By so doing you will absorb your surplus of grain.

The brewery industry is ready to begin work to-morrow. You see, you can help the unemployed and at the same time you can raise the money that you need to balance the Budget.

If this is not a political bill, as has been stated here on the floor-if it is an American bill, as you claim-you have the opportunity here to do something for your country by voting for this amendment.

What objection can the people in Florida have if the people in Missouri want a glass of beer? We do not seek to control you by dictating what beverage you use.

Do not complain if taxes are levied on the goods you produce in your States if this amendment fails. The money is going to be raised in some way. If you accept this proposition, you are sure to eliminate a tax on automobiles, on amusements, on checks, or a raise in postal rates. Do not cry on Monday when the committee brings in its suggestions if you do not take advantage of this opportunity.

This provision is not in conflict with the eighteenth amendment; 2.75 beer is not intoxicating. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] would lead us to believe that he had been authorized by the Supreme Court to say, "If you pass this, the court will declare it unconstitutional." I have never heard of the court rendering decisions in advance of the hearing of a case, nor has anyone else.

The gentleman from Georgia urged you early in the week to vote for your country, to forget your political future, and balance the Budget. I make the same appeal to you now. Vote for this amendment, and you will balance the Budget.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, we are celebrating this year the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington and in grateful memory of his deathless services to his country we are studying all the known words of him who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." On the anniversary of the signing of the Constitution, the 17th day of September, 1796, he read in the historic hall in which both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were conceived, his Farewell Address, the greatest admonitory statement that the founder of a nation ever handed down for the guidance of posterity. I want, in connection with the proposed amendment to impose a tax on beer of a certain alcoholic content, to read one thing he said in that document which will be revered as long as patriotism exists in the hearts of his countrymen. It speaks volumes on this amendment. He was referring to the Constitution of the United States. He was familiar with that Constitution, for seven years before he had presided not have been written, and without his mighty influence it could never have been ratified. It was dear to him, for he knew above all others what it cost and he knew, too, what its supremacy meant to the future of his country.

This is what George Washington said:

The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the Constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all.

[Applause.]

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUYER. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Does the gentleman disagree with the Supreme Court of the United States in its decision that Congress has the power to define intoxicating liquor in fact?

Mr. GUYER. The Congress has only the power to decide upon the alcoholic content, subject, of course, to the Supreme Court, and that content has already been declared to be one-half of 1 per cent. That court, of course, will always decide that any beer that is intoxicating violates the eighteenth amendment, and therefore unconstitutional. Every sincere man here knows that any beer that is not intoxicating would never please our wet friends. Of course, such a lawabiding group as liquor sellers would pay no attention to any alcoholic content determined by Congress. They never obeyed any law, either of God or man. Under the smoke screen of 2.75 beer they would not only sell every per cent beer but with characteristic defiance of law would sell every other kind of liquor.

This amendment seeks to do just what Washington was warning against in his Farewell Address. This amendment seeks to do by indirection that which can not be done directly. The object is to nullify the Constitution by act of Congress. It has been boldly said here this afternoon by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Oliver] that this amendment would break the back of prohibition, and prohibition is a part of the Constitution. I have no complaint to make against those who in accord with the provisions of the Constitution seek to repeal the eighteenth amendment, however much I may disagree with them. That is their sacred right. But I do not indorse any crosscuts back to the old saloon, except by the path set out in the Constitution.

Of course they want to "break the back of prohibition." Let them go ahead in the orderly method of repealing this amendment and follow the pious admonition of Washington and obey the Constitution while they are doing it. Why pretend loyalty to the Constitution while stabbing it in the back with this amendment? Yet they have hurled at us the anathema of the Gallilean: "Scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites." Take the hypocrisy out of this amendment and there will be nothing left. These same Members yesterday were shedding tears over the tax that would be levied on the buttons of the poor man's coat, for nearly everything else was excepted, but to-day they tell you that they will raise $450,000,-000 from this beer tax. They admit it is the working man, the poor man, who will drink the beer and who will, of course, pay the tax. Oh, they say he will willingly pay it to get his beer. Yesterday they objected to an almost invisible tax on the working man, to-day they would take $450,000,000 out of his pocket and pay the tax of the rich, take the tax for booze that the poor man should put in shoes for his children.

It has been said here to-day that the vast majority of the people are against the eighteenth amendment. How did you find that out? Four years ago the Democratic candidate for President, though his party adopted an enforcement platform, a dry platform, wired the convention that nominated him that he must run as a wet. Thus, he ran and was the worst defeated candidate that ever ran for President. I honor him for his manly and frank statement of position, for in that he showed himself a man of character and integrity. But in spite of his fine executive record he was ignominiously defeated by the dry sentiment of his own party. There may be a lot of froth on this so-called revolt against prohibition like there is on this imaginary beer that we are going to vote down by an overwhelming majority. These storms of so-called sentiment against prohibition are like the surface of the sea that is whipped to foam and fury. There is more or less impressiveness in the spectacle, but down beneath the froth and foam the waters of the deep sleep unmoved by all the fury of the shallow surface. So sleeps like smoldering volcanic fires the old hatred of the good people of this country for the outlaw liquor traffic that seeks in this amendment, like a camel, to get its head under the prohibition tent. [Applause.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, first, I want to say that I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen]. I do so with the firm conviction that this amendment is going to bring not only revenue to a depleted Treasury but a great deal of happiness to this country. I say this, and I think you gentlemen know that I would not say it if I did not absolutely believe it. After listening to the arguments advanced here to-day, the only picture in my mind is one of corruption, suffering, and a long stream of crime as a result of the past 12 years of prohibition.

No thinking man or woman, whether or not he or she believes in prohibition, can believe that prohibition has made this a better country in which to live. We know that crime is rampant. We know that our State and Federal prisons are overcrowded to-day as a result of the eighteenth amendment, and we know that many homes are desolated because of it. It has not stopped drinking, it has only moved the saloon into the speak-easy. It has created hypocrisy, and there are many men here on the floor of this House who, I feel certain, would be greatly relieved if this question were taken out of Congress and politics.

I have great respect for my colleagues in the House. I know there are many of you who are ardent believers in prohibition and practice it, and for you I have the greatest respect. But I also know there is another class of men here who, while preaching prohibition, fail to practice what they preach. I am not finding fault with them. I am simply stating a fact, and I feel sure that they would be glad, if they could take their places as honest men and vote as they drink and as they believe.

What is this question before us to-day? It is a question of finding revenue. We have been arguing it from an economic point of view, and I believe in that. I think it would bring a great deal of money into the Treasury, money that the bootleggers now have in their possession and upon which they are not taxed.

The present tax on beer is $6 a barrel. The greatest production of beer, 66,000,000 barrels in 1914, with a tax of $6 a barrel, applied on this pre-prohibition production would amount to about $400,000,000 a year.

Mr. Woodcock, the Director of Prohibition, in a recent survey showed that there were 22,000,000 barrels of beer manufactured in the cellars of the people for the year ending June 20, 1930. If this beer had been manufactured in legal breweries and subjected to the present tax of $6 a barrel, it would have yielded the Government a revenue of $132,000,000.

The population of the United States has increased 20 per cent since 1916. In that year, according to figures submitted to the Committee on Agriculture by Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale, and Prof. T. M. Carver, of Harvard University, about 80,000,000 bushels of grain were used in the manufacture of beer. It would take about 80,000 farmers to grow that amount of grain. Would not this go a long way to bring prosperity to the farmers of the country as well as to balance the Budget?

Does it ever occur to gentlemen here to wonder where the two billions of money is hoarded to-day? You know perfectly well where that money has gone. It is being hoarded by the bootleggers and the racketeers of this country. They are afraid to put it into banks or to invest it in stocks and bonds, because they know that it would carry a tax and arouse suspicion. Therefore they are hoarding this money, and that is why so much money has been taken out of circulation.

Then I am thinking of another consequence of this horrible law, which has taken place in my own State very recently, where a home has been desolated through the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby. Why? Because this underworld that we know and hear so much about is organized in every State in the Union. There is no crime that it hesitates to commit. Certainly those of us who are here supposed to make laws to bring happiness ought to give some consideration to this thought. We are not happy, and the people of this country are not happy, and they are not going to be any happier when they find that they have a tax levied on pretty nearly everything essential to life. Why not give them what they want? It is not going to do them any harm-not nearly so much harm as the kind of beer that they are drinking to-day. It is going to provide for a great deal of employment for men and women everywhere, and I believe we ought to give more consideration to both the economic and particularly the moral side of this question. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, may I see if we can not make some agreement as to closing debate. [Cries of "No!"] I have do desire to cut off anybody, but we must make some progress if we are going to get through this debate. I move that debate upon this Cullen amendment close in 40 minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, may I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that seven wets have spoken and only two drys have been recognized, and certainly the drys are entitled to have this debate run along for a little while.

Mr. CRISP. The Chair would take care of that situation. Mr. SIMMONS. I wish the gentleman would withdraw

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, in order to test the House, I move that debate close on this amendment in one hour, which will be 15 minutes past 3 o'clock, and then the entire membership of the House, in their offices and on the floor, may know when the vote will come.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that all debate on the Cullen amendment close in one hour.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to divide this time equally between those for and against. He does not know what the personal attitude of gentlemen is on this question. He would be glad to have them indicate to the Chair when they take the floor. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, I object. Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER] claims all of the patriotism in this country belongs to the wets, and the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. Norton] thinks all of the political honesty and other honesty in the House likewise belongs to the wets. May I suggest that neither statement does them honor. All of the patriotism and all of the political honesty in this House, I think, can pretty well be divided among its entire membership. It ill behooves any Member to question the patriotism or loyalty or honesty of any Member of this House

As I see this proposal, there is nothing new in it. We have heard here to-day the same statements that you will find in all of the history of the fight against either the regulation or the control or the prohibition of the use of intoxicating liquors. The wets are appealing to the pocketbooks of the wealthy. They are appealing to the necessities of the country, they are appealing to the necessities of the farmer in an effort to bring back a traffic that has always damned and corrupted and ruined everything and everyone that it has touched. [Applause.] I take it that neither the farmer nor the taxpayer nor the Government is going to be bribed by an effort of this kind.

The statement has been made here that the American Federation of Labor wants the return of beer. I understand that their resolutions have been to that effect. But the American Federation of Labor is one of the four great organizations in America that have carried on a campaign against the sales tax. They are one of the four great groups that the Democratic leader, Mr. RAINEY, condemned the other day as an invisible and otherwise objectionable lobby. I refer to the American Federation of Labor, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, and Farmers'

The American Federation of Labor fought the sales tax. We defeated it overwhelmingly in this House yesterday. They were fighting a 21/4 per cent sales tax, and now the wets attempt to put that same organization in favor of a 30 per cent sales tax on beer. I do not believe that the American Federation of Labor for one minute would so change its whole attitude on the sales tax that they would favor this amendment with the pernicious sales tax in it. I have far too much respect for the American Federation of Labor to believe that they would reverse their position on the sales tax for a glass of beer.

Then again they quote an organization that has honored me, the American Legion. I challenge any man to show that the American Legion is in favor of a return of intoxicating liquor in the United States, beer or otherwise.

Mr. SWEENEY. Did they not adopt a resolution to that effect?

Mr. SIMMONS. They did not. They adopted a resolution asking for a national referendum, and every word of the debate shows that that was the purpose of the resolution. May it be said to the credit of the American Legion in my State that they did not vote to favor the referendum. Our department of the American Legion believed that the Legion as an organization has no business in the prohibition

Mr. KARCH. They were the only ones.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; they were not.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska declines

Mr. SIMMONS. What do we have here? We have an attempt to shift the burden of taxation from the wealthy. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER] said, "Wealth itself must take prohibition from the statute books." Why? In order to shift the burden that this House has ruled that wealth should carry in this country onto those who consume and want beer. Beer consumption by great numbers would be necessary to make this tax effective and that means a tax on great numbers. One of the du Ponts only a few years ago made the statement that if we could have a beer tax in the United States comparable to that which they have in England, one of his corporations alone would save $10,000,000 a year. Because the Government could remove the tax on incomes and corporations if such a tax were levied.

Gentlemen talk about wanting a nonintoxicating beer. That is not the purpose of this amendment. The American citizen now has available a nonintoxicating beer. The purpose of this amendment is to secure an intoxicating beer in deflance of the Constitution.

City Members here plead for beer as a farm-aid measure. The answer is that not one great farm organization

I believe it can be established that the grains and farm products now used in the production of soft drinks, milk, and so forth, more than equal the possible consumption of grains in the manufacture of beer. But even if it did not the farmers of America would be against this measure because of the physical and moral problems involved. And again, Thomas Jefferson is quoted by a wet. Thomas Jefferson probably used the words credited to him, but we have advanced somewhat since Jefferson's time in all things; why not in our views on prohibition? Jefferson was a leader in the early movement that led finally to prohibition. The statement quoted was made not in an argument for but against the use of intoxicating liquors and in an effort to curb their ravages among our people. Another gentleman says he does not want a return of the saloon. What he means is that they will not call it a saloon. The fact remains that, call it what you will, this proposal means that the thing once called a saloon will be returned with all its resultant vice, corruption, and evils. The gentlewoman from New Jersey pleads for this measure to restore happiness to our people. To what home or person did intoxicants ever bring happiness or health, joy or contentment, peace or prosperity? The use of intoxicants has always brought unhappiness, disease, sorrow, discontent, and poverty to those who became its users. There is no hope that the legalization of beer would have any other effect.

Admittedly national prohibition is not yet achieved as a fact—admittedly conditions are far better now than in the days of the saloon—else why should all the wets loudly proclaim that even they do not want the saloon to return?

National prohibition is an ideal that the American people have set for themselves. It is worth fighting for. This beer proposal is a movement backward, a surrender to the organized liquor traffic, an admission of defeat. There is but one place from which the drys can fight, and that is on the basis of complete prohibition. This is but the entering wedge. The wets will be content with nothing less than a return to the legalized sale of all intoxicants. The American people should recognize this fact. When they do, there will be a distinct and overwhelming rejection of every new proposal. [Applause.]

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, as well as the Hull-O'Connor bill, which proposes a tax of 4 cents a pint, or $10.08 on a barrel of 31½ gallons, will produce Federal revenue of at least $660,000,000 based upon the production of beer at the peak rate of 1914, at which time the total capital invested in breweries and malting was $750,000,000. There were then 1,347 corporations, companies, and individuals engaged in the business, and they employed 77,000 workers, whose wages totaled $84,000,000. These figures do not include the carpenters, coopers, painters, glassworkers, ironworkers, varnish makers, electricians, box makers, mechanics, and scores of other lines of workers in industrial plants who were more or less dependent upon the brewing industry for their livelihood.

In 1914 the value of grain and hops purchased for brewing brought $88,000,000 to the producers on the farms of the Grain Belt and the hop-growing sections.

In 1917 the breweries used 2,000,000 tons of coal, which required 40,000 cars for transportation. Brewing material, machinery, beer, and the by-products—brewers' grains—brought the total to 123,666 carloads for the transportation of which vast tonnage the railroads collected freight charges.

From the standpoint of revenue it should be recalled that while in 1914, the peak year, the output of beer was over 66,000,000 barrels, upon which taxes at $3 per barrel were collected, with the increase in population during the past 18 years it is reasonable to assume that the probable demand for legalized beer will reach 100,000,000 barrels per annum. During the last quarter of the year 1919 the tax on beer was $6 per barrel. At that rate the income to the Federal Government on 100,000,000 barrels would be $600,000,000, besides which at least an equal amount could be collected by the Federal Government and the States in the form of sales taxes and license fees.

The proposed amendment if adopted by the House and approved by the Senate will accomplish two prime purposes. It will so increase the revenues of the Treasury as to reduce by fully 50 per cent the deficit and it will promote temperance, which the Volstead law certainly has not done.

Some of the advocates of continuing the present policy toward the enforcement of the Volstead law, or the extreme drys, as they like to call themselves, are prone to exaggeration in all their arguments. For example, a speaker addressing a meeting in a church in my district declared last week—

That the Government is annually collecting approximately $120,-000,000 in fines against violation of the eighteenth amendment.

That speaker should receive an appointment as bookkeeper under the prohibition division of the Department of Justice. He might be able to point out what has become of the fines collected, for the Treasury Department can account for not to exceed $6,000,000 in any one of the years which have passed since the enactment of the Volstead law and less than half that mythical $120,000,000 in the whole of the 10 years. This is but a sample of the exaggeration which is the popular basis of the so-called arguments of the drys, especially such of them as are on the rolls of the Anti-Saloon League and similar organizations whose financial receipts depend upon their ability to exceed the late Eli Perkins or his predecessor, Baron Munchausen, in the "penurious frugality" with which they employ truth in their speeches before audiences, who apparently like to be humbugged so long as the humbugging is of the very driest character which can be produced with a good dictionary and a vivid imagination.

The Congressional Districts Modification League, an organization chartered under the laws of the District of Columbia, formed some three years ago for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiments of the citizens of the country toward the restoration of the legal right to manufacture and sell beer and wine, has just submitted a report of its survey to Members of Congress.

The result of the league's survey up to date is shown in the petition for the modification of the Volstead law which has been presented to this House. That petition is signed by some 5,000,000 citizens scattered through 319 congressional districts in 35 States, and it is indisputable evidence that the great body of the voters of this country are emphatically in favor of the modification of the prohibition law to the extent of legalizing the sale of malt liquors, as is proposed by the pending amendment.

The organizers of the Congressional Districts Modification League report that from 85 to 90 per cent of all the men and women they have seen gladly signed the petition for modification and that more than 5 per cent of those who sign voluntarily join the organization,

From this petition I learn that more than 20,000 of the signatures were attached by residents and voters in several of the rural and semirural counties of the State of New York.

With a tax of 4 cents a pint on beer, as proposed by the Hull-O'Connor bill, the Federal Treasury will be enriched by many hundreds of millions of dollars in annual income; the brewer can keep his employees constantly employed at decent wages, and the consumer will not be compelled to pay exorbitant prices. It may be well to look into the facts to prove this. When barley is selling for anything less than $1 a bushel the cost of materials entering into the brewing of a barrel of beer, approximately 32 gallons, will be in round figures 1 cent a pint, or $2.50 a barrel, figuring the overhead at 100 per cent on the cost will bring the total to around $5 for 32 gallons. Add to this a tax of 4 cents on each pint, as proposed by the Hull-O'Connor bill, or $10.24 on 311/2 gallons, it will be seen that the cost of materials, brewing, and overhead with the tax added on a case containing 24 pints will not exceed $1.44. Then allow 36 cents more for distribution charges, and we find that by selling a case to a consumer in his home the retail dealer can make a fair profit at $2.40 a case, or 10 cents a bottle.

Besides bringing about the direct employment of many thousands of men in the breweries now closed, the effect of the proposed change in the law will be immediate and important in many other industries. For instance, millions of new bottles will be needed, thus increasing employment among glass blowers, also millions of cases will be required, for those now in use will not be available to contain 16-ounce bottles, which must be substituted for the 12-ounce containers. It has been estimated that between one and two million men will be gainfully employed as a result of the modification of the Volstead law.

As to the cost of attempting to enforce the Volstead law, the Treasury Department informs me that from 1921 to 1930 the appropriations for the Prohibition Unit and the Narcotic Division aggregated $111,471,270, of which $11,029,460 was set aside for enforcement of the narcotic law. Thus the balance for prohibition enforcement authorized by Congress was $100,441,810, and the growth of this drain on the Treasury has been steady since 1921, when the allotment was $6,350,000, until 1930, when upward of $14,000,000 was appropriated, and these enormous sums represent only a minor portion of the cost incurred through the attempts to enforce an unenforceable act of Congress, for the added cost of trials and of the maintenance of the Coast Guard and Customs Service bring the annual drain on the resources of the Treasury up to $40,000,000.

Nor should it be forgotten that it has been necessary for Congress to provide additional judges, more jails and penitentiaries, and to add hundreds of employees to the rolls of the departments which have to do with enforcement.

Advocates of dry laws are prone to direct attention to the alleged fact that near beer "containing not more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol" furnishes a market for hundreds of thousands of bushels of grain. In answer to those statements I quote from a letter just received from the manager of the only brewery remaining in operation out of the 16 or 18 which did business in Buffalo before 1919. This writer says:

Writer says:

I do not know if you are familiar with this situation: That out of the 16 or 18 breweries that we formerly had in Buffalo that the Iroquois is the only one left making a near beer. I understand there is still one operating in Rochester, do not think there is any in Syracuse, one in Utica, and I do not know if the Albany one has closed or not. Lang, of Buffalo, have discontinued for over a year and a half. The breweries at the Falls, Dunkirk, and all the smaller towns have all closed, and we are the only plant left making near beer in this section of the country. Our sales have dropped from 125,000 barrels of near beer during the first year of prohibition down to 10,000 barrels per year. In the first couple of years of prohibition this plant sold 125,000 barrels of near beer, and at that time six other breweries were operating on the same basis. Now, with all of them closed, our sales dropped to about 10,000 barrels a year.

COST TO MANUFACTURE NEAR BEER

The cost of a barrel of near bear is greatly in excess of that of the real beverage. The reasons are readily understood when it is known that 100 gallons of beer containing 2 per cent or more of alcohol loses 25 per cent of its volume when dealcoholized. Then, too, the double boiling necessary to expel the excess alcohol is a costly process requiring far more fuel than is used in the original brewing process, much more time on the part of the workmen, and other expenses which bring the cost of production—figured upon conditions existing before the passage of the prohibition law—up to $9.56 per barrel, as compared with approximately $1.13, which was labor cost of a barrel of real beer in 1914.

When consideration is also given to the falling off in demand, which throughout the State of New York is fully 80 per cent, compared with the annual sales of real beer before the alcoholic content allowed was fixed at one-half of 1 per cent, it can be readily understood why near beer costs nearly eight times as much to manufacture as did the real article.

How do we account for this heavy falling off in demand? No one but a man or woman who is blind by choice can fail to realize that bootleg beer is consumed in larger quantities than is near beer in practically every community where beer has been the favorite beverage. But that is not the only reason for the slump in the near-beer demand. Moonshine whisky and synthetic gin can be so much more easily transported than the bulkier but far less potent beer that the stronger beverages have been substituted for the milder everywhere. Only those same voluntary blind persons have failed to see the evidences of the frightful increase in the drinking of strong intoxicants among young people especially, which has been apparent everywhere in the land since the enactment of the so-called Volstead law.

It is this growth in the business of distributing illicit whisky and raw alcohol, the basis of "bathtub" gin, which actuated the Congressional Districts Modification League to ascertain, through personal contact with the electorate, how wide is the sentiment of the country in favor of the modification of the Volstead law to the extent of legalizing the manufacture and sale of malt beverages and light wines with alcoholic content greater than that which Congress has permitted. The league has carried on this investigation during the past three years at a cost of upward of a quarter of a million dollars, every dollar of which has been voluntarily contributed by individual members of the league in the form of annual dues at the rate of $1 each. And this canvass is still in progress.

Legalize the manufacture and sale of beer of 3 per cent alcoholic content and we shall increase the Federal, State, county, and town revenues by a billion dollars annually, make unnecessary the greater part of the increases in taxes proposed by this bill, promote temperance, put a crimp in the business of the racketeer and the bootlegger and at the same time insure employment for hundreds of thousands of unemployed brewers, maltsters, glass workers, coopers, box makers, electricians, miners, railroad men, and their fellows, besides thousands in related industries, and at the same time relieve the courts of much of their burden and in a hundred ways restore respect to the laws now so frequently held in utter contempt.

THE VOISTEAD LAW

The Volstead law is an act of Congress. That law was placed on the statute books by and with the votes of a majority of each House. The Volstead Act and not the Constitution itself or any amendment thereto fixed one-half of 1 per cent as the maximum alcoholic content of beer to assure its nonintoxicative character.

Congress is as competent a judge of the intoxicating effect of a given percentage of alcohol as was Mr. Volstead.

Congress can declare beer containing 2.75, 3, or 4 per cent of alcohol a nonintoxicant without violating the Constitution or the eighteenth amendment.

The late Joseph Cannon declared that buttermilk frequently contains more than 4 per cent of alcohol.

No one ever found a man or woman in a condition of drunkenness from indulging in an orgy of buttermilk. And no one has disproved Speaker Cannon's statement.

Aroused public opinion demands that this law be modified; an improved economic order and a better government will result. [Applause.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I dissent from the coldblooded and cynical proposition implied in this amendment, that there are no values for legislators to consider except those measurable in dollars and cents.

I deny that government has discharged its whole duty when it has secured to its citizens their rights of life, liberty, and property.

The people are the fiber of the state. The people are the fabric of the state. The people are the very state itself.

Government was made for the people, not the people for government. Development of the highest and best in its citizenship is the highest and noblest function of government.

That government is false to its citizens and false to its duty of self-preservation which does not guard them against disease of body and mind.

That government is recreant to its duty which does not consider the education of its citizens and lifting them to higher levels of civilization and nobler ideals of life.

The mightiest values in any state are the sobriety, the sanity, the health, and the morality of its citizens.

Their price is not quoted in any mart or on any exchange, but they are the foundation on which the perpetuity of every government rests.

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey, Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

For men are the fiber and fabric of every land.

The incurable and fatal weakness of the wet philosophy is just here, that it ignores utterly the mightiest of all values—intrinsic human values.

The pending amendment illustrates what I say.

At a time when our Government is in dire need of revenue the liquor traffic dangles before our eyes an offer of $600,-000,000 for the legal right to destroy the sobriety, impair the sanity, undermine the health, and degrade the morality of our people; the legal right to rot as widely and completely as it can the fiber and fabric of our Government; the legal right to make drunkards of every man, woman, boy, and girl under our flag.

That is what his license entitles a liquor manufacturer or a liquor seller to do.

Think of it! For a money consideration the liquor traffic asks this Government to authorize and sanction destruction of the very material, the very fiber and fabric of its own being!

In the wilderness Satan offered the Savior of Men the wealth and the power of the whole earth in exchange for the human race.

The liquor traffic offers us a paltry and doubtful $600,-000,000 for all human values in this Nation.

The devil estimated human values higher than the liquor traffic does. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this amendment. I am one of those Members of this House who came here after the adoption of the eighteenth amendment and in no way participated in that adoption, either in its submission by the Congress or its ratification by the States, but I have quite generally and quite consistently supported the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, because, like my colleagues, I have believed it the duty of Congress to provide enforcement. However, I will not concede that supporting enforcement is at all inconsistent, either with support of the resubmission or the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, or with modification of enforcement, which is legal and constitutional. [Applause.]

There are some general grounds upon which I shall support this amendment. First, it will raise revenue, and we are considering a revenue bill and are at our wits' ends to find some substitute for the proposals which only yesterday the House refused to accept by way of suggestion from the Committee on Ways and Means. [Applause.]

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; I can not yield.

Secondly, I am for this amendment and I shall favor the legalization of beer of a proper alcoholic content, because I know that in the large centers of population in the United States that one act will do more to stop lawlessness than anything else that might be done by the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] The greatest problem we have in the cities to-day is traffic in beer, not in the ordinary hard liquors.

Third. I know that the passage of such a proposal as this would allay discontent among the laboring masses of our large metropolitan communities, because they are aware of the fact that the rich man to-day can get liquor, provided only he has the price. The poor man has to pay an excessive price for the vile stuff which is being made in the alley breweries.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; I do not have time.

On the question of constitutionality, I will say frankly that that concerns me; but during the war we had 2.75 per cent beer when all other so-called alcoholic beverages were prohibited. The world over, beer of this alcoholic content is not considered intoxicating liquor but is sold as an ordinary beverage. Only the other day I joined with the great mass of the membership of this House in passing an antiinjunction bill. Only 13 Members of the House voted against it and only 5 Members voted against it in the other body; but the Attorney General, in advising the President upon the provisions of that bill, said very frankly that he was not at all certain that all of its provisions were constitutional, but to-day gentlemen who rushed gladly and enthusiastically to the support of that measure are expressing much concern about the constitutionality of this amendment. The Supreme Court, it is true, has not passed definitely upon the question; but those who have had experience with reference to the use of beer of this alcoholic content, 2.75 per cent by weight, will themselves know that there can be no just claim as to the constitutionality of it under the prohibition of intoxicating liquor. Personally, I do not believe such beer is intoxicating in fact.

I think the time has come, Mr. Chairman, when we can no longer stand upon our old views on prohibition, if we have had any, but we must recognize the conditions which prohibition has created in our fair land and which exist to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to be recognized at this moment. I have just sent to the Congressional Library for the autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, as I wanted to read the contribution of that printer, philosopher, and statesman on the subject of beer. However, without the book in my hand I am able to remember his comment on beer. About 200 years ago, after Franklin had moved from Boston to Philadelphia, had passed his apprenticeship and become a full printer, he went to London and served for about a year. While working there he noticed that the other printers and apprentices were drinking beer with their meals. They marked that he did not drink with them and remarked that he was stronger without the beer than were they with it. Franklin, whose mind even then was analytical, made a study of the question of drinking beer with luncheons and came to the conclusion that the food value of the beer was not worth its cost.

He came to the further conclusion that the exhilaration produced with beer during the hour at luncheon time was such that it lifted one up for a short time and then let one down still further, so that neither he nor the apprentices were as good at their work during the major part of the afternoon.

I think that is worth remembering, and it is worth stating it in this debate, principally his remark that the food value was not worth the cost. I wish I had the time to quote, in these piping times, a few remarks from Franklin on thrift.

Mr. Chairman, in the recent vote, the test vote, so called. on the Beck-Linthicum resubmission amendment, I voted yea on the proposal that the House consider the question of submitting a constitutional amendment to the States.

But because I did I do not want it thought that I must follow that leadership on such a proposition as the one now before us. Congress should submit this question before it lays a tax on the product of unauthorized breweries. Such a tax would not authorize a barrel of beer to be sold in a State such as Washington, nor would one cent of tax be collected there. Further, I am certain that in these times of great unemployment, running into the millions, with distress, bread lines, and community kitchens in all parts of this Nation, it is no time to propose that the people shall drink themselves into prosperity. [Applause.] That can not be done. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, Franklin's Autobiography has just been handed to me, and as an extension of remarks I shall print his exact words in the RECORD.

At my first admission into Watts's printing house (in London) I took to working at press, imagining I felt a want of the bodily exercise I had been used to in America, where presswork is mixed exercise I had been used to in America, where presswork is mixed with composing. I drank only water; the other workmen, near 50 in number, were great guzzlers of beer. On occasion, I carried up and down stairs a large form of types in each hand, when others carried but one in both hands. They wondered to see, from this and several instances, that the Water-American, as they called me, was stronger than themselves, who drank strong beer! We had an alehouse boy who attended always in the house to supply the workmen. My companion at the press drank every day a pint before breakfast, a pint at breakfast with his bread and cheese, a pint between breakfast and dinner, a pint at dinner, a pint in the afternoon about 6 o'clock, and another when he had done his day's work. I thought it a detestable custom; but it was necessary, he supposed, to drink strong beer that he might be was necessary, he supposed, to drink strong beer that he might be strong to labor. I endeavored to convince him that the bodily strength afforded by beer could only be in proportion to the grain or flour of the barley dissolved in the water of which it was made; that there was more flour in a pennyworth of bread; and, therefore, if he would eat that with a pint of water, it would give him more strength than a quart of beer. He drank on, however, and had 4 or 5 shillings to pay out of his wages every Saturday night for that muddling liquor, an expense I was free from. And thus these poor wretches keep themselves always under.

Watts, after some weeks, desiring to have me in the composing room, I left the pressmen; a new sum for drink, being 5 shillings, was demanded of me by the compositors. I thought it an imposition, as I had paid below; the master thought so, too, and forbade my paying it. I stood out two or three weeks, was accordingly, considered as an excommunicate, and had so many little pieces of private mischief done me, by mixing my sorts, transposing my pages, breaking my matter, etc., etc., if I were ever so little out of the room, and all ascribed to the chapel ghost, which they said ever haunted those not regularly admitted, that, notwithstanding the master's protection, I found myself obliged to comply and pay the money, convinced of the folly of being on ill terms with those one is to live with continually.

I was now on a fair footing with them, and soon acquired considerable influence. I proposed some reasonable alterations in their chapel laws, and carried them against all opposition. From my example, a great part of them left their muddling breakfast of beer, and bread, and cheese, finding that they could with me be supplied from a neighboring house with a large porringer of hot water gruel, sprinkled with pepper, crumbed with bread, and a bit of butter in it, for the price of a pint of beer, viz, 3 halfpence. This was a more comfortable as well as cheaper breakfast, and kept their heads clearer. Those who continued sotting with beer all day were often, by not paying, out of credit at the alehouse, and used to make interest with me to get beer; their light as they phrased it, being out. I watched the pay table on Saturday night, and collected what I stood engaged for them, having to pay sometimes near 30 shillings a week on their accounts. This, and my being esteemed a pretty good riggite—that is, a jocular verbal satirist—supported my consequence in the society. My constant attendance (I never making a St. Monday) (St. Monday, a Monday holiday observed by lazy printers) recommended me to the master; and my uncommon quickness at composing occasioned my being put upon all work of dispatch, which was generally better paid. So I went on now very agreeably. So I went on now very agreeably.

Mr. Chairman, the press on which Franklin worked while at Watts's in London was purchased by an American and is now, I believe, on exhibition in the Patent Office in Washing-

Franklin was born in 1706; died in 1790.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute amendment for the Cullen amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Britten as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. Cullen: "There shall be levied and collected on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, stout, and other malt, brewed, and fermented beverages containing one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, which maximum percentage hereby declared to be nonintoxicating in fact, brewed or manufactured and hereafter sold, or removed for consumption or sale within the United States by whatever news such heverages may be called in lieu of the by whatever name such beverages may be called, in lieu of the internal-revenue taxes now imposed thereon by law, a tax of 4 cents per pint to be collected under the provisions of existing

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the reading of the substitute has gone far enough to show that it is an amendment in the third degree, and I make the point of order against it that it is out of order being an amendment in the third

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I question that. I think the amendment should be reported. The gentleman offers it as a substitute, and I think the amendment should be read in full so that the chairman may pass intelligently upon the question of whether it is a substitute or not.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McMillan). The Chair is satisfied the amendment, although offered as a substitute, is clearly an amendment within the third degree.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Chair reserve his decision until I can make an argument on the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will reserve his decision, but the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the amendment, although offered as a substitute, is clearly an amendment within the third degree.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. The amendment as I have offered it is very largely a copy of the Cullen amendment with three or four additions which certainly should not affect the germaneness of my amendment. For instance, Mr. Chairman. I raise the tax carried in the Cullen amendment from 3 cents to 4 cents. That does not change the germaneness of the amendment. I provide in my amendment-and, by the way, my amendment is nothing more nor less than about 80 or 85 per cent of the so-called Hull-O'Connor bill which is now pending before the Ways and Means Committee of the House as a revenue measure. In that bill there is a section which calls for the consumption of the product away from the place of purchase. That clearly is not covered in the Cullen amendment, but it is covered in my amendment, and that is done with the view of doing away with the corner saloon. Surely that does not affect the germaneness of the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the gentleman is addressing his remarks to the committee rather than to the Chair.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I am trying to show the difference between the two amendments. There is very little difference between them.

Mr. CULLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. CULLEN. My amendment carries, in effect, all of the language that the gentleman's substitute carries, with the exception of raising it from 3 to 4 cents. As the amendment is offered to my amendment, it is clearly out of order and should be ruled that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from New York is going pretty far in saying that is the only difference. Other differences are involved in the proposal, such as that which has just been adverted to by the gentleman from Illinois in reference to the consumption of the product away from the place of purchase.

Mr. CULLEN. If the gentleman will permit, that is absolutely taken care of in my amendment, because my amendment provides, distinctly, that the saloon shall be barred.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not find any such provision. Mr. CULLEN. Language to that effect is there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois has concluded, I should like to be heard.

I take it that at any time a Member may offer a substitute which does not infringe in any way the rule of amendments in the third degree. We have had this question before us in numerous instances where the chairman of a committee offers a substitute to the entire bill as originally introduced and gives notice that if the substitute is adopted he will then strike out the remaining sections after the first section.

It is fundamental, and is found in the express rules of the House, that there may be pending at one time an amendment, an amendment to the amendment, a substitute, and an amendment to the substitute. I call the Chair's attention to Rule XIX, where that rule of procedure is found in express language:

It shall be in order to offer a further amendment by way of substitute, to which one amendment may be offered.

There is express recognition under the rules of the House. Now, is this a substitute? I respectfully submit it is a substitute in that it changes in a substantial way the amendment under consideration. It first modifies the amount that shall be charged from 3 cents per pint to 4 cents. It adds many other provisions relating to the licensing of the article.

The Chair would be going very far, indeed, to say that this is not a substitute. It is, in many ways, a substitute for the original proposition, and under the rules of the House just referred to the committee has the right to consider it as a substitute, regardless of the rule of third degree, because the rule of third degree as to amendments does not apply to

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Britten] is offered as a substitute for the Cullen amendment. It appears to the Chair that the Cullen amendment having been offered as an amendment to the Crisp amendment, the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Illinois as a substitute for the Cullen amendment is in the third degree, and therefore the point of order is well taken. The Chair sustains the point of Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized on the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, every argument that has been made here to-day and every argument that will be made here to-day in opposition to this amendment will be based upon one theory, and that is that 2.75 beer is an intoxicating beverage, which, of course, is wrong. I will go further than that. The argument made against this amendment by the so-called drys is illogical because they would be against it just the same if it were a 1 per cent beverage, in the so-called interest of the preservation of prohibition.

We have to determine for ourselves and for the country this afternoon whether we are going to collect a voluntary and a cheerful tax on beer to the amount of five or six or seven hundred million dollars or whether we are going to apply a lot of nuisance taxes to collect that same amount. You will impose stamps on checks, and you will provide for heavy luxury taxes on automobiles?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. BRITTEN. All right, a brief question.

Mr. BLANTON. In reply, I want to tell the gentleman we are not going to do that. We are not going to put a stamp tax on checks.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; you will have to do that to collect revenue to balance the Budget.

Mr. BLANTON. We are going to do just as we did yesterday.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not yield further. I yielded for a question, and the gentleman is trying to tell me something instead of asking a question.

Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the situation is critical. No one believes that the revenue from customs duties will be increased under the present tariff act. The receipts from this source are, indeed, more likely to decrease. Income and corporation taxes have fallen off tremendously during the present depression, with little likelihood of improvement this year.

How much relief could be obtained by legalizing the manufacture and sale of malt beverages? It is undisputed that lager beer was the most popular beverage in the 20 years before the war. It had been perfected by many inventions and improved processes. The air and the water were filtered and sterilized, the beer itself was pasteurized and then carbonated with its own gas, and with the invention of the ice machine and artificial refrigeration it can be made under any climatic conditions all the year round. Moreover, it could be stored with a minimum of alcohol, so that it was the mildest alcoholic beverage in the world. But until the great development of machine-made bottles and of mechanical devices for filling, capping, and labeling the bottles, and of cleaning the empty bottles by machinery, most of the beer was put up in wooden barrels. It had to be sold in the saloon, where it could be kept cold and served under mechanical pressure. Naturally, it was largely a city business, for the country saloon did not sell it fast enough to keep it in good condition. Now that it is divorced from the saloon, it can take its rightful place as a temperance drink-with just enough alcohol to be mildly stimulating. A 31/2 per cent beer means a beverage than contains 911/2 per cent of water, 5 per cent of nutritive solid matter and 31/2 per cent of alcohol. With the improvements in bottling methods and the network of State highways and the development of the motor truck, there is no reason why bottled beer should not be kept in every drug store, grocery, or delivered by the case to all families who are living on a good road. The only question is one of price. Beer must be cheap to be popular. Here is where the question of the tax comes in. Bottled beer costs more than draught beer, but it was sold in the old days as low as $1 a case of 24 bottles. The beer tax was for many years $1 a barrel, which contained 31 gallons. Then it gradually crept up to $2.50 until the war, when it paid a war tax of $6 a barrel. The saloon keeper got even by serving beer in pony glasses instead of seidels. However, in these stressful times the tax would, no doubt, be all that the traffic could stand. What a rumpus the soft-drink people would make if soda-fountain drinks carried a supercharge of 2 cents a drink!

The amendment I have sent to the Clerk's desk provides for a tax of 4 cents a pint.

Mr. Chairman, now let us see how much this 4-cent tax would yield. At the present time it is computed that the sale of beer, made from wort and from malt sirup (what is popularly known as "home brew") totals about 20,000,000 barrels, or about 40 per cent of the legal output in 1918. This figure is arrived at on the basis of the hop crop of 1930, which has simply disappeared.

How much of the former beer market could be recovered immediately is a debatable question. Nine States-California, Maryland, Massachusetts, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin-would swing into line at once. These nine States formerly produced more than half the beer in the whole country. In the other States legislation would be necessary to correct their State enforcement acts, but it is probable that Connecticut, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, and Ohio would soon follow suit. This would bring back all but one or two of the industrial States, with the resultant recapture of over 90 per cent of the productive territory. Allowing for the increase in population since 1918, the enormous growth of urban suburbs, and the development of good roads, it is certainly reasonable to estimate that the beer production would be at least 50,000,000 barrels within a year. By the way, in 1914 New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania produced one-third of all the beer in the country, and what is more, consumed it all within their own

Figuring 256 pints to a barrel and a 4-cent tax per pint, we would collect the large sum of $500,000,000 the first year on an output of 50,000,000 barrels. This sum would practically equal the total amount that will be collected under a manufacturers' sales tax. It could be substituted for a sales tax or for a lot of so-called nuisance taxes. And right here, Mr. Chairman, let me repeat what I have frequently said, that so long as this Government of ours refuses to take advantage of its opportunity to collect $700,000,000 or $800,-000,000 on a beer tax which would be voluntarily and cheerfully paid, I shall oppose any reductions in the salaries of Federal employees. The postal clerk and carrier are already underpaid. Officers and men in our military services can now barely provide a living for themselves and their families. Ninety per cent of all Federal employees get less than $150 per month. To reduce these salaries in order to save a few millions of dollars to the Treasury, while refusing to tax beer, is immediately the highest form of intolerance and a lack of appreciation of faithful service. It puts the now broken remains of prohibition on a sacred pedestal and says, "Thou shalt not touch." Heavy taxes shall be applied, salaries reduced, industries crippled, employment reduced, and all because the Government refuses to hear the appeal of millions of our people who would enjoy a palatable health-giving drink and who are willing and happy to pay a tax to do so.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the Chair entertain the suggestion that succeeding speeches be cut down to one minute or two minutes so that a much larger number of Members may be heard on this proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to divide the time as equally as possible among the Members.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, how about the question of employment? At the peak of the brewing industry the brewers and maltsters employed about a hundred thousand men, including clerks, drivers, and salesmen. But this is only part of the story. There are something like 60 other industries which formerly did an important business with the brewers. In 1918 there were 1,100 breweries in active operation. To-day only 164 are running. Think of the army of carpenters, painters, mechanics, electricians, plumbers, and laborers who would be required to recondition and reequip 900 brewing plants. Think of the fuel that will have to be mined and shipped, the barley, hops, rice, and corn that will have to be purchased and transported, with the additional farm labor that would be required. Think of the demand for a billion bottles, and for cooperage, brewing, bottling, and refrigerating machinery, for labels and stationery, and it is easy to visualize a working force of half a million men. On the basis of 4 to a family this means feeding, housing, and clothing 2,000,000 individuals.

Mr. Chairman, what about the allied trades? To get some definite idea of the importance of the allied and associated industries, it is but necessary to visualize more than a hundred manufacturers and dealers in brewing, bottling, and refrigerating machinery, and in a large number of articles that are used in bottling establishments. This also includes maltsters, hop merchants, and purveyors of such articles as sirup, brewing sugars, isinglass, pitch, varnish, enamel, rubber goods, brass fittings, labels and labellers, electrical apparatus, faucets, bungs, bunging machinery, corks and crown caps, brooms and brushes, malto-dextrine, brewing salts, grain driers, cooperage and other containers, and a whole lot of special machinery, such as pasteurizers, coolers, pumps, tanks, gas compressors, and washing machines.

Mr. Chairman, how about the traffic question? The "official classification" figures of the railroads give an incomplete picture of the importance of the brewing industry from the traffic standpoint. Their figures cover the brew-er's shipments but not his receipts.

It is interesting to calculate the number of carloads of freight that go into and out of the breweries in one year. The number of carloads of beer, together with the return shipments of empty packages, I am told, would total more than 700,000 carloads. What a boon a resumption of this one industry would be to the railroads of the country.

Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize the matter from an agricultural standpoint. The injury of prohibition to the farmer has been of a regional character. The production of barley has actually increased under prohibition, but it is now used largely as a feed grain at a great reduction in price. Perhaps the most serious effect of prohibition has been that farmers have lost their market for the finest grades of barley which were formerly used and purchased by brewers at premium prices. There is no doubt whatever that the leading brewers of the country would be ready and willing to pay at least 75 cents a bushel for malting barley when beer comes back.

In 1921 a congressional inquiry was instituted to consider the question of a possible revival of the barley industry by increasing the demand for barley malt. Mr. R. E. Jones, of Wabasha, Minn., a grain merchant dealing principally in barley, testified that before prohibition—

The consumption of barley for brewing purposes was 80,000,000 bushels a year. The production of barley was from 200,000,000 to 225,000,000 bushels a year. This last year the crop was brought down to 184,000,000 bushels. It necessarily had to drop down on account of the awful reduction in price.

Taking it year by year, the brewers used from 30 to 35 per cent of the barley crop.

Let me go a little further, as my time is limited.

We are going to do one of two things here this afternoon. We are either going to accept this tax on beer, which will be voluntarily and cheerfully paid, on a nonintoxicating beverage, or we are going to provide revenue to the amount of six or seven hundred million dollars from nuisance taxes—taxes which will make the payer very unhappy.

You gentlemen talk about helping unemployment. This amendment, if carried into effect to-day, would provide 700,000 carloads going in and out of the breweries of the country in 12 months. Do you realize what employment that would produce? In 1918 the barley and rice and hops required for the brewing industry alone came from 12,000,-000 acres of land. Think of it; 12,000,000 acres of land to grow barley for beer in this country. Talk about employment, there are millions to be employed in dollars as well as individuals by the acceptance of this amendment. The amount of money invested in breweries in 1918 was $846,-000,000. It will cost $200,000,000 to rehabilitate these breweries if this amendment is carried. This $200,000,000 will go into every walk of industrial life.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. The gentleman is an outstanding dry in this House, and I do not wish to enter into any controversy with him concerning prohibition. The amendment before the House is a revenue measure.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for one moment?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I can not; my time is limited.

Mr. Chairman, before prohibition it took about 12,000,000 acres of land to produce the barley used for malting purposes. If we add the acreage under cultivation to hops, rice, and other materials used in making beer, it would certainly bring the total up to at least 15,000,000 acres. On the other hand, there are some compensations from the agricultural standpoint. The corn growers have undoubtedly profited by prohibition, especially in the Southern States, where illicit distilling flourishes on a large scale. The enormous increase in the manufacture of corn sirup has been brought about very largely by its use in illicit distilleries for the making of moonshine whisky. In the corn country of the Middle West many farmers have been making illicit liquor themselves; and in the apple sections of the country, particularly in the Northeastern States, the sale of cider has been promoted by prohibition, while the greatly increased market for grapes is

The head of the National Grange is of the unsupported opinion that the increased use of milk is due to prohibition. Leo Wolman in Recent Economic Changes gives the following reasons for the increased sale of dairy products:

Higher purchasing power of consumers is undoubtedly one. Greater assurance of safety in the use of whole milk, as a result of public inspections and improved private practices, is another which has had cumulative effects. Wider appreciation of the special virtues of these foods, as a result of medical advice, the work of school and district nurses, the circulation of literature on child feeding, home economics teaching, and commercial advertising has probably been a major factor.

On January 27, 1922, in Washington, Mr. Henry Altenbrand, of Montana, testified that "prohibition in 1920, through the decreased selling price of barley alone, cost the farmers of the United States $224,000,000."

At the 1921 tri-State convention of the Country Grain Shippers' Association Mr. John R. Mauff, a noted barley expert, pointed out that the growing of pedigreed barley for malting purposes was done at the solicitation of the United States Department of Agriculture. The price of barley and the value of barley land have decreased enormously under prohibition. Mr. Mauff presented a petition signed by 101 barley growers recommending that 2¾ per cent beer be exempted from the act defining intoxicating beverages, in the interest of temperance and to "eliminate the disastrous bootlegging trade." It was stated that the restoration of beer would prove to be "the salvation of our barley crop."

Mr. Chairman, what is involved in the reestablishment of the brewing industry?

The last available figures show that in 1914 the brewing and malting industries represented a capital investment of $839,631,000. It is estimated that the rehabilitation of the industry would require a capital investment of at least $200,000,000. But this new capital will not be forthcoming unless there is a reasonable prospect of permanency in the industry. The brewery can adapt itself to any conditions that government imposes, but the business of manufacturing beer must be stabilized. In all the various Canadian and Scandinavian plans that have been put into operation for the promotion of temperance, the actual brewing has been left in the expert hands of the brewer. In Quebec the government has taken over the retailing of wines and spirits, but malt liquors are still sold by the brewer, under government regulation. In Ontario the government dispenses all alcoholic beverages in its own stores, except 2 per cent beer, but the brewer does the manufacturing. The Scandinavian countries encourage the consumption of mild beers by a system of favorable tax discrimination. There is no reason why a similar product should not be encouraged by our Federal Government. The legitimate American brewer wants no tolerance. He has played fair with the Government during the whole 13 years of prohibition, but the Government has not played fair with the law-abiding brewer. He has seen his business taken over by the underworld, which has bought protection from Federal, State, and municipal agents with amazing and devastating success. All the brewing industry wants is to be put on the same dignified footing as any other great manufacturing enterprise.

The real question is, What do the people want? Will they be satisfied if they get beer back? Possibly they will not, but it will relieve the situation and would be of immediate value from the economic standpoint. In the decade preceding the war larger beer made up, in volume, over 90 per cent of the total sale of all alcoholic beverages in the United States. The report of the Internal Revenue Department for 1918 gives the following figures:

gettil Saules of the south	Distilled spirits	Wines	Malt liquors
1916	Gallons	Gallons	Gallons
	139, 973, 684	47, 587, 145	1, 818, 275, 042
	167, 740, 325	42, 723, 376	1, 885, 071, 304
	93, 850, 294	51, 598, 024	1, 556, 378, 953

To be exact, the relation of the malt-liquor production to the entire output of alcoholic beverages for these three years is as follows: 1916, 90½ per cent; 1917, 89½ per cent; 1918, 91½ per cent.

But, as I have shown, the lager beer consumption was mainly in the centers of population, and probably 75 per cent of it was consumed by the wage-earning class. Undoubtedly, the demand for it was becoming more general every year, just as in this prohibition period the demand has shifted back to "hard liquor." Evidently, the whole prohibition law should be repealed, but in the meantime the competition of good, well-brewed, cheap, and wholesome beer, with bad and expensive whisky would undoubtedly be a great help.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the committee indulge the Chair for a moment? There are only 24 minutes left before debate upon this amendment will close. The Chair desires to divide the time so as to give each Member who desires to be recognized an opportunity to speak. According to those on the list at the Chair's desk there appear to be about 15 who desire recognition. In view of that, the Chair feels that about two or three minutes will be as much as can be allotted to any one Member.

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Chairman, I have no speech to make upon this subject. I voted against this amendment in the committee and I shall vote against it to-day. It presents to me two lines of thought, two questions. It is introduced in the first place as a revenue-producing amendment, an amendment to a revenue bill. If it is to produce revenue at all, it will produce it from an unlawful and an outlawed source, or else-and I regard this as the dangerous feature of this provision-by necessary implication it will modify the existing enforcement laws of the country. It must either bring revenue from an outlawed source or it is the entering wedge against existing enforcement prohibition legislation. and from either viewpoint as a Member of this House I am against it. It would produce results indirectly in modifying enforcement legislation, which this House by a direct vote has denied. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I heard a story some time ago about a man who went into the internal-revenue office and said, "I want to pay my income tax." The clerk laughed and the man asked the clerk what he was laughing at. The clerk replied, "You are the first man who has been in here at any time who wanted to pay his income tax."

Mr. Chairman, if the House will pass this amendment, there will be millions of people in this country who will want to pay their taxes. They will be willing to pay their taxes so that they can get some good beer. Then again, we will not be increasing the consumption of beer at all, because there is just as much beer consumed in this country now as there will be if we adopt this amendment. The only difference is that we will transfer the making of it from the homes of the people to the brewery, where it will be brewed in proper form and in a healthy manner. I am absolutely in favor of this amendment. [Applause.]

What this country needs at the present time is to get a smile on the face of its people. If you will pass this amendment allowing them to have some well-brewed beer containing not over 2.75 per cent, it will not only be within the constitutional amendment but it will produce around $400 .-000,000 revenue, and in addition to that it will put a smile on the faces of our people and certainly relieve us from the present depression. Now, when you really think of what this amendment means, it does not affect us so much. We get well-brewed beer for our people, and it will not increase the drinking of beer, because just as much beer is taken now as would be after this amendment. The great difference would be that the beer would be brewed in a scientific and proper manner in breweries established for that purpose, under proper temperatures and seasoning, whereas now the beer is brewed in the homes of the people or in some alley or perhaps in some stable or garage. It does not have the proper time, is not scientifically brewed, and in many cases is injurious to those who take it.

The saloon, the great demon of the past, which caused us all this trouble, could not and would not exist under the wording of this amendment.

The prohibition act has cost this country not only its good standing but has deprived it of over $10,000,000,000 of revenue. If we but had this $10,000,000,000 revenue there would not be any Budget to balance at this time, and the States throughout the Union would have revenue to carry on their operations, to provide for their public improvements, and the education of their children.

Some one has said, "Do you want to have the people drink us into prosperity?" I say, "no," but the people are already drinking the beer, common as it is, and we are getting no revenue. I do not think it is in violation of the Constitution because the Supreme Court has decided that it is within the scope of the Congress to determine the alcoholic content. We are coming to a pretty pass when we tax in this bill malt and wort, excluding malt that goes into food products and taxing that which goes into the making of beer. It is certainly a very peculiar situation for Congress to wink its eye at the violation of the Constitution in the making of beer and then to argue that this amendment should not be passed because it might violate the Constitution.

I want this amendment adopted, which will bring prosperity and peace to our country, and I want to see the tax on malt and wort eliminated. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a letter from an organization of millionaires—the Du Ponts, Couderts, Forgans, and other multimillionaires—who only yesterday denounced all of us who helped to defeat the sales tax as communists and demagogues. They very strongly appeal for a beer tax and for a sales tax on the necessities of life. They are for the sales tax. They are for a beer tax. They are against increased income and inheritance taxes. These multimillionaires want the tax burden shifted to the backs of poor people. To the food and clothing of women and children and the uncontrolled appetite of husbands and fathers.

My friend from New York [Mr. Cullen], the recognized Tammany leader in this House, who offers this amendment, says it will raise $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 in revenue. That would be only a small fraction of what would be expended, for we must remember the $500,000,000 refers only to the tax and not to the outlay for beer. My friends, you can not buy boots and booze with the same dollar, and I am for boots and against booze. You can not buy clothing and groceries for the family with the dollars spent for liquor. You can not spend the pay check in the beer saloon and take the family to the movies. Legislators and business men must take their choice.

You can not buy milk for little children and booze for the boozer with the same dollar, and I am for the dairyman and the little children and the milk to nourish them. You can not put women and children in better homes by making husbands less efficient, and you can not better clothe them or better feed them. If you can show me that this amendment will do these things, I am for the amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I have not the time. This is a machine age. There are 50,000,000 people in the United States who drive automobiles. Are you going to add to highway hazards by putting beer saloons on every corner? Are you going to make better machinists, or worse? Are you going to make safer railroad engineers? Are you going to supply air pilots with this beverage? Will this amendment put more children in school, or is it going to keep poor children out of school? Is it going to increase the efficiency of man, or is it going to decrease his efficiency? The last man hired and the first man fired is the drinker. Everybody concedes that. You can not make an individual or a nation prosperous by making them inefficient.

This amendment violates the Constitution of the United States; it violates the enforcement act. In effect, it violates more than 60 decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and there is no probability on earth that it would be upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. We are wasting valuable time on a futile amendment.

It is a sales tax in another form, taxing appetite and helpless women and children. It is favored by the Du Ponts and the Atterburys and the Raskobs and Tammany, and I am opposed to it. [Applause.]

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, by a happy coincidence I follow my colleague from Washington [Mr. Summers]. I am dry personally, I am wet politically. I am opposed to this so-called prohibition law. My colleague made reference to the fact that he wanted his dollar to go to the purchase of boots. Who are buying those boots? Those boots are on the bootleggers in the State where he and I come from and he must know it. [Laughter.] In respect to taxing this product, beer, where did our good friends get this thought that they are so fearful of taking money from illegal enterprises? That the Government is not now participating in profits and taxes from unlawful enterprise? Those of us who have practiced law and many who have defended the bootleggers in court know that after a penalty is imposed on the bootlegger and after he has been convicted and sentenced that, under the revenue law as it now exists, Uncle Sam steps in and demands that a tax be paid on the illicit product of the still. Do many of you know that the Government now taxes the illegal moonshine? My friends, do we find any objection to using that kind of revenue? Why, then, object to a tax on beer?

Mr. GRANFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. I yield.

Mr. GRANFIELD. And the gentleman knows they do not hesitate to tax the incomes of the bootlegger.

Mr. HORR. Yes. Did anybody for a moment hesitate to take his money—the money derived from taxes on the bootlegger's income?

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. In just a moment. If the gentleman will get me some more time I will answer all of you.

May I ask of you sentimental souls who are afraid to accept this money, why did you finance a California industry in the amount of $3,000,000 that makes nothing but wine? Money that was appropriated for farm relief. [Applause.]

I say to you gentlemen from the dry South, I have been down there and I recognize the hospitality of the gentleman from Texas, who invited me to participate, and I am going to accept as soon as it becomes legal. [Applause.] But you have ceased down there in the Southland to measure your corn product by the bushel; you measure it now by the gallon because of your corn-whisky production. This is no reflection on the gentlemen from the South. Your hospitality in the land of corn whisky and mint julep is a legend.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORR. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. I know the gentleman is an eminent lawyer, and I would like to get the gentleman's construction of this matter. Is this amendment a proposal to place a tax on an illegal product, or is it a proposal to modify the Volstead Act so as to make the sale of beer specified in this amendment legal?

Mr. HORR. Even as a Member of Congress and recognizing all the prerogatives we have here, I am not the Supreme Court. I will say that as to whether 2.75 beer is legal or intoxicating in fact is for court construction. As far as conscience is concerned, I do not see how the gentlemen of the dry persuasion can hesitate in voting for this measure when we consider that these same dry gentlemen had in this bill a provision taxing malt, grape concentrate, and wort.

How can one who honestly believes in the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act conscientiously vote to tax grape concentrate, when he knows that grape concentrate is used for one purpose, and only one purpose, and that is in the manufacture of wine?

How can a conscientious dry vote to tax wort, when he knows that the only article that can be made from wort

Yet the drys put wort and grape concentrate into this bill to be taxed and yet are against taxing beer. Consistency, thou art a jewel.

No, you will not tax beer, but you tax the money the bootlegger makes out of its sale. A strong and rather acrobatic mind is needed to follow such thought, you must admit.

Why does the Government not step in and destroy the foundation of crime and the "racket"? It is the illicit beer baron that finances crime. Take from him this revenue on beer and the financial backing is gone. Capone rose to greatness, if you so desire to classify his status, through the beer racket. Illicit beer has made possible organized crime. Take this revenue away from the underworld. Tax directly what we are taxing indirectly. Put the cake of yeast into the wort and do legally what we are now doing illegally. Instead of taxing incomes and illicit products from the still, tax directly the product. In conscience we can not do otherwise. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago a speaker said that if this measure should be passed it would furnish three hundred and fifty or four hundred million dollars in revenue. The gentleman failed to say anything about the millions of homes that would be disastrously affected if it should become a law. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman knows what I mean.

Why am I a supporter of prohibition? Not by reason of a childhood supervision, although that would be a good reason. Not because I or any member of my family have suffered from the evil of intemperance; that, too, would be a laudable reason. I am unalterably dry because an experience of 27 years as a public official connected with public welfare and penal institutions of the State of Vermont has proven to me beyond the question of a doubt that almost without exception the troubles, misfortunes, and sad experiences of the unfortunates whose cases I investigated by the hundreds were traceable directly or indirectly through heredity and environment or both to the curse upon humanity-intoxicating liquor.

Representing, as we do, 122,000,000 of people, we should fully realize our responsibility in a measure of this character and what it entails. Our obligation is stupendous when we consider the future welfare of this vast throng of humanity. May we remember that intemperance is responsible for more crimes, more unhappy lives, more ruined homes than any other one cause.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means, by its recommendation to tax wort 5 cents a gallon, which is nothing more than unfermented beer, recognizes the principle of raising revenue from beer. There is no other consequence that can follow. Here we are proposing to extend the principle recommended by the committee to 2.75 per cent beer, which even the Supreme Court has not said is intoxicating and which doctors and persons qualified to testify say is nonintoxicating.

If there is one thing that this amendment will do, it will divert revenue that properly belongs to the Government from the hands of the racketeers, like Capone, into the proper channel of the Treasury of the United States. One-fifth of all the revenues for the support of Great Britain comes from a tax on beer and all and liquors. In Canada the same percentage is received in support of their government.

In these times of financial stress are we going to recognize racketeers and continue to approve of what you know is a fact in the large cities, of the racketeers appropriating the revenue that rightfully belongs to the Government, or are we going back to the old times of recognizing the collection of revenue at the brewery, which will bring in three hundred and fifty to four hundred million dollars? Thirty-five million barrels of beer is being brewed to-day by wildcat breweries. If we recognize this principle of revenue regulation 50,000,000 barrels of beer will be authorized to be brewed, for which the Government will receive at the rate of $9 a barrel, or about $400,000,000. More, it will give employment to thousands of men in the brewing and allied industries that will go a long way toward reviving business in my home and other industrial centers. These are times when even the drys should have some sense and regard the Treasury rather than racketeers. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, in the time I have I want to reply to the contention that this is a farm-relief measure. a: has been suggested by some of the wets on this floor. I tell you that as a farm-relief measure, this is a 100 per cent fake. There is no farm relief in it. If there was any farm relief in legalizing beer, do you suppose the heads of the great farm organizations of this country would be opposing it? Do you suppose the master of the National Grange of this country would be appearing before committees of Congress opposing the legalization of beer? You can not fool the farmers of this country by telling them that beer will furnish a market for their products. All the grain that was consumed in the manufacture of beer in this country before prohibition would not constitute more than 1 per cent of the 5,000,000,000 bushels of grain that we produce in this country every year.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. HOPE. I do not have time to yield.

If you will take statistics showing the production of agricultural crops in this country since we have had prohibition, you will find we are producing and consuming twice as much barley now as we were in the preprohibition period. How is that barley being used? It is being fed to the dairy cows of this country, and they are producing milk used in the manufacture of butter, ice cream, and such products which are being purchased with the dollars of the workingman to-day Instead of spending his money for beer he is spending it for these healtful products. [Applause.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, the sales tax is a little different from the tax on beer. The sales tax was on necessities. The beer tax is a voluntary tax. There is a great difference.

The question before the Congress is not whether we are going to bring back beer. Beer is here. It always has been and always will be probably. There is only one question facing Congress in this matter, and that is whether we are going to collect a tax for the benefit of the people through the Government, or whether we will continue to let the gangsters and racketeers collect it for the criminals. [Applause.]

We are financing crime to-day on the greatest scale the world has ever seen, and I tell you gentlemen who are endeavoring to write a tax bill to eliminate the deficit that every year crime costs this country twelve times the total amount of our deficit, and if you cut the cause of crime in half you will not have any deficit. In fact, there will be a surplus. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this Cullen amendment to tax 2.75 beer, because it is consistent. The committee amendment seeks to recognize products used in an illegal industry—brewers' wort, malt sirup, grape concentrate. If you vote down the Cullen amendment and want to be consistent then put a tax on kidnapers, a tax on machine guns, a tax on racketeers, and a tax on speak-easies, all by-products of prohibition. If you do that, you will be consistent.

This is a time for every liberal man in this House to act. The wets should stand pat and boycott this revenue measure until such time as Congress comes to its senses. If they would do that, they would get some action on this proposal. This is a time for every liberal man here to say there will be no revenue bill passed unless action is taken to raise the necessary revenue as provided in the amendment. Therefore every liberal man in the interest of the Nation should vote for the Cullen amendment. Let the Supreme Court in due time decide the constitutionality of our action if the issue be raised in the future.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I was particularly interested in a statement made recently by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Mead] relative to prohibition America. During the past 12 years or 15 years the greatest strides that have ever been made in any nation have been made in America. This is the only nation that is having to prevent immigration to any appreciable extent. It is the nation to which nearly all foreigners desire to come it being the richest of all nations, yet it is the only prohibition nation in the world. [Applause.] It would not appear that prohibition has ruined America.

I just want to predict this—and that is why I desired recognition—that the national political party that adopts a plank in its platform providing for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment will be defeated next November. [Applause.] I hope the real friends of the Democratic Party will not be misled by including such a plank. Without repeal plank and with Speaker Garner or Governor Roosevelt nominated victory is certain.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, two weeks ago yesterday the gentleman from Georgia in taking this floor to make the opening speech on the tax bill stated with great emphasis that this Nation of ours had now the greatest deficit that any nation in the world ever had. Note you, also, that this Nation of ours is to-day the only prohibition nation in the world. Every other nation in the world obtains the bulk of its income from the alcoholic traffic. For example, England, with less than one-third of our population. receives nearly $700,000,000 a year income from its taxes on alcoholic beverages. In the same proportion we could obtain $2,000,000,000 a year. If the other nations of the world are not burdened with the stupendous deficits we have had for three years, and at the same time we are the only prohibition Nation in the world, must there not necessarily be some relation between prohibition and governmental deficit? [Applause.]

Mr. KADING. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, in the brief time allotted to me I desire to call your attention to the fact that of the 19 amendments added to our Constitution each one of them after having been adopted by the legislature of three-fourths of the several States was accepted as a matter of course excepting the eighteenth amendment.

From the time that the eighteenth amendment became a part of our Constitution up to the present time there has been widespread dissatisfaction and objection to the same by the people in a great many States and quite generally by the press. It is unnecessary to comment or discuss the question as to whether the eighteenth amendment has improved conditions or made them worse. You all have your conditions and a right to your own opinion as to whether the noble experiment has been a success or a failure.

Our Government is one of, by, and for the peaple. In nearly every case where the dry and wet question was an issue in the election two years ago the wet candidate won. The same is true in connection with elections to fill vacancies that have taken place since November, 1930. The people of a republic usually eventually get what they want. My State-the great State of Wisconsin-wants the eighteenth amendment changed so as to permit each State to decide for itself whether it desires to be wet or dry, and I predict that the time is close at hand when the eighteenth amendment will be thus amended, and not until then will the people be satisfied.

Before we recently voted on the Linthicum motion to discharge the committee that had refused to report out the Beck-Linthicum resolution and give us an opportunity to vote on resubmitting the eighteenth amendment to the States I was in hopes that the membership would vote in favor of such motion, but the motion failed, 187 voting wet and 227 voting dry.

When you take into consideration the result of the Literary Digest poll now being taken, which indicates that over 40 States are wet by a substantial percentage, as compared with only 1 State-Kansas-being dry, it is reasonable to assume that the next Congress will in all probability be wet. By taking notice of these indications and knowing that the people demand an opportunity to be heard in this matter. why not do now that which we know will be done in the near future? Why not legalize 234 per cent beer, levy a tax on the same which will produce between three hundred and fifty and four hundred million dollars annually, and balance the Budget?

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] stated in substance that the American Federation of Labor was inconsistent in having opposed the manufacturers' sales tax and now being in favor of a tax on beer; that in both cases the tax would be paid by the people. I contend that there is no inconsistency; the sales tax covered those things that the poor man must have, and a tax on legalized beer will be paid only by such as consume beer. The beer tax is a tax on a luxury. The general public is drinking beer nowbootleg beer, unwholesome beer, beer made in some barn under insanitary conditions and sold to the public the next day at 20 or 25 cents a pint. The bootlegger profits and the Government collects no revenue, and besides the Government spends large sums trying to catch the bootlegger.

If we legalize 2.75 per cent beer and impose a tax on it. the Government will receive revenue; the bootleggers will be put out of business; the consumer will be able to buy a pint of good beer at less than prevailing bootleg prices for unwholesome beer; the manufacturers will be making a substantial profit after paying the tax; the employment situation will be helped; business will be revived; justice will be done; and the first step will have been taken to solve the prohibition question. If a tax is placed on beer, the amount of revenue will be such that it will make it unnecessary to consider imposing a tax upon gasoline, automobiles, radios, checks, receipts, or to increase the postage from 2 to 3 cents on first-class mail in order to balance the Budget. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak briefly on the question of raising revenues by the taxing of light wines and beer. I am strongly against prohibition because it is fundamentally wrong, is not enforced, can not be enforced, and, therefore, should be repealed, or some substitute presented to take its place. To coerce the body when what is necessary is to educate the soul has always failed and always will. I believe that the eighteenth amendment and the accompanying Volstead Act have been contributing causes to our present economic depression. The " boom era" after the war was another cause, and the two together should share the major responsibility for the collapse of the recent stock market which brought down values, de-own sources of information and knowledge of the general | stroyed dependable business, caused a loss of confidence in the programs of essential industries, and a depreciation in credit that is terrifying in its possibilities.

There is an apparent increase of over a billion dollars in the Nation's drink bill. And no taxes are paid on liquors under prohibition.

It is everywhere apparent that the laws intended to uphold prohibition can not be enforced. When the Volstead Act was passed it was never even imagined that our Federal courts and prosecuting agencies would have to be greatly expanded to handle 70,000 criminal and civil cases a year made necessary by prohibition.

Since 1920 one of the major duties of the Department of Justice, including our Federal courts, is the prosecution of violations of the Volstead Act. I wish to call attention to the fact that every year the United States has lost nearly a half billion dollars in revenue receipts plus an average of $300,000,000 more annually for law enforcement.

Commissioner Doran reported in 1928 that $300,000,000 a year would be needed for the adequate enforcement of prohibition. As a matter of fact, the actual cost, by the most conservative calculation, is at least three times that amount. Add to the direct appropriations for enforcement the loss of State and Federal revenue, the debit against the taxpayer is over $950,000,000 a year. In fact, the bill the taxpayers of this country have to pay for prohibition nearly equals the total revenue received by the Federal Treasury from individual income taxes, which in 1929 were slightly over a billion dollars.

Indirectly near a half of the 6,000,000 of the present unemployed was brought about by the economic changes caused by the prohibition law. Had we adopted the wise plan of other countries and increased the tax on alcoholic beverages rather than wipe them out by destroying the businesses which made this income possible, there would be millions of men and women at work to-day-happy, contented, and prosperous to the point of paying taxes which are so sorely needed.

So suddenly was our greatest volume of income shut up with the adoption of the Volstead Act and the immediate demand for new millions of money to pay for law enforcement that no scientific or businesslike plan could be or was put into operation to meet the fiscal requirements, of which the increased cost of Government operation was one. Then followed hastily conceived efforts to replace the lost and needed income, and unfair and vicious taxes were imposed with the result that the tax bill of our railroads alone doubled and public utilities suffered to the same extent. This brought about hardships on going business concerns and their employees, as well as the transportation systems

Former Secretary Mellon recently discussed the problem of the deficit, and emphasized the serious financial condition in which the Federal Government finds itself, due chiefly to our unbalanced system of taxation. He said:

We depend to-day largely on two sources of revenue: First, internal-revenue taxes, including individual and corporation income taxes, and such other taxes as those on tobacco and estate taxes; and, second, customs duties

Customs duties are fairly stable and, in spite of all we hear to the contrary, may be relied on to produce an even flow of revenue except in the most abnormal years. Taxes on tobacco are also a very dependable and important source of government

The individual income tax, however, has become so restricted in its application that it has become a class rather than a general tax, with its incidence limited to a comparatively small number of taxpayers

Obviously, we should retain some other taxes which can be relied on in times when a slowing up of prosperity may cause a falling off in incomes and a consequent drop in taxes from this

The New York Herald Tribune in its leading editorial on May 25 said:

He [Mr. Mellon] does not mention it, but no doubt the thought has not escaped him that an excise tax on liquor would prove a godsend to the Treasury not only at this juncture but as a means of cushioning the tax structure for all time. He speaks of the taxes on tobacco as a "very dependable and important source of government revenue." Experience has shown that those on liquor are even more so.

I therefore ask the fullest consideration for the measure to put a tax on light wines and beer. Some one will say, however, "How can you do this without modifying the Volstead Act?" My reply is that if a majority of the Members of the House and Senate are in favor of this method of raising revenue, the same persons will vote for a modification of the act. This in my mind will provide a new source of Federal revenue which will very materially and possibly adequately extinguish the present deficit. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. [Applause.] I voted against it in committee. I could not get my consent in this revenue bill to come in and propose a tax on something that, in my judgment, is prohibited by the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Another committee has jurisdiction of proposed legislation amending the Constitution or the Volstead Act.

Some of my friends may say that this bill has a tax on wort and malt sirup used to make beer. This is true, but there is this difference. When the tax is levied on wort and malt, it is a perfectly legal product and does not violate any provision of law. To make that become obnoxious to the Volstead Act you must add water and yeast. I may say further that I opposed those propositions in the committee because I did not want prohibition injected into this revenue bill. [Applause.] If you adopt this amendment, you jeopardize this tax bill, and it is an imperative need of the United States Government that the Federal Budget be balanced. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen] to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. Crisp and Mr. Cullen.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 132, noes 216.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the Crisp amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McCormack: Strike out page 4 of the Crisp amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the matter proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

(4) Crude petroleum, fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and gasoline, 1 cent a gallon; but the tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to strike from the bill the tax on imported oil or any of the by-products which are produced from oil in its crude form.

The committee reported in the pending bill a tax of 1 cent a gallon on imported oil, which amounts to 42 cents a barrel. Last year there were about 86,000,000 barrels of oil, either crude oil, fuel oil, gasoline, or some other by-product of crude oil, imported into the United States. There were about 850,000,000 barrels of oil produced in the United States

There is no question but what this is a tariff provision. The proponents of this tax admitted this at the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means. It is my opinion that it is fundamentally wrong, and a bad precedent to establish, to incorporate in a revenue bill a provision which is distinctly tariff in its purpose and in its operation. The purpose of the provision is to provide a tariff and to assure protection, and you gentlemen of the committee know that in considering a revenue bill the primary question in your minds, and, in fact, the only question in your minds after you had determined that additional revenue had to be raised, would be the way to raise the revenue, and not for anybody other than the Treasury of the United States. Every other provision of the bill, whether we agreed or disagreed with it, had as its objective the raising of revenue for the Treasury of the United States. There are no other great interests that are going directly to benefit from any of the other provisions of the bill, but this provision has for its primary purpose the stopping of the importation into the United States of a substantial portion of the eighty-six-oi-so million barrels of oil that are imported into the United States each year.

The meaning of a tax of 42 cents a barrel is that the domestic producers, I submit, can increase the price of oil, or its by-products, to the American consuming public.

If we place an import tax of 42 cents a barrel on oil coming into the United States, it necessarily follows that the domestic production can and will increase its price 30 or 35 or 40 cents a barrel, or just enough to keep under the increase that the imported oil is compelled to pass on to its consumers.

Under the guise of raising revenue a tariff provision is placed in the bill, and if there is no reduction in the amount of imported foreign oil, if this provision becomes law, this tax would bring into the Treasury $31,000,000; or if, as the Treasury Department has stated, it is a barrier or an embargo, it will produce nothing for the Treasury. The committee has frankly stated in its report that it is estimated it will bring in $5,000,000. If any of the above estimates are true, we are enabling the domestic producers—not necessarily the independent producers but the big companies—to pass on to the American public an increase in their price which will produce for them, by way of legalized tribute from the American consuming public, at least $250,000,000 a year.

When the witnesses appeared before the committee I asked some of them if the purpose of this tax was not to enable the domestic producers to increase their price, and they very frankly said that it was.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. This provision is put in the bill for the purpose, supposedly, of raising revenue, yet primarily for the purpose indirectly of allowing powerful oil corporations and interests in this country to exact from the American public a stupendous sum of money. This is unfair, it is unwise, and it is a bad precedent for the Congress of the United States to establish.

There is another aspect to this matter, and that is, by the imposition of this tax in a revenue bill, a bill designed to raise revenue for the Treasury and not for anyone else, it will enable domestic producers and sellers of domestic oil to increase their prices and pass on to the American consuming public an additional burden of approximately $300,000,000 a year, which is nothing more than legalized tribute. In addition, this tax will seriously affect the farmer by imposing additional burdens on him. It will be particularly disastrous to the industrial sections of our country, not only in New England, New York, and the industrial States along the Atlantic coast but in other industrial States of the Union. This is nothing but a fight, through the guise of a revenue bill, to compel the people of the industrial sections and the farmers to pay $250,000,000 tribute to some of our most powerful corporations.

The farmer is in a serious plight. He has his difficulties, and we all recognize that fact, and the imposition of this tax will impose more burdens upon him. We should consider the farmer, and we should also consider the worker in the industrial areas. The farmer, despite his unfortunate situation, at least has a home, he has his land upon which he can produce foodstuffs for his family and thus obtain at least the bare necessaries of life; but, on the other hand, the worker in the industrial area, when he is out of employment, has no shelter, he has no land upon which he can grow is the first to be affected whenever retrenchment takes farm products to assure him and his dependents the bare necessities of life.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I would like to ask if it is not a fact that the evidence before the committee showed that a million barrels of South American oil are being imported into the country, coming in direct competition with our coal industry, thereby putting the coal industry out of business and causing untold unemployment in the coal fields?

Mr. McCORMACK. Let me frankly say to the gentleman that problems along that line should not be determined in a revenue bill. We have other legislative means of determining that serious problem. I admit that the independent producers of oil have a case. The independent oil producer convinced me that he had a case, but he did not convince me that he had made out a case to make use of a revenue bill for tariff purposes. He did convince me we should help him in some other way.

I am in favor of helping the independent oil producers by making the pipe-line companies give the same kind of service as the railroad companies give the American public in the transportation of goods.

I submit that the independent producers are not pursuing the right course; that they should not ask us to employ a revenue bill for tariff purposes. Such legislation imposes additional taxes upon all our people; it is disadvantageous to the farmer, to the industrial worker, and to all users of fuel.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the House should eliminate this from the pending bill, and let the Ways and Means Committee proceed to a consideration of the subject in a separate bill, or let the Interstate Commerce Committee report out the bill which is pending before that committee. The bill pending before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, if it becomes law, will make pipe-line companies common carriers.

Coming back again to the effect of this tax upon the industrial worker. When the worker in the industrial areas is out of employment, he is helpless; no place to turn to, no place to go; nobody to give him credit. The old community store where in bygone days he could obtain credit to tide him over has been supplanted by the powerful chain stores, who extend no credit and whose business is carried on a strictly cash basis.

In a period of depression it is the worker in the industrial area out of employment who more keenly feels the unfortunate conditions and who, from every angle we may look at it, is entitled to the greatest of consideration. I do not know this will affect other industrial areas, but if this tax is imposed it will mean that in addition to the tens of thousands of workers in Massachusetts and other New England States, who are out of employment, thousands upon thousands of others will be thrown on the streets, unemployed, and become mere objects of charity. I speak for the New England worker. I speak for the many thousands already out of employment up in New England, who are looking forward to the return to normalcy, knowing that that is necessary in order for them to return to work. I also speak for those who are employed and through whose minds is running the feeling of fear as to the security of their positions: who do not know from day to day when they will be discharged. The imposition of this tax will mean that many, many thousands in New England and in other industrial sections of the country will be forced out of employment.

We should speak for the farmer and we should consider the plight of the farmer, but it is about time that somebody also considered, in conjunction with the farmer, the toiler and the worker in the industrial areas. The imposition of this tax will mean a substantial decrease in the cost of operating business in the industrial sections. They are already laboring under conditions where many of them are losing money but are carrying on in order that they might give employment to as many as possible. This additional burden will mean further retrenchment, and the employee place.

Let us look at this question honestly and fairly. First, should a tariff provision be included in a revenue bill? Are we not establishing a precedent which will constantly stare us in the face in the future? Second, under the present circumstances, is it advisable to impose such a tax, taking into consideration the tribute that this tax will exact from the American public, the farmer, and the toiler in the industrial areas?

This is not a tax for the Federal Treasury. This is a tax for the benefit of the producer and seller of the domestically produced oil. Approximately 850,000,000 barrels of domestic oil are produced annually. The imposition of a tax on imported oil will enable the domestic producers and sellers to increase their price per barrel at least 35 or 40 Therefore, considering the production of domestic oil last year, based upon this probable increase, you will realize the stupendous sum which would be exacted from the American public as the result of the imposition of the tax on imported oil.

Oh, you can condemn New England, but she has been for 300 years making wonderful contributions toward the progress of our country. I have heard Members refer to New England caustically, but I wonder if they realize its history, traditions, and contributions. Our workers up there are human beings, just the same as are workers in any other sections of the country. They know the pangs of hunger and they know the dreadful results of unemployment. Give consideration to the effect of this tax on the farmer, but I urge that consideration be given also to the effect upon the workers in our industrial areas. This tax should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a good deal of confusion here because many people think this is a tax on domestic gasoline, whereas as a matter of fact it is a tax imposed on imported oil and not on domestic gasoline. Gasoline in the United States is now being taxed for all purposes 85 cents a barrel. I do not think anyone can justify that exorbitant rate, when imported oil is coming in tax free. Let me give you the figures of what is being shipped into this country. In 1930 there were imported into the United States 62,129,419 barrels of crude petroleum. During that year there were imported 26,080,383 barrels of fuel oil, and of gasoline 16,926,800 barrels, of lubricating oil 24,728,000 barrels. If a tax of 2 cents per gallon were levied upon that importation, and this bill proposes only 1 cent, it would amount to $102,571,198.72. Under the bill as proposed it would bring in a revenue to this Government of $58,000,000 annually. I care nothing about the statement made here that it will produce only $5,000,000. You can take the importations into this country and take a pencil and figure it out and you will be able to tell how much revenue it will produce.

I was surprised at the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack]. His whole argument seemed to be based upon the fact that this tariff measure ought not to be placed in a revenue bill. I am going to be honest and frank with you. A tariff is a tax, and in one way you might say that this is a tariff, but call it a tariff or a tax, I appeal to the people on the Democratic side not to be swept off their feet when they talk about a tariff, because anyone who says that the Democratic Party is a free-trade party does not know the history of the Democratic Party. I shall quote you an authority dating back to the early history of this country. For more than a generation people have been talking about the Democratic Party being a freetrade party. Mr. Madison, who was a Democrat, who assisted in writing the Federal Constitution, who was eight years Secretary of State under President Thomas Jefferson and later President of the United States for eight years, wrote the first tariff bill, and here is what he says in the preamble:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and encourage-ment and protection, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, etc.

That is the Democratic doctrine initiated at that time and repeated in the platforms, which are to be found in this little book which every Member has, down to the last platform in 1928, and that will be found to be very much stronger than the others. You may call this a protection if you wish. I hope it will protect, because if it does not, then the independent oil operators in the United States are going out of business, and the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee disclose evidence to that effect which no one can deny.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. YON. Does the gentleman think in these depressed times that the same rate of imports will come into this country, under this tax or duty?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I suggest that the gentleman read the testimony of Mr. Wirt Franklin, president of the Independent Oil Co. of the United States, and also the testimony of Mr. Fremming, representing many different organizations, one of which was the American Federation of Labor-and, thank God, the Federation of Labor has taken up this matter. If the gentleman will read the testimony of those two gentlemen he will know that, as a matter of fact. it can not be an embargo. It was proposed to put a tax of 1 cent a gallon. That means 42 cents a barrel. The testimony as shown by figures from the Department of Commerce is that foreign oil is being shipped into the United States, and that they can land it in any town on the Atlantic seaboard cheaper than you can produce it anywhere in the United States and place it at the same port. The difference is $1.05 a barrel in favor of the foreign oil.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. Has the gentleman the figures of the export of American oil? Does the gentleman know how many barrels are exported every year?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I have not those figures.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman say that it is not a fact that we export about three times as much as we import?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. I am not yielding for a speech. I do say that the testimony shows and that the figures of the Department of Commerce show that the people in foreign countries, in Venezuela, can place oil in any town on the Atlantic seaboard at $1.03 a barrel cheaper than we can produce it in the United States and put it at the same place. If you subtract 42 cents from that, anybody can see that it is not an embargo and it will not stop the importation of foreign oil. It will produce at least $58,000,000 a year for the Treasury of the United States.

One of the great reasons given here by the Democrats for their platform from time to time on the tariff is to fight monopoly. The testimony before our committee is that in all these countries where the big oil companies have a monopoly people are paying 35, 38, and 40 cents a gallon for gasoline, and just as sure as we are here unless this legislation passes the independents are going out of business, and when they do and the big four oil companies of the United States, which is a trust now controlling prices, come into power, they will put up the price, and the folks here who are shivering for fear this tax of 1 cent a gallon on imported oil will raise the price of gasoline will find themselves paying a great deal more per gallon. I call attention now to one matter in the hearings. I want to show why I say there is a trust in the United States, and that is the power that we have to fight here. One of the companies is the Gulf Co., controlled by Andrew Mellon. He is across the water it is true, but his voice is still heard here.

This is shown in the hearings on page 1153. It is an extract from the Republic Shares Corporation, of Chicago, dated March 13, 1931:

The time to push our Standard Oil Trust is now. The papers refer to the present situation as a crisis in the oil business. Do not let yourself be disturbed by that. It is just when these crises do occur that Standard Oil gets the benefit of its dominating position.

Not only that but other extracts which I have show where the Standard Oil people say, "Now is the opportunity; when these independents can not live, when they are struggling to get on their feet, let us reach out and take them at low prices," and they will finally get to be a bigger monopoly than they are now.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Blanton offers a perfecting amendment: In section 4 of the Crisp amendment strike out "1 cent" and insert "2 cents."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to address my remarks particularly to my good friend, the gentleman from New York, Doctor CROWTHER, and those who follow him on the other side of the aisle, on tariff questions.

The gentleman from Texas, my colleague [Mr. Sanders], has told you that the undisputed evidence before his Ways and Means Committee shows that the foreign importer of oil has an advantage over our American producers of $1.03 per barrel. The importer of foreign oils has a $1.03 advantage, if you please, over the American producers. My amendment would take 84 cents out of that advantage of $1.03. My amendment would still leave the foreign producer and importer of foreign oils an advantage of 19 cents a barrel over every American producer.

Are you not willing to vote for an amendment like that? The importations of oil from Venezuela and Mexico, where they use foreign peon labor, have run out of business every independent in the United States. In Morgan Sanders's district, in east Texas, there have been hundreds of thousands of barrels of oil sold for 2 cents a barrel during the past year, which has bankrupted many men formerly millionaires. Just think of it. Run out of business. If you will vote for this amendment I have offered, it would put back to work in Oklahoma and Texas alone 100,000 idle men. [Applause.] Do you not think it is worth while? Is it not worth while to put back to work and give employment to the heads of 100,000 families in two States? [Applause.] It would materially help the families in such States as Kansas, in such States as Missouri, in such States as Arkansas, in Tennessee, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and in every oilproducing State in the West. Why not adopt it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. And incidentally it would help New England and the entire country?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; it would help my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack].

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman tell the House whether it is a fact that these foreign oil companies have refineries located on the upper borders of Mexico and produce oil with cheap labor?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; and in Venezuela; and they do use cheap labor. They are shipping it here in tank loads to our eastern ports; and as my colleague the gentleman from Texas said, they are laying it down with an advantage of $1.03 per barrel over our independent producers in the United States, who maintain the American standard of wages.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. In advocating the passage of the Cullen amendment we proposed the very same argument, did we not, which the gentleman proposes?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to answer that.

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, the gentleman did not vote for our amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to answer that. Certainly not; | I did not vote to legalize beer, both because it was not for the best interest of our people and because it was unconstitutional. My friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] is now very uneasy about using a revenue bill to protect the independent oil industry from foreign monopolistic importations, but the gentleman was willing to protect the beer industry, was he not? It was all right to put beer protection in this revenue bill.

I say to the gentleman that neither this amendment of mine nor the Crisp amendment will add one single cent to the price of gasoline produced in the United States. It does not tax American gas. It will not increase the cost of the gasoline one single penny. [Applause.] Why not vote for it? I hope that every Republican tariff man and woman here will vote for this reasonable amendment.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLANTON. I yield.
Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman be satisfied to put a tax on foreign anthracite coal coming into this country?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Certainly I will. And this very amendment of mine protects the coal industry of the United States, because foreign imported oils have shut up coal mines. It protects every miner who works underground, in the darkness, without the light of day. It will protect him. I hope your colleagues will all vote for it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I listened with considerable interest to the statement of my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack], that this provision had no place in a revenue bill. Whether it is called a tax or a tariff, it could be treated only in a revenue bill, and clearly it will produce revenue.

In this session of Congress we have been seeking to help industry in its various ramifications, because industry is now at a low ebb in this country. This provision is designed to help an industry which is now suffering, and suffering greatly.

In that vast section of the country where I live a man was once considered rich who owned an oil well. To-day the possession of one is generally regarded as a liability. is no longer profitable. Many of our wells are shut down. and those which are operating are so reduced in their output that the industry is practically at a standstill.

Now, it is a little surprising to me that the opposition to the effort to revive these industries by a tax on importation should emanate from New England.

That whole section has been built up on a protective tariff. This particular provision is not a protective tariff. In the old days it was said that the sea was New England's farm, but it has ceased to emphasize its fisheries, and through high protective duties it has built up great manufacturing concerns and various industries in its great domain which keep it thriving. And now we ask New England-not from the standpoint of protection, but from the standpoint of revenue-to help carry out the purposes of this bill and, incidentally, to revive an industry which is lagging all over

Now, stop and consider the situation. I say this is not primarily protective. If it were a protective tariff, the gentlemen from New England ought to be rising, in accordance with their theories, to suggest that the amount specified in the committee amendment should be doubled or trebled or quadrupled. The protection is purely incidental, but the adoption of this provision will have one very great stimulating effect. And what will that effect be? It will enable the independent oil people of this country, who have invested their time, their talents, and their money in this industry, to have a better opportunity to compete with the favored interests of our land.

Now, gentlemen, when we come to consider the tariff normally it is usually for the purpose of protecting American citizens against foreign nationals. [Applause.] But when we come to consider this proposition we are simply asking you not to allow one set of American citizens to discriminate against another to their disparagement and to the ruin of their business, because it is well known to all of you that much, if not most, of the foreign oil importations coming to our country have back of them American capital and American brains.

So I trust that whether you regard this as a tax or a tariff you will pause to consider that it will add revenue at a time when the need for it is both pressing and imperative. [Ap-

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, there is no Member of this House who does not know that this tariff item on oil has no proper place in this revenue measure, and that it was politics and noteconomics that placed it there.

This item is avowedly designed not to produce revenue but to keep out imports. The Treasury experts report to the committee as follows:

Such a tax (1 cent and 2 cents per gallon imported oil) would yield no revenue, since the levy which would be added to the import price exceeds the margin of advantage under which the oil is imported into this country, and would, therefore, exclude the products affected.

Crude oil and fuel oil are included in this bill, although they are to produce no revenue. Not only is a tariff placed upon them but a tariff that, in the view of the Treasury experts, constitutes an embargo. What justification then can there be in including these items in a revenue measure?

The morning press carries the news that Democratic leaders in the Senate are laying the groundwork for making the tariff an issue in the coming campaign, especially with refence to its effect on our foreign trade. Is it Democratic doctrine that in tariff matters the rate should exceed the difference in cost at home and abroad, and that under the guise of a revenue bill a tariff may be imposed, and that under the guise of a tariff an embargo may be laid against a vital necessity of all industry and all agriculture?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman want that question answered?

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Certainly.

With crude and fuel oil we find in this paragraph a tariff on gasoline on which the Treasury experts have offered no estimate of revenue. The committee estimate at best a revenue of $5,000,000. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Linthicum] has shown conclusively that this item will increase governmental expenditures for national defense alone by over $8,000,000.

In this attempt to balance the Budget there are included two items that promise no revenue at all and one that promises a deficit of from three to eight million dollars.

A revenue measure should lay its burdens equally and equitably upon every part of the country, yet this measure, in addition to the general taxes imposed upon the country as a whole, lays an additional tax of 70 per cent on the industry, the agriculture, and the shipping of a particular section of the country. It would impose a tax of 70 per cent on the fuel bill of the industries of the Atlantic seaboard, industries already suffering from the general depression, already operating in the red, with many on the point of failing and adding to the general business depression and unemployment distress. [Applause.] That this item would disrupt our industries is evidenced by the fact that the coal operators of the country are importuning their Representatives here to support this embargo on oil.

This bill offers a serious threat to New England and the Atlantic seaboard. We see in it the final blow to many of our industries, the crippling of our shipping, the destruction of the business at our ports, the loss of our export trade in petroleum and its derivatives, the transfer of our $50,000,000 trade in bunker fuel oil to foreign ports, a tremendously increased cost of country roads, closing of refineries, and an increase of at least 2 cents per gallon in the cost of gasoline. We of the East are ready and willing to bear our equitable share of the taxes necessary to balance the National Budget, but we can not see the justice in a revenue measure that lays upon New England the tax which it lays upon the rest of the country and then lays upon us in addition a 70 per cent tax on agriculture, industry, and shipping, which we can not absorb without absolute disaster.

Give us a revenue measure equitable in its application, using all alike, and we will find no fault.

Why tax us all in this inequitable fashion, not in the interests of the Federal Government, not in the interests of the independent producers, but in the interests of the great integrated oil companies that to-day constitute a monopoly as complete, unfair, and destructive as ever it was back in 1911 when the Supreme Court dissolved the holdings of the Standard Oil?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Maine. The gentleman from Texas suggested that the enactment of this tariff will set millions of men to work in the oil fields. It is undisputed that the oil industry is so overproduced to-day that all you have to do is to turn the valves on in the pinched-in wells already drilled in order to obtain from three to five times our present production. Only proration and martial law keep it off the market to-day.

Since 1926, when the oil industry found itself in distress, it has been drilling producing wells at the rate of from 11,000 to 18,000 per year.

There are economic evils inherent in the oil business itself such that this tax will do them no good whatever. It can not restore right economic conditions in the industry or, if restored, preserve those conditions against the unfair, economic, and destructive competition of the great oil companies that to-day exercise monopoly in this country as complete, as unfair, and as destructive as ever it was back in 1911, when the Standard Oil holdings were dissolved by the Supreme Court.

I want to tell you, gentlemen, that out of the thousands and thousands of oil companies in the United States you can take 20 companies, 10 of the Standard companies and 10 of the non-Standard companies, and these 20 companies will represent 80 per cent of the total capitalization of the industry and practically one-half the production. They will handle and transport practically all of the oil. They own 90 per cent of the pipe lines, 73 per cent of the refining capacity, practically 93 per cent of the cracking capacity, nearly 100 per cent of the storage facilities, and probably 85 per cent of the merchandising outlets.

You talk about how little they paid the producer in Texas. Those great integrated companies, when they were paying the Texas producers 10 cents a barrel for their oil, through their purchasing companies, their pipe-line companies, and their transportation companies were making 84 cents a barrel on every barrel for which they paid the producer 10 cents before they began to refine it.

I can not enlarge upon this farther now. The trouble with the oil business is not the importation of this fuel oil that is coming to the Atlantic seaboard, none of which is going into the interior.

They have stated to you here the comparative prices of domestic and foreign crude oil; but this Venezuelan oil and the American oil are two different things. It takes five barrels of Venezuelan oil to make as much gasoline as one barrel of American oil. The Venezuelan oil has what we call an asphalt base, and it is run not so much for gasoline as for asphalt and fuel oil. We have never used domestic fuel oil on the Atlantic coast, and are so far from the sources of domestic production that we can not use domestic oil economically.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. In what way does the American Navy lose $8,000,000 under this amendment?

Mr. NELSON of Maine. On the assumption that it will increase the price at least the amount of the tariff.

Mr. KELLER. And not that we are using foreign oil?
Mr. NELSON of Maine. Oh, no. What do you think they are putting this tariff on for?

I want to say that this bill threatens ruin to the industries of the Atlantic coast, and will do absolutely no good to the little independent refiners, dominated as they are by these great oil companies. I may say further that whatever benefit may accrue from this bill will go into the pockets of the great major companies that to-day unfairly and uneconomically dominate the business. [Applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I think it is time to stop in the progress of this legislation and take our soundings. The Crisp amendment, from which this amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts takes out a great part, amounts to $100,000,000, and in view of what has happened in this House it behooves everyone on both sides to get himself down seriously to the task of raising some revenue for the support of this Government. [Applause.]

I do not care whether you subscribe to my idea that the Budget must be balanced or not. I do say to you that with a Budget such as we have for the coming year we will have to raise finances, and members of the Ways and Means Committee from the North, East, West, and South have agreed that four or five excise taxes might be equitably placed, and a tax on oil is one of them.

I say to you frankly that this oil proposition has been pending before the committee for two years. There is not an industry in this country that appealed with more equity for a tariff than this industry. A protective tariff of 2 cents per gallon is what they asked for. When we began to search for revenue for this Government we decided as a revenue measure that we could well place a tax of 1 cent a gallon upon the oil that is imported into this country.

Now, what are the facts? The facts are that the Pan-American Oil Co., the Gulf Oil Co., the Dutch Shell Oil Co., and the Standard of New Jersey are the four companies that are bringing this oil in here, gathered up from Venezuela, Colombia, and old Mexico. This oil comes into this country and not only affects the price of oil but is also used as a peg to which they can peg down the prices upon the coal mined in this country, and here is the direful situation you are up against.

Listen to me, you men who oppose this provision: I say to you that every hole bored into the earth for oil is bored with the drill of an independent oil operator. It was through their industry, it was through their enterprise, that the great oil fields of Texas were recently developed. Those are things to think about.

All right; what have you as the result of the importation of this cheap oil? I am told by a man who spoke before the Committee on Ways and Means, who represented the American Federation of Labor, that 350,000 men in the oil fields composed a respectable company of the great army of unemployed to-day.

Now, you have not only the oil industry paralyzed in this country, but I say to you that there is also the anthracite and bituminous coal industries paralyzed. In my town I used to hear the whistle every morning of 15 mines that furnished employment to hundreds and hundreds of workmen who supported their humble American homes. These coal mines, this industry, are involved in this and, my friends, during the last year they operated only 40 days.

In a little town where I live great throngs last year were beating about the doors of the Red Cross begging for food. The most of them were coal miners that did not have any employment. That is the proposition that you are up against.

Now, here is my young friend from Massachusetts, one of the most able members of the committee, so regular yesterday, jumps clear out of the traces to-day. [Laughter.] What has come over the spirit of the dreams of my good friend from Massachusetts? Well, if I wanted to be real mean I would say to my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Maine that if there are any Members from any two States in the Union that ought to be consistent on the question of the tariff it is Members from those two States. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I want to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that I voted against the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill.

Mr. RAGON. So did I. That was a good vote.

Mr. NELSON of Maine rose.

Mr. RAGON. The gentleman from Maine voted for it.

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Does the gentleman know that one of the greatest industries in my State is the paper and pulp industry, and it has no tariff protection whatever, and is in the same depressed condition and needs help?

Mr. RAGON. If the gentleman's statement is correct, and he will present an amendment here, I would support it on the floor. [Applause.]

Oh, my friend from Maine over here wants to put an embargo on lobsters that are not over 31/2 inches long, but he does not want to give anything to destitute oil fields and coal mines in the West, central North, and South. Now I want to come to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Mc-

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to another gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. RAGON. No; I will come to the gentleman in a moment. Do you know what my friend from Massachusetts did? He threw a conniption fit because somebody has suggested that this is a tariff. He shed crocodile tears of sympathy about my coal miners and oil men in my State and the business men who have their dollars frozen in these investments there; but he said he could not lay aside principle, notwithstanding they had made a good case; and the principle involved was that he could not put in a revenue bill, what amounted to a tariff suggestion. No longer than yesterday my good friend from Massachusetts passed through the tellers, and as one of the counters I put my hand on his back, counting him in favor of a sales tax, and what did that sales tax provide? It is terrible to mention a tariff suggestion in a revenue bill, and yet my friend walked right up to the lick log yesterday and swallowed the 21/4 per cent tariff proposition on every imported article included in the sales tax bill. If it is bad to-day to have a tariff in a revenue measure, certainly it was bad yesterday. I tell you, my friends, you people from New England-and I have nothing against you, I am for you, and I know you represent a great section of this country, one with a rich history-you can not prevent us fellows from the South and West and central North from expecting you once in a while to be a little consistent when we are getting it in the neck in a financial way.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman has spoken about my colleague from Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell me how many Members from the oil States on my side of the House voted for my tariff on shoes?

Mr. RAGON. I could not tell the gentleman.

Mr. CONNERY. There was not one.

Mr. RAGON. I do not blame them. The gentleman from Massachusetts has to have an obsession, and I suppose his tariff on shoes is as good an obsession as any other. If he stays here for the next hundred years, I suppose he will be throwing up to somebody the fact that he did not vote for his tariff on shoes. If that has not had a salutary political effect upon the minds of the people in his district in this time. I do not believe it ever will.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes. Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. The gentleman has several times spoken of the advantage of this measure as a revenue producer, but as yet I have not heard any discussion of how much revenue it will produce.

Mr. RAGON. I state to the gentleman that it will raise not less than $25,000,000 a year.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. The report says $5,000,000.

Mr. RAGON. I know they put it in the report. I state to the gentleman, and he can get the hearings and go through them himself, and he will see that the statement in the report was ill-considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas his expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment. I call the attention of this House to a memorable utterance of the immortal Patrick Henry, delivered before the Virginia Assembly 150 years ago. Patrick Henry standing before the House of Delegates of the Virginia Assembly a century and a half ago said to those great men who confronted him on that occasion:

Are we of the class of those who, having eyes see not, and having ears hear not the things that so seriously concern our temporal

When I come before this House this afternoon to speak in favor of the provision imposing a tax on the importation of crude oil into the United States I am thinking about the 25,000 idle coal miners in my congressional district. I not only think about those 25,000 idle men but I am thinking of the multiplied thousands in the coal industry throughout this country, all over Kentucky, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Arkansas, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana. There are four great competitive coal fields in America in the very heart of the Nation prostrate, with decaying tipples, while the outside oil industry of this country is importing crude oil in tankers in every direction along the coast, to be used as fuel in competition with coal. As I say, they are doing that, while our tipples are falling down, and the investment of men by the thousands have gone by the wayside. Crude oil is the greatest competitor of coal in this Nation. As a result of the oil industry built up in South America and old Mexico, with the refineries located along the south side of the Rio Grande River beyond the reach of our taxing authorities, and those men bringing this cheap oil, produced cheaply with cheap labor in these foreign countries, and refining it with labor of Mexicans, many thousands of coal miners in this country are starving and begging for bread. The independent producers that have developed our own oil fields are practically bankrupted by the unfair competition of a foreign oil octopus.

It is time, as representatives of the people, that we should open our eyes and realize that four great oil concerns propose to destroy a basic industry that has for almost a century rolled the wheels and turned the great machines of progress and prosperity in this Nation. In America to-day there are more than 100,000 coal miners in soup lines, begging for bread, and at the hands of the Red Cross they carry home something to their children, while the four great oil companies of South America and Mexico are competing with coal producers and the people are installing oil stoves and consuming outside oil without a tax upon it. Oh, yes; it is a revenue measure. I do not care whether you call it a tariff or a tax. I am in favor of putting on these industries their share of the burden of the American people in balancing the Budget of this Government. In last week's Collier's Magazine I read an article in favor of a sales tax. The author said, "Don't tax me, but tax that man behind the tree," and the man behind the tree is the laborer and the farmer all over this land. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I come from a State which deals very largely in imported oil. In Baltimore alone there is manufactured 1,500,000 tons of asphalt. That asphalt is used in the building of the roads of this country. It is used in roofing on houses in most of the large cities on the Atlantic coast. It is a very important industry. It is the largest in the country.

It disturbs me to hear Democrats stand here and advocate a tariff. I have never advocated a tariff, except to equalize costs abroad and here.

It has not been thought we would put a tariff in a revenue bill. Certainly it is not put in there for revenue purposes. The statement of the Treasury Department filed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who spoke the other day, showed conclusively that there was no revenue from this item. The statement filed by the Committee on Ways and Means showed that there would be probably $5,000,000 of revenue, which is far from the $53,000,000 mentioned by some one recently and $100,000,000 mentioned by another. The estimate was that there would be $5,000,000 revenue. When we consider the gasoline and oil used by the Government in its battleships and other enterprises throughout the country, not including the Postal Service, the United States Government will be required to pay a tax of $8,400,-000. In other words, if the committee is correct, then the Government itself instead of receiving revenue would lose $3,400,000. That demonstrates clearly that this is not an item for revenue. I ask you to consider what it means to the people of this country. It means an increase in the cost of gasoline and oil of over $152,000,000. Is it fair, is it just, at this time when everybody is striving to get along, when every cent counts, to place upon the people of this country an additional tax of $152,000,000?

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield. Mr. McKEOWN. Where does the gentleman get the figure that it will cost $152,000,000? Does the gentleman not know that the large companies who are importing this oil control the price?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It has been admitted that the purpose of it is to raise the price of oil and gasoline, and when we do that we raise it the total amount of the tax, and that will be $152,000,000.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield further? Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield. Mr. McKEOWN. Sixty-three million barrels of oil at 42 cents a barrel would raise revenue, would it not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No.

Mr. McKEOWN. Why not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Because there will be no oil come into this country if this tax is placed on it. It is absolutely confiscatory, and the gentleman knows it. If this oil would continue coming into this country, you would not be asking for this tariff. That is the purpose of asking for a tariff. You want to prohibit it from coming into the country, and if any of it does come to this country, you want to have a tax or tariff level to which you can raise the price.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield, certainly.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman concede that oil is one of the strongest competitors of coal?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; I do.

Mr. MAY. And does the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, that there has been a companion measure in this House and one in the Senate to put the coal industry under the domination of a commission? In fact, in the hands of Mr. LINTHICUM. I do know something about those bills, having talked with some miners' representatives. Perhaps I will know more about them when they get on the floor of the House. That is an admission by the gentleman, however, that the purpose of this tariff is to prohibit this oil coming in so that it may raise the price of oil and give coal a better chance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I feel sorry for the coal people. There are great coal fields in my State, but there is no use trying to hold back something like oil. People are putting oil into their homes and factories on account of the convenience of it. It can not be prohibited any more than we could bring back the old horse car, the old buggy, or the old wagon and put it in competition with the automobile by some legislation. I am sorry for oil and ice both, but can not stop the wheels of progress.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield. Mr. O'CONNOR. The suggestion that this is a tariff or an embargo on oil that would protect coal is very similar to the argument which the proponents of a tariff on bananas made before the Committee on Ways and Means. They argued for a tariff on bananas to protect the fruit crop of California.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I must say that this tariff takes many different directions. I never thought I would hear a Democrat stand up here and argue for a tariff on oil to protect the oil and coal industry of this country. I only expected a Democrat to go as far as asking a sufficient tariff to equalize the cost of production.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield. Mr. McKEOWN. The Democrats in the oil States got their cue from the gentleman from Maryland, when he wanted a tariff on tomatoes. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. The laugh is not on the gentleman from Maryland. I will admit there have been one or two gentlemen from my State who wanted a tariff on tomatoes, but certainly I did not advocate that. I do not advocate a tariff to protect one section or one industry and not protect all industries, if it is necessary, and then only to protect labor by equalizing cost of production at home and abroad.

Now, gentlemen, I say that if this tariff is put on oil-

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Not now.

Mr. PARKS. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he voted for a tax on beer?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will vote for beer every time it comes around, but that is a tax, not tariff, and I will be glad to do it every day if I can. If we could get good beer into this country once [laughter and applause]-if we could get legal beer into this country, it would do what I have done here. It would put a smile on the faces of the people of this country and the depression would fade away like the mist before the noonday sun.

Now, gentlemen, I am pleading for the Atlantic seacoast. I am pleading for Baltimore and for Maryland. If you put this tariff on, it is going to destroy the industries along the Atlantic seaboard. It will mean a loss of $10,000,000 to my city alone. Of the imports of my city about 17 per cent are oil, and, as I say, we produce vast quantities of asphalt. If you put this tariff on oil you are going to increase the price to the consumers of this country, to every man running a little automobile, to every man running a little engine, to every man running a little boat, and to the Government, in running its great battleships; you are going to increase the price of gasoline and oil in accordance with what you have assessed in this tariff.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman know that the price of crude oil along the Atlantic seaboard is now more than 50 cents less than it was 12 months ago.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That may be. The gentleman says that, and I presume it is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. When they were paying more than 50 cents a barrel for it a year ago than they are now paying, your industries were going, were they not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, I know this tariff puts an additional cost on it and prohibits us from bringing it in.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Does not the gentleman know that the report of the Tariff Commission shows that if we had a rate of 2 cents per gallon on oil shipped into this country, the importers could lay it down on the eastern shore for 8 cents a barrel less than we could lay it down there, even with a tax of 2 cents a gallon on such oil?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have not read the tariff report.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I suggest that the Tariff Commission's report challenges itself in that respect?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ascertain if we can reach an agreement as to closing debate on this amendment and amendments thereto. I will hazard the request to close debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto at 5.15, vote on the amendment, and then rise.

Mr. BRUMM. What amendment?

Mr. CRISP. Just on this oil amendment.

Mr. BRUMM. I have an amendment that I want to add to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia. The amendment relates to hard and soft coal and briquets. Will the gentleman's request affect me in any way?

Mr. CRISP. Not at all. If the amendment is in order now, it would be in order when the committee resumes as an amendment to the pending amendment. My request is simply to limit the debate on this oil amendment and amendments thereto.

The gentleman from Georgia asks The CHAIRMAN. unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close at 5.15. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, in all the years I have been here I never rose to speak upon a subject as to which I was more in dead earnest or as to which I felt more concern than that upon which I am to speak to you for just a few moments.

A few days ago I had occasion to make some reply to my friend from Maine. I confessed to you irritation then, and I confess some irritation now, that I am compelled to rise in behalf of the policy of protection in answer to a gentleman from Maine, he coming from a State that has been the beneficiary of protection in a thousand ways since the protective tariff was first inaugurated in this country.

I do not wish to hang this debate upon any such appeal as that, but let me say just a word or two about it before I

I have here the statement made by the gentleman from Maine when we had the tariff bill before us, when he was pleading-and I think justly so-for protection upon potatoes. I agreed and helped him get his tariff on potatoes. I will not read the things he said, but I say to you that they would apply-and a thousand times over-to the condition of the oil industry which we represent here to-day.

He spoke a moment ago about the condition of the paper mills and the pulp industry. I ask him, in all sincerity and honesty, when he goes home to the State of Maine, to go to the paper manufacturers and the pulp mills and ask them. when New England comes here and presents opposition to those of us who are seeking to get protection on oil, coming from 18 States of this Union, with over 40,000,000 population, how many votes he thinks he is helping to get in their interest when they come here pleading for help. I ask him to go back and ask that question of them.

Some reference was made a moment ago to the vote of western Members on the shoe tariff. I say to you that many of those Representatives who are interested in this fight to-day voted for a tariff on shoes. I was one of those who did not, but I voted for the tariff bill which carried protection for shoes. Let me tell you one reason some did not vote for a tariff on shoes. Because there was a refusal to give an adequate compensatory duty on hides. That is why we did not do it. [Applause.] Every man who was here remembers that argument.

Mr. NELSON of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NELSON of Maine. We came down here and desired to get a tariff on wood pulp because our mills were operating in the red. If the committee had allowed the various interests that wanted to get tariff protection the same privilege that they allowed you, and we had framed the bill so that my manufacturers now operating in the red and now using six hundred millions of oil a year could have received compensatory protection, then we might have worked out a wise tariff bill, and probably I could have voted with the gentleman.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman, by inference, admits we ought to have this protection; but because they do not get some one additional protection, he objects to this. If the gentleman wants to balance the ledger on it. I would be glad to do it. If I had here the tariff bill, it would take me an hour, as I said the other day, to read the items of Maine and other New England States upon which there is protection. [Applause.]

Mr. NELSON of Maine rose.

Mr. HOCH. I can not yield further for the moment.

Mr. NELSON of Maine. What has that to do with the merits of this bill?

Mr. HOCH. It has a lot to do with the merits of those coming from protection States who come here to oppose protection which means life to our industry. [Applause.]

My friends, I do not wish to make any sectional appeal, but I can not resist the temptation to say again to Members coming here from States with great protected industries, when they refer to making the tariff a major issue-and I do not say it as a threat, I do not say it as a warning, but I think I know the sentiment of the great Middle Western States, the States which have gone along time after time in helping to get protection for New England industriesand I say to you if you want to make the tariff the major issue, to your detriment, go ahead and take such an inconsistent attitude. Let me say in fairness there are some Republicans here from New England who take the broad view and are with us in this fight. In my judgment, their attitude is the one that in the long run is in the interest of New England. [Applause.]

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, at this time I shall discuss the question of a tariff on oil and submit some remarks concerning the general provisions of the tax bill now before the committee for consideration.

Money must be collected, and that through taxation, to pay the general running expenses of the Government: but to say that the Budget has to be balanced at this time, in my judgment, is not a correct statement as to the necessity of raising revenue as outlined in the pending bill. All of the money to pay the expenses of conducting the affairs of our Government is derived through an income tax, with the exception of what is collected through the customs houses and the amount that is collected by the Federal courts in fines and forfeitures. The burden of taxation should be laid mostly upon those most able to pay, and I could never see any good reason why a man with a large income, much more than is needed for the support of any family, should object to paying a large amount of that income to the Federal Government that protects him and his property in deriving such

I believe that every Member of Congress who will take the time to analyze the situation that confronts the independent oil producers of the United States will come to the conclusion that the question of a tariff on oil is a fight between the Standard Oil Co., the Dutch Shell Oil Co., the Gulf Oil Co. controlled by the Mellon interests, and the independents. In my judgment, the tariff question is not a political question and should be considered from the standpoint of the country in general. I have always favored a tariff on oil, and on July 18, 1921, during my first term in Congress, when the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill was under consideration by the House of Representatives, I spoke in favor of an oil tariff.

In my speech at that time is the following:

Another reason that I am for a duty on oil, in addition to those Another reason that I am for a duty on oil, in addition to those already given, is that I am convinced that the Standard Oil Co. is opposing the duty, and from purely selfish purposes, as is its usual custom. We know that John D. Rockefeller and his interests do not favor one thing or oppose another thing for purely philanthropic purposes. Of course, he will build a college or make some other donation occasionally, and then there will be an advance in oil. By shipping in this Mexican oil he can absolutely put the independent and little oil men out of business if it comes in duty free. I do not believe that this duty would materially raise the price of gasoline, for it has not dropped in price in proportion to the fall in the price of crude oil.

It is common knowledge that the price of gasoline is not controlled by the price of crude oil. For instance, the price of bread was about the same, with wheat at 25 cents per bushel, the price last fall, as it was when wheat was $2 per bushel. The price of bread does not go down with the price of wheat, and the same is true with oil.

In my speech of July 18, 1921, is this further statement:

If, however, the Standard Oil Co. obtains control of the production of oil in this country, then God only knows what the price of oil would be and to what dizzy heights it would go.

I further stated at that time:

When it comes to my making a choice between the Standard Oil producers and the little producers, you can count me on the side of the little fellow.

These big oil companies above referred to spread much propaganda over the country to the effect that if the price of oil goes up gasoline will go up with it, and that our oil must be conserved. There is no man able to tell how much oil is under the ground, and we have heard cry that our oil reserves are going to be depleted for many years. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the further fact that wildcatting and discovering new oil fields is not done by the Standard Oil Co., the Dutch Shell Oil Co., or the Mellon interests, but is done largely by the independent producers. The independent producers spend millions and millions of dollars and pay millions to the farmers in the way of leases and royalties. These big oil companies have the little producers and the independents almost prostrate at this time, and this is due largely to our foreign imports. I am in favor of a tariff that will shut out this foreign oil, at least at the present time.

The Tariff Commission, in its investigation a short time ago, decided that it costs $1.03 more per barrel to produce oil in the United States than it does in South America. The work is nearly all done in that country by cheap native labor at salaries that will not pay living expenses for an American worker. There should at least be a tariff on oil equal to the difference in the cost of production in the United States and in these foreign countries. When the independent producers are at work and the oil fields open up thousands and thousands of men are put to work, and at the same time the revenue of the Government is increased, because then the independent producers pay larger income taxes. Such a tariff on oil would produce much more revenue to the United States, by placing the independent producers in a position where they would pay more income taxes, than the little tax on imported oil of 1 cent per gallon, as contained in this bill.

Here is inserted a statement concerning oil production in certain foreign countries and in the United States:

Mr. SWANK. I do not believe that the small tax on imported oil, as contained in this bill, will keep out much, if any, foreign oil. In the last Congress this administration enacted the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, which contains the highest rates of any bill ever enacted into law in this country. Somebody should explain why an administration which is in favor of a high protective tariff on everything, even the necessaries of life, is opposed to a tariff on oil. Within the last few years the price of oil has varied from 5 cents per barrel to $3.50 per barrel, but you have not seen very much change in the price of gasoline. A proper tariff on oil would cause a great revival of business in this country and would greatly increase Government revenues. I hope the tax on imported oil, as contained in this bill, will be increased to at least 2 cents per gallon, and, in my judgment, it should be increased to 3 cents per gallon. The fangs of the big major companies mentioned above must be drawn, that they can not further feed and enrich themselves upon the poverty of the people.

Yes; it is necessary to raise revenue to pay the expenses of Government, but this should not be done by the imposition of a sales tax. I have always opposed a sales tax and oppose it now, and voted to strike the sales tax from this bill.

During the last few days we have heard much discussion about "balancing the Budget," but have not heard much about balancing the budget of the farmers and working people of this country, and those who are traveling the highways looking for work. I often wonder why it has become so necessary to balance the Budget at this time, when that has not been done for the last several years. Who knows for a certainty what the present deficit is? The Treasury Department for the past 10 years has been mistaken many times in the sum of over $1,000,000,000 a year on the Treasury deficit. The fact of the business is there is not likely to be much reduction in expenses so long as the Budget is balanced. Expenses of government must be reduced and needless bureaus abolished.

Bonds of the United States are good because the Government backs them, and these bonds are good to-day. A sales tax places the burden of taxation upon those least able to pay, upon the food that the people eat, and upon the clothing that they wear. I am opposed to this method of taxation. The provision of the sales tax carries a rate of 2½ per cent designed to raise some $600,000,000 in taxes. Some of the speakers have said that this would amount to about $5 per person, or about $25 to the average family. I do not believe anyone doubts but what, with the administration of this tax, it would mean a tax not only of 2½ per cent but anywhere from 5 per cent to 10 per cent, and, instead of meaning $25 to the average family, it would probably mean $250 increase.

We can not afford at this time to tax the poor and the unemployed, the naked, and the hungry any further. I shall never vote to tax the food of little children, the cheap clothing of mothers weeping over the distress of their hungry families, or the overalls and brogans the father wears in his search for work. Income taxes can be increased in the higher brackets; the estate and gift tax can also be increased. In this bill the maximum tax of 40 per cent is applied to incomes when they amount to $100,000, but the same rate is not applied to estates until they reach $10,000,000. If estates were taxed at the same rate as individual incomes, even after exempting the first $50,000, it would mean an income in this one tax alone of $714,000,000. Why not tax it? This is income that is seldom earned in any part by the beneficiaries. It is estimated that the tax on individual incomes that this bill provides will amount to $112,000,000, corporation tax $21,000,000, and the gift and estate tax $35,000,000. Money can be derived to pay the expenses of government all right without any sales tax levied upon the poor and unfortunate. [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in matters of this kind there is liable to be a wide divergence of opinion. As a matter of fact, I have not been disturbed during the whole proposition as to the discrimination between tariff and tax. That has not disturbed me at all.

In this discussion I am reminded of an old New England saying: "It makes a great difference whose cod is hooked." [Laughter.] That is applicable to this special case, but really it is a problem for the whole Atlantic coast in regard to fuel oil. I have made some investigation to see whether or not we could not eliminate fuel oil and double the tax on crude oil and thus arrive at some result. That is, double the tax on crude oil and have fuel oil tax free. But those well versed in the oil business told me that that would be impossible, that they would evade the tax and bring in all fuel oil. It was said that it would bring in no revenue, and the committee finally decided on 1 cent, because we did not desire to be denuded of the fundamental premise in writing a tax bill-revenue. They said that 1 cent a gallon would bring in considerable revenue, and I think myself it will bring in more than the $5,000,000 estimated in the bill and will give a great measure of relief to the independent oil producers of the United States.

I have been urging that oil be carried in the bill since we first started to frame a list of commodities to tax. [Applause.] You gentlemen on this side ought not to be concerned, for you have always declared that the tariff is a tax. I can find that statement in a hundred speeches. Here is the place for you to apply those views—it is an excise tax in a revenue bill.

When the oil people were over here in the caucus room in the Office Building, nearly the whole Texas delegation appeared there, and I made a speech, as did Secretary of War Hurley, and the Texas delegation said: "Oh, yes; we are for you, but your difficulty will be to get the Republican Ways and Means Committee to consider it." Now, you gentlemen will have no difficulty, for all you have to do is to go before the Democratic Ways and Means Committee. As I said the other day, it is the only chance that you gentlemen will have; it is the only chance the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. Douglas] will have for copper. We got copper in one day, and out it went the next. We ought not to have taken it out, because it is as deserving of consideration as the oil proposition. [Applause.]

Mr LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, we have been working for weeks to raise revenues, we have been endeavoring to frame a revenue bill which will raise approximately $1,000,000,000 additional revenue. We have here an item to tax imported crude and fuel oil and gasoline 1 cent a gallon. which is variously estimated to furnish from no revenue to a maximum of $5,000,000 a year. It does not bring in revenue. The Government under this proposition will have to pay $8,000,000 more for its fuel oil, so that you will have to raise $3,000,000 additional to what you have estimated in order to make up this revenue-producing deficit. Why is the tax here? It is admittedly for the purpose of raising fuel oil and gasoline 1 cent a gallon to the consumers throughout the country, and the reason alleged is to help the independent producers in the midcontinent area. What does that mean to the consuming public? It means, taking the figures of the Bureau of Mines for the year 1930, on a distribution of 348,000,000 barrels of fuel oil and of 15,858,-000,000 gallons of gasoline, if you add a cent to the cost of that to the people, you will be adding to the cost of the people $300,000,000 by this tax. You are raising $1,000,-000,000 to throw into the Treasury because you need it, and at the same time you are imposing this burden upon the people, you impose an additional $300,000,000 burden upon them, and where does the money go? To the independent producers? No. To the Treasury? No. It goes to the refiners, the pipe-line owners, and the distributors of the oil who are also producers—to the big companies.

Mr. HOPE. If that is the case, why are the big companies opposing this measure?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They do not want it because they say it is harmful and not necessary. We produce many, many more barrels of oil in this country than we import, and we export more oil than we import.

Mr. McCORMACK. We export three times as much as we import.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is true. Speaking about coal, the reason that fuel oil is supplanting coal is not because of a difference in price but of the difference in convenience, economy in handling, and cleanliness. That is the reason that oil is supplanting coal, just as rubber is supplanting steel for urban transportation.

This will place a burden on the people, and will not benefit those whom it seeks to benefit, and will result only in flowing millions of dollars into the already swollen coffers of the big oil companies.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, while there might be some opposition to a tax on oil or a tariff on oil, the last place in the world that this opposition should come from is New England and the shipping interests of the East. It is not so long since we heard the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Lehlbach] wave the American flag and ask us to enact a ship subsidy bill. Congress did enact the merchant marine act in 1928. Let us look at the figures. Since the enactment of the merchant marine act in 1928 we have loaned $150,922,000 for the construction of these subsidized ships. Of this amount $91,860,652 had already been advanced up to November 30, 1931, and only $7,986,000 paid back. In 1932 we gave in subsidies to these ships now insisting on buying foreign oil no less than $21,000,000, and in 1933, the coming fiscal year, we are giving these ships $24,000,000 in subsidies, or an outright gift of that amount, and I say that it comes with poor grace for any industry that is living out of public funds to protest against the buying of American products. The subsidies to ship companies for which the Government is already committed for a term of 10 years amounts to the staggering figure of $312,133,813—every cent from the Public Treasury—a gift to these companies operating subsidized ships. There are about 55 companies on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts enjoying these subsidies. They are being supported out of public funds and ought to be compelled to use only American products, instead of coming here and pleading for foreign oil. They should be put to shame. [Applause.] Besides, if we are living under a protective tariff system there can be no justification under the conditions exposed in the oil industry to deny some relief in the form of protection to our independent oil producers. Any slight increase in retail price will be more than compensated by increased employment and resulting increase of purchasing power. plause.]

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, oil is one of the largest industries in the country and one that plays an important part in our economic stability as a nation. There are some 20 States that produce oil in such large quantities that any curtailment in the production and sale of oil has a depressing effect upon all classes.

It has placed a heavy strain upon the banks, the merchants, the farmer, and other business enterprises. In Oklahoma there are thousands and thousands of oil workers out of employment, and no doubt there are hundreds of thousands of men and women throughout the United States out of employment because of the condition of the oil industry.

In addition to that the owners of the oil lands who have been receiving royalties are now suffering. Most of the small independent companies have been forced to the wall or have quit and are now in the hands of receivers. I claim this deplorable condition is caused in a large measure by the importation of oil, duty free, from foreign countries. What is the trouble with the coal industry? Why are the coal mines filling up with water and thousands upon thousands of miners out of employment? It is because the coal industry must compete with the hundreds of millions of barrels of cheap crude oil flowing in from foreign countries, making the Standard Oil companies rich without even a penny of import tax going to help pay the expenses of our Government. It is a shame and disgrace to talk of raising taxes on these poor unemployed and low-salaried miners and oil workers to balance the Budget when the very weapon that takes the bread from their mouths is allowed to come into this country without tax and add riches to the few who already own most of the wealth of the world. We should hide our faces in shame.

The New England States and a few others are fighting the oil tax because they harbor most of these big oil interests. Do they ever stop to think that their own factories have tariff protection from foreign imports? Then let us be consistent. [Applause.]

The fact is that had it not been for the large volume of imported oil our domestic demand would have absorbed the oil products in this country. The failure to afford protection will eventually destroy the small independent oil producer and the coal industry entirely and place production in the hands of a few large concerns. Such a policy would be unfair and unwise.

It has been estimated by experts that Congress can raise $53,000,000 in annual revenue by adopting the oil-excise proposals in the pending revenue bill, or it can increase this sum to over $118,000,000 if it grants the higher rates originally suggested by the American petroleum industry. This will not constitute any burden upon consumers but will relieve them of the necessity for many vexatious taxes whose total product will not net the Government any comparable sum.

No serious objection has been offered to this bill except by the oil importers who have reaped millions of dollars in the past years through the free admission of foreign oil to the ruin of American labor and business. The objections offered by some manufacturers have been based upon the mistaken idea that this tax would increase their fuel costs although they have totally ignored the more important fact that if this measure hastens the revival of the American petroleum industry it will multiply the markets for their goods. Less harm and more good will be done by the oil excise tax than by any other taxation scheme thus far suggested.

There is no popular opposition to this proposal as there is to practically every other form of tax. Over 5,000,000 members of labor organizations have petitioned for its adoption, farm organizations have urged its passage, and almost countless petitions from business groups have indorsed it. No other tax proposal under consideration has the enthusiastic support of any considerable group. When we find from seven to ten million people asking us to adopt a tax measure common sense as well as sound business might suggest that we pay some attention to these recommendations.

We must raise revenue. We can do it by measures which will annoy and impoverish the people and which will dislocate our business structure or we can do it by some such legislation as the oil excise tax which would be justified from the standpoint of the protection of an American industry even if it did not bring in the millions of dollars it is certain to produce.

I sincerely trust that the proposed tax will be adopted to restrict oil imports sufficiently to afford the oil and coal producers of the United States some measure of much-needed protection. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, in the short time I have it is hard to say much, except that I heartily favor the McCormack amendment to strike out this tax on oil. It has been very interesting for me to sit in this House to-day and watch all these gentlemen from the oil States make a wonderful plea for an oil tariff when these same gentlemen in the Seventy-first Congress could not see their way to vote for a shoe tariff and put 200,000 shoe workers back at work at the time that I was fighting here for a shoe tariff.

They claimed at that time that it was not good Democratic doctrine to vote for a tariff on shoes. Well, these same Members can be consistent now and vote as good Democrats in favor of this McCormack amendment and strike out this oil tariff. This provision in the bill sought to be stricken out by the McCormack amendment, if it remains in the bill, will cost the mills of the city of Lawrence, in my district, from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a year, and I say to my friends from the oil States and from the Southern States that they should not penalize the States of the entire Atlantic seaboard merely because this is a tax which would help their own States. This oil tax, if passed, will place a tremendous burden upon the mills of New England. These mills are already struggling in an unequal battle against competition in many of your Southern and Western States where the hours of labor are much longer than in Massachusetts.

The shoe tariff was only for 20 per cent. You ask a 70 per cent tariff on oil. The shoe tariff penalized no other State. Your oil tax would drive some of our mills into bankruptcy and would ruin our coastwise shipping, to say nothing of the added burden of high prices on oil and gasoline to the individual consumer.

I will say to you frankly, if you had hours of labor in your States equal to ours in Massachusetts, hours of labor which protect the worker, and especially the women, then your labor argument might come with better grace before this House. Until you see fit to pass legislation which will insure decent hours of labor and decent living wages in your States, your labor argument is useless. I hope the McCormack amendment striking out all of paragraph 4 will be adopted.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, this tax on imported oil and oil products will accomplish several highly important objectives, every one of them productive of beneficent results, with no consequent injustices or penalties to any section or to any industry. Primarily, it will raise revenue and serve to protect and revive an industry that directly or indirectly employs nearly a million men; an industry that now is prostrate because imported oil has forced it to sell below the cost of production. This giant industry heroically tried by curtailment and proration to save itself and solve its own problems, but its every effort was met by vast importations of foreign oil. It asked a tariff but was denied. Now it asks this small excise tax in behalf of an American industry; an independent industry in which hundreds of thousands of farmers are interested—owners of small "stripper" wells now nonproducing, and of prospective oil-producing lands under lease on which, because of this prostration of the oil industry, the rentals can not be paid. In the sorry plight of agriculture this rental has been a great boon over extensive areas where oil leases are held for future development.

This cheap imported oil is causing and will continue to cause immense waste in these shallow "stripper" fields, where wells must be pumped or forever lost. There are nearly 300,000 wells in this country that produce an average of one barrel a day. They are mostly shut down to-day and may be for a short time without serious damage, but their continued shut-down will mean their utter destruction for all time. I am appealing to you in behalf of the farmers who own these small wells to give this little relief from the curse of foreign importations which have paralyzed their production and their revenue.

The proposed excise tax on oil will not increase the price of gasoline to the consumer. In order to demonstrate this we have only to refer to past history. The average price of gasoline at the filling station in February, 1926, was 18.09 cents per gallon, exclusive of the tax. At the same time the average price of crude oil of 36 gravity was $2.04 per barrel. In February, 1929, the price of the same crude oil had dropped 84 cents, to $1.20 per barrel, and the average price of gasoline in the same cities had actually increased to 18.39 cents. In other words, a reduction in the price of oil of 84 cents per barrel was followed by a rise in the price of gasoline.

Neither is lubricating oil, in which all motorists are interested, increased or affected by the price of crude. In 1926, when crude oil was $2.04, the motorist paid from 25 to 30 cents per quart for his lubricating oil. At this time, when crude oil is 77 cents per barrel, the motorist still pays the same 25 to 30 cents per quart for lubricating oil.

The Federal Trade Commission submitted to the Senate a report in which it was pointed out that the refined products had not followed the price of crude. The report said:

With respect to refined products, at least in local sale and distribution, the price conditions reflect even less closely the actual changes in supply and demand, so far as they can be measured by concrete statistical facts.

If oil continues, as it is now, to sell below the cost of production for any great length of time, the major oil companies will in time have a complete monopoly of the entire oil industry.

Unless the independent producer can get a price above the cost of production, these few large companies inevitably will control the market, and when such time comes the consumer of gasoline and lubricating oil will suffer accordingly.

To summarize, the importation of cheap foreign oil has had these disastrous effects upon conditions in the United States:

It has caused serious unemployment in the oil industry and all allied industries.

It has compelled the independent producers of oil to operate at a loss and forced many of them already to turn their property over to the major companies. Unless this condition can be changed all independent oil producers will be eliminated and the oil business placed in the hands of a few large monopolies.

It has reduced the price of oil below the American cost of production, thus taking away the purchasing power of millions of people largely dependent upon this industry, at the same time taking away the customers from the manufacturing States and destroying their markets, with resulting unemployment in the factory districts.

It has largely displaced coal as fuel on the Atlantic seaboard, including New England, bringing about the worst conditions of unemployment ever known in the coal-mining industry.

It has destroyed the purchasing power of 3,000,000 people directly dependent upon the coal industry for their living, with a consequent reduction of the market for the products of manufacturing communities, which again aggravates the unemployment problem.

It has made the railroads victims of this condition, because coal is probably the largest single commodity making up railroad tonnage. Reduction of coal movements has caused a staggering loss in the aggregate and is largely responsible for the present distress of the railroads and the cause of unemployment among railroad workers.

It has been a serious source of loss to the farmer, who produces from his small oil wells about one-eighth of the oil produced in the great oil States. As before mentioned, nearly all the "stripper" wells, now shut down, belong to the farmer. The farmer also is the loser on account of the loss of rentals on leases—usually $1 per acre for prospective oil lands. Because of cheap oil, this lease money is not being paid. He also suffers by reason of the fact that his market is curtailed on account of unemployment in the oil fields, in the coal mines, in the factories, and on the railroads.

This tax on oil will tend to restore prosperity to the oil industry, to coal mining, to manufacturing, and to the railroads. It will enable the independent oil operator to continue to exist and thus save the people of this country from an absolute monopoly of the oil business in the hands of a few large companies which are the chief importers of oil at this time. It will relieve the farmer by giving him a better price for his royalty oil, by enabling him to pump his "stripper" wells, by restoring his lease-rental money, and by reviving his market for the products of the farm. [Applause.]

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, during the last campaign there was not one Democrat, from the chairman of our committee down, who did not go before this country and say that the Hawley-Smoot tariff was a scandal. Everyone of us, myself included, was elected on that platform. As the gentleman from New York, Doctor Crowther, said, they could not get this 70 per cent ad valorem oil tariff from a Republican committee, but they were perfectly safe before a Democratic committee. For us to go before the people and admit that, in spite of our election argument that the Hawley-Smoot tariff was too high, we put a 70 per cent ad valorem tax on oil, which placed that additional burden on the backs of the people, will simply make us ridiculous.

I just received the figures from the Department of Commerce concerning the importation and exportation of petroleum and gasoline. It requires 3 gallons of oil to make 1 of gasoline. Converting these figures into petroleum equivalents, in 1930 we imported 113,000,000 barrels of oil. In the same year we exported 213,000,000 barrels. The following year 89,000,000 barrels were imported and 158,000,000 barrels exported. We are exporting against this cheap foreign labor twice as much oil as we are importing. The fact of the matter is there are a number of oil wells, many of them in my own State, that are drawing six-tenths of a barrel a day. They can not compete because they are inefficient and out of business.

This means but one thing, and that is that the small producer who believes that by increasing the price of petroleum and gasoline he will get protection from the competition of the large oil interests is simply following a vain delusion. The large American producer will simply convert to the home markets one-half of the amount of oil he now exports and he will be in a position to fix the price on the American market just a little bit lower than the small producer can operate at a profit, just as is being done now. If he does not do this and wishes to take advantage of the tariff, inasmuch as it requires 3 gallons of oil to make 1 gallon of gasoline, he will be in a position to boost the price of gasoline from 2 to 3 cents a gallon over its present market price. The Government will get practically no increased revenue, but the ultimate consumer will be taxed just that much more for the gas and the Government will not get a cent of benefit.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. HARLAN. No. I can not yield. I am sorry.

That is one piece of commerce coming from South America. It is the only chance we have by which we may get paid for some manufactured exports to that continent. It is one of the few things that is now coming into this country, so that our automobile manufacturers, our farm-machinery manufacturers, can sell their produce and pay for it by this small amount of importation. Our importation is half as much as our exports.

While we are talking about the great number of men that will be put out of work in the oil industry, let us think for a minute of the great number of men that will be put back to work in our automobile plants, our farm-implement plants, and in our other industries that are producing things for export, which this oil and other commodities will pay for.

If we ever hope to rejuvenate our commerce, we must first begin by opening up foreign markets to our manufacturers. Our whole industrial life is built on mass production, and this can not function unless we have an outlet bigger than our domestic market for our manufactured goods. We must import something to pay for this trade, and certainly the commodity most desirable to be imported is the natural resources of other countries. I for one would be perfectly willing to employ the peon labor of South America and Mexico in the oil industry if by so doing an outlet could be given the products of the skilled mechanics of this country.

I do not wish to admit here to-day by voting for this increased burden that I obtained this congressional office by false pretenses, nor that, having obtained it, I am willing to embezzle the power thus given to me by converting it to purposes contrary to the trust imposed. I shall not and can not vote to increase the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

To maintain the stability of industry I believe the leaders of our party were wise in not attempting at this time to reduce any tariff rates until we could get corresponding reductions on tariffs in foreign countries. But for the Democratic Party to start to rewrite and boost the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill will be putting an elephant's head on our poor, misguided Democratic donkey. Such a creature would be no more ludicrous as a party emblem than will be the arguments of some of you fellow Democrats in the campaign next fall.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in rising at this time is to answer a question propounded by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Nelson], who asked if the Democratic Party had become the party of the embargo or the party which proposed tariffs higher than the protectionists did—not based on "revenue only" or adjusting the difference between the price of production here and abroad, but arbitrarily to protect an industry.

Within the last 48 hours throughout this Nation there has been most severe comment about the conduct of the affairs of the House of Representatives by the Democratic Party. If what happened in the House yesterday and during the past two weeks has brought criticism, surely what we are doing to-day will only heap further coals on our heads.

Let me say, for one, that I do not believe the day will ever come when those in control of the Democratic Party will ever permit that party to become a high protective tariff party in this country. [Applause.] If the attempt is made, some of us are going to stand separate and apart from the protectionists.

It has amazed us here to-day to listen to Democrat after Democrat making Republican tariff speeches. Members from Texas, Oklahoma, and other States have out-Hawleyed SMOOT.

I recall that when I first came to Congress the Democrats had just defeated a man for leader because he had voted for a tariff on wool and hides. In the first Democratic caucus which I attended on this side of the House in the Sixty-eighth Congress, a Member was almost removed from the Ways and Means Committee because he had voted for a tariff on sugar. What has caused a change of heart in the intervening years? I never yet read in any Democratic platform that we were a party of the embargo or high protection. Why. Mr. Chairman, if any one thing contributed to the death of the beloved Speaker who presided over the last Congress, it was the worry and pressure brought to bear on him in reference to this oil tariff during the last two weeks of the last session of Congress. Everyone in that Congress knows it. The lobby around his office was crowded day and night by delegations of Members threatening him if he did not permit an embargo. There was a definite filibuster on the Republican side of the House. The Kansas delegation, led by the distinguished gentleman [Mr. Hoch], threatened to hold up all legislation unless they were granted an embargo on oil. Other delegations threatened dire results if the Speaker yielded. We here could see him breaking under the strain. But he was a brave man and stood his ground.

The proponents of this tariff are not sincere in talking about a tax for revenue. They want an embargo and nothing else, and to-day if this "tax" passes they are getting embargo and the Government will obtain no revenue.

Oh, I plead with you Democrats. Our great party has been damaged enough during the past two weeks without adding any more to its plight. Let us jump over the aisle to the Republican side in behalf of the selfish local interests of 18 States. How many of these States, I ask you, voted for the Democratic candidate for President in 1928? In this hour when we appear to have slipped back from a position of confident victory, I call on all Democrats to stand by the principles of their beloved party; to be Representatives from their States, not merely of their States; to be Representatives of their whole country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] to strike from the provisions of the pending revenue bill the item proposing a tax of 1 cent per gallon on imported oil and its products. Not only am I unalterably opposed to the McCormack amendment but I want to say here and now that I am supporting the Blanton amendment to increase the tax to 2 cents per gallon. It has been pointed out several times during this debate that a nonpartisan tariff commission composed of experts appointed by the Congress to investigate the entire oil situation, in a report to this Congress after many months of careful study and investigation, has stated that the difference between the cost of producing a barrel of oil in the United States and in South America is $1.03. No one has denied the accuracy of that report. No one will pretend to say that the independent oil operators of America who use American labor and pay American standard of wages can possibly compete with those gigantic corporations that are importing cheap crude to our shores produced by foreign peon labor.

I submit in all fairness that inasmuch as it is admitted there is more than $1 per barrel difference in the cost of production of oil here and in Venezuela and other South American countries that the Blanton amendment is in order. It is not only in order but it is fair and reasonable. I sincerely hope the gentleman will not withdraw it. I believe I know the sentiment of this House. Every reason, every argument, every statistic that has been given this afternoon by friends of this great American industry for a tax of 1 cent per gallon on imported oil can be made for a tax of 2 cents. The Tariff Commission tells us, and it is not successfully contradicted, that these big oil importers—that is to say, the Standard Oil, the Gulf, the Pan American, or the Dutch Shell—could pay 2 cents per gallon excise tax on imported crude to our shores and still sell it for less than can our independent American operators.

It is absurd, Mr. Chairman, to hear men who are otherwise well informed stand on this floor and seriously contend that a tax of 1 cent per gallon on oil would prove to be an embargo. It was placed in this bill for revenue purposes only and, in my judgment, would not keep a barrel of imported oil from this country. It is a step, however, in the right direction, and experts have declared that it will produce revenue of at least $53,000,000 per year for the Treasury of the United States. That is a serious question to be considered just now with a $2,000,000,000 deficit facing Just how the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] can consistently stand on this floor as he did during the debate on the sales-tax provision of this bill and beg and plead for Members of this House to vote for the obnoxious, undemocratic, and unconscionable general sales tax on the very necessities of life, in order, as he said, to balance the Budget, and yet so bitterly oppose a small excise tax that offers to help replenish a depleted Treasury is beyond my understanding. [Applause.]

Another distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, my very good friend [Mr. Connery], who spoke with such feeling against the oil tax, infers at least that he is opposing those of us from oil-producing States because we did not see fit to support his unreasonable demands for a high tariff on shoes in the Hawley-Smoot-Grundy tariff bill. The gentleman is in error when he says that he received no votes for a tariff on shoes from oil-producing States, for, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Hoch] pointed out, every Member who voted for the Hawley-Smoot bill voted to give the gentleman from Massachusetts an increased tariff on shoes, and, I regret to say, several Members from oil-producing States supported that obnoxious and indefensible bill. If in order to get protection for a great industry like the independents of America, who, the gentleman from Massachusetts admitted, had made out a good case before the committee, we must trade and logroll by supporting a tariff on shoes and thereby raise the cost of shoes that the people of my district wear, including the thousands of boys and girls, farmers, and laborers, and others, many of whom are unemployed-I say, if we must trade and logroll in order to get the support of the gentleman from Massachusetts, then I will frankly admit that so far as I am concerned we will just have to get along without it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has heretofore exhibited great interest in the unemployment situation and in keeping standard American wage scale for the laborers in this country. Let me remind him that the American Federation of Labor has strongly indorsed the tax on imported oil. Yet the gentleman is to-day supporting the McCormack amendment that would deal a death blow to more than 100,000 men who have been thrown out of employment because of the importation of cheap foreign oil produced by foreign labor. I appeal to you, not only for the independent operators, royalty owners, and the thousands of farmers in some 22 oil-producing States of America who are directly interested in this legislation, but I appeal for the hundreds of thousands of unemployed, needy American citizens, including men, women, and children who are looking to this Congress for a measure of relief. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the bulk of opposition to an oil tax comes from New England. I am especially surprised, amazed, and frankly disappointed that some of the Republican leaders who have been here for years preaching the doctrine of a high tariff and never failing to seize every opportunity to get a tariff on products affecting the industries of New England should oppose an almost insignificant tax on imported crude because they say it is a tariff. For example, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Nelsonl a few minutes ago delivered a bitter tirade against this proposed tax. He would scare Members of this House into voting for the McCormack amendment to strike the oil-tax provision with his cry of embargo tariff, a charge that the facts do not justify. He is indignant that the oil tax should have been included by the committee in this revenue bill.

If I remember correctly, the same gentleman from Maine was very busy during the time that the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill was pending here in a desperate, and I think successful, effort to get a tariff on lobsters. [Applause.] A year or so ago the distinguished gentleman from Maine was for a tariff as a matter of principle. It is amusing to me that some of our friends from New England are strong for protection for great industries in their own sections and always as a "matter of principle," you understand. If it is a tariff on shoes that is so much desired, then there is a great principle involved, say the statesmen from Massachusetts. If it is a tariff on pulp paper, pig iron, steel, or even lobsters, it would be violating a great principle to oppose it, say all New England. But in a case like this oil-tax proposal, where no one denies that the independent operators have made a strong case, we find to our amazement that such a proposal violates their "fundamental principles," whatever they

The McCormack amendment, admittedly offered not as a matter of justice, but as one of retaliation, should, and I feel will, be overwhelmingly defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the committee that instead of bringing in $5,000,000 worth of revenue, according to the importations for the past three years at 1 cent per gallon, or 42 cents per barrel, this will bring in revenue to a depleted Treasury to the amount of $43,000,000, and that can not be disputed.

This excise tax is in the interest of the independent oil producers, who are struggling for existence. It is in the interest of the coal industry. The farmers are benefited by it. It adds to the revenues, including the school funds, of the several States.

The fight is between the small producers and the four large importers.

The Tariff Commission reports the difference between the cost of production here and in the South American field at $1.03 per barrel.

The press reports to-day a new field discovered in South America, in Brazil, where a producing well was struck of 15,000 barrels.

This tax should be 2 cents per gallon on crude petroleum and 4 cents per gallon on gasoline. This is a meritorious provision and the amendment to strike it out should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to prefer a unanimous-consent request. I find that there are some Members on both sides of the aisle who are indifferent on this question, and who indicate an intention to vote against any tax on foreign oils, and who, but for the withdrawal of my amendment, would vote for the McCormack motion to strike out section 4 of the Crisp amendment, and thus defeat the proposed tax against foreign oils. However, they indicate a willingness, if my amendment is withdrawn, to vote against the McCormack motion to strike out, and thus save the oil provision of the Crisp amendment, which carries 42 cents per barrel against foreign oils imported. While 42 cents per barrel is less than half of what the tax should be against foreign imported oils, in order to get their votes I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment, for we would rather have this 42 cents tax than none at all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNERY. Do I understand that the gentleman from Texas has withdrawn his amendment and that the question is on the McCormack amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as teller Mr. Ragon and Mr. McCormack.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 97, noes 190.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the statement I made to the committee a few moments ago, I move that the committee do now rise. That will not interfere with the gentleman from Ohio in offering his amendment when the committee again resumes its session. If that is agreeable to the gentleman, the Clerk could report the amendment and allow it to be pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that he observes this is quite a long and involved amendment. Under the spirit of the agreement entered into, the Chair trusts the gentleman will withdraw his amendment until to-morrow. The gentleman will not lose any of his rights.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I will withdraw it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Bankhead, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Gillen (at the request of Mr. Thomason), for to-day and to-morrow, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. At my request the House gave consent for all of the Members of the House to extend their remarks on this bill within five days after its enactment. Would that confer authority for gentlemen who have spoken on we can again assume our leadership amongst the nations the oil amendment to extend their remarks?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

CILLEN AMENDMENT

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. Lewis, was absent to-day owing to a funeral in his family. He wished me to say that if he had been here he would have voted for the Cullen amendment, known as the beer amendment, and he asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very questionable practice to refer to a vote in the Committee of the Whole. There is no record vote in the committee, and I do not recall this ever having been done before.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I hope the gentleman will not object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Georgia asked if it was his understanding that Members have been given five legislative days after the disposition of this bill in which to extend their remarks on the bill.

The gentleman asked whether or not that includes the right of every Member to extend his remarks on the amendment considered to-day. Do I understand that all Members have five legislative days to extend their remarks on these amendments and then five legislative days to extend their remarks on the bill generally?

The SPEAKER. The object of the request of the gentleman from Georgia, as the Chair understood it, was that each Member have five legislative days to extend his remarks on the bill or any portion of it, and, in the meantime, have the privilege of extending his remarks while the bill is under consideration.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the majority leader what he expects the program to be next Monday.

Mr. RAINEY. Next Monday we take up the motion to discharge the committee from further consideration of the Glenn-Smith bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will anything else come up that the gentleman knows about at the present time?

Mr. RAINEY. I know of nothing else except Calendar Wednesday business and the tax bill.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in the event the committee is not discharged from the consideration of the drainage bill, it will then be in order to go on with the tax bill?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

AIDING AGRICULTURE

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on emergency legisla-

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, Congress has passed a great deal of emergency relief legislation during the past four months. This legislation has taken the form of large appropriations to assist railroads, banks, agriculture, and the industries of the United States. The Members of both Houses have supported this program on the theory and with the hope that the remedial laws so enacted will restore economic prosperity for all the people. It is hoped that the $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the other credit organizations and appropriations made by Congress will do the business intended by the President to relieve unemployment, restore confidence, and again bring economic stability to the United States.

In my opinion, we will never have permanent prosperity in the United States until such time as we have restored the purchasing power of the 44 per cent of our population which is dependent upon agriculture, and I am honest in my conviction that it will be necessary to pass emergency legislation for our great basic industry of agriculture before of the world.

Chairman Stone, of the Federal Farm Board, recently made a statement to the effect that 44 per cent of the population of the United States is dependent upon agriculture. This represents about 55,000,000 people. If Congress will enact emergency legislation so as to make possible the cost of production, plus a fair profit on the products of the farm, the purchasing power of those dependent upon this industry will be sufficient to start the wheels of industry, relieve unemployment, and restore confidence in our financial and industrial institutions.

The entire business structure of the United States is dependent upon and should be interested in the economic welfare of agriculture. The retail, wholesale, and manufacturing businesses in all agricultural States are absolutely dependent for their success upon agriculture. When the purchasing power of the farmer has been restored, Mr. Farmer, who is a liberal spender-when he has the moneywill go to his retail merchant and purchase both necessities and luxuries. Mr. Retailer will be forced to purchase additional stocks of clothing, shoes, automobiles, tractors, electrical equipment, and other merchandise from the distributors and manufacturers. By virtue of these orders the manufacturers of the United States will be forced to employ labor and again start the wheels of industry to supply the demand originally created by the farmers. I defy any economist to find any flaw with the logic of this argument.

During the past several years the farmers of the United States have not received cost of production. In fact the price received by the producers has been the lowest in the history of the United States. The farmers are unable to pay their taxes, interest on their mortgages, or take care of their general obligations due to low prices.

There are undoubtedly certain Members of the House who will state that industry has not been able to meet its obligations. There is a distinction between industry and agriculture in that our manufacturers are in a position to control their production, while the farmer, due to climatic and other conditions, is in no way able to control the production of his farm. The farmer plants his seed and then the good Lord and nature will provide him either with a small or large crop.

Last year in the Northwestern States the farmers suffered a severe drought; and where the drought did not destroy the entire crop, the grasshoppers were brought in to finish up the job.

The time has come for us to do something real constructive for agriculture as a matter of a national emergency. Ordinarily during normal times I do not believe in a pricefixing proposition. I feel, however, that as a matter of emergency we should pass legislation during the present session of Congress which will insure producers of basic agricultural commodities at least the average cost of production.

It is difficult to determine the average cost of production, since there are so many factors entering into a compilation of this kind, and I therefore believe that Congress should fix a definite, minimum price on basic agricultural commodities.

I have introduced a bill, which is known as H. R. 10793, which fixes a minimum price on certain basic agricultural products. If its provisions are properly administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, it will not take long before prosperity is again restored in this country.

I have established the following minimum prices: Wheat at $1.25 per bushel, cotton at 15 cents per pound, corn at 75 cents per bushel, rye at 70 cents per bushel, barley at 65 cents per bushel, hogs and cattle at 10 cents per pound, and butter at 32 cents per pound.

I could include a large number of agricultural products in the bill and will have no objection to other products being included by the Committee on Agriculture when this legislation is given consideration.

In order that the Members of the House may study this legislation and make additional suggestions, I am having the entire bill included hereafter.

H. R. 10793

A bill to establish and promote the effective merchandising of certain basic agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce by the fixing of a minimum marketing price for such commodities

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared (a) that a national emergency exists in the United States; (b) that the enactment of laws to establish confidence and prosperity during the present economic emergency will be without permanent results unless the basic industry of agriculture is given equal consideration with the total population of the United States depends directly upon agriculture; (d) that as a matter of national emergency it becomes necessary to restore the purchasing power of those dependent on agriculture in order to restore confidence, relieve unemployment, and balance the Federal Budget; (e) that direct ob-structions to and burdens upon interstate and foreign commerce in agricultural commodities result from price fluctuation (below the costs of production) in the marketing of such commodities due to causes beyond the control of producers; (f) that in order properly to protect, foster, and stabilize such commerce it is imperative to remove such obstructions; and (g) that it is the policy of the United States—

(1) To prevent price fluctuations in such agricultural commodities below the minimum price established in this act in order to insure cost of production to the producers thereof; and

(2) To accomplish such objects through executing the provisions of this act in such manner as to bring about a substantial and permanent improvement in agriculture and promote the best interests of the country as a whole.

Sec. 2. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to enforce the provisions of this act and to formulate such rules and regula-tions as may be necessary for its effective administration.

Sec. 3. A minimum price is hereby established on the following basic agricultural commodities: Wheat at $1.25 per bushel; cotton at 15 cents per pound; corn at 75 cents per bushel; rye at 70 cents per bushel; barley at 65 cents per bushel; hogs and cattle at 10 cents per pound; butter at 32 cents per pound. Such minimum prices shall be the base minimum price at terminal markets designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, in the United States.

nated by the Secretary of Agriculture, in the United States.

SEC. 4. If the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that, due to the establishment of such minimum price schedule or to the fluctuation in foreign exchange, any material increase is had in the importation of the commodities set forth in section 3 of this act, and/or in the processed articles or by-products thereof, and/or in dairy products of every character, he shall immediately report such facts to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith issue a proclamation increasing the tariff duty upon such commodities up to 100 per cent of the rate now fixed by law, in order to prevent dumping of foreign produced agricultural commodities, and to preserve the market in the United States for the producers therein. producers therein.

SEC. 5. This act shall become effective within 30 days from its

I call your particular attention to section 4 of the bill which gives the President authority to increase the tariff on agricultural products up to 100 per cent of the present tariff rate to prevent dumping of agricultural commodities produced outside of the United States and to adjust our agricultural price status due to fluctuations in foreign exchange.

There will be Members of this House, and undoubtedly certain people throughout the United States, who will condemn this proposal as being radical and unsound. But these same parties did not say that it was a radical measure when Congress passed legislation for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. They stated that it was in the nature of an emergency measure to restore confidence in this country. My bill is an emergency measure to restore confidence for the greatest industry in this country and to restore the purchasing power of the largest group in our population, and in that way benefit the entire Nation. It is sound and workable. Agriculture is our main industry, and the farmers of the United States and their dependents are entitled to every consideration and protection that can be given to them by Congress during an economic crisis which affects the whole country.

In many of the foreign countries the wheat farmers are receiving from $1.25 to $1.50 per bushel for their wheat during the present time, due to embargoes and high tariffs and also due to the fact that the farmers in those countries do not produce enough wheat to supply the needs of their own people. We produce a surplus, and I feel that it is desirable that we should have a surplus in this country. If we produce only enough for domestic consumption, undoubtedly the price on agricultural products would be twice as high as they are to-day. Should the farmers be penalized for producing a surplus, and should the small surplus so produced prevent the American farmer from receiving an American price for that part of his product which is consumed in this country? I say no. He should have an American price for the products consumed in the United States. My bill will fix a minimum price and will prevent speculation below that price. If the people desire to speculate, then they will be compelled to speculate above the minimum price fixed in the bill.

Considerable thought has been given to the question of the stabilization of money. Congressman Burtness, of North Dakota, and Congressman RAMSEYER, of Iowa, have introduced bills to fix the value of money so that the price of money will fluctuate with the index price of the basic agricultural and industrial products produced in this country. Hearings are being held before the Banking and Currency Committee for the purpose of enacting this legislation. I am satisfied that if stabilization of money was brought about, it would solve our problem to a large extent. It is doubtful, however, if such legislation will be enacted into law, although there is great need for it.

Since it will not be possible to secure the passage of legislation which will stabilize money to meet commodity values, it appears to me that it is most urgent to give serious consideration to emergency legislation such as I have introduced.

I am interested in balancing the Budget. I am interested in the restoration of confidence and prosperity in this country. I feel that if by the passage of this legislation we restore the purchasing power of nearly 55,000,000 people in the United States, we will solve our economic problem, restore prosperity to the entire United States, relieve unemployment, and again start the wheels of industry. The Budget will be balanced, and then we can progress cautiously in the future in enacting permanent remedies so as to prevent future panics and depressions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS-REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cullen] has offered the following so-called beer amendment:

"That there shall be levied and collected on all nonintoxicating beer, lager beer, ale, porter, or other similar nonintoxicating fermented liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent and not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight brewed or manufactured and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the united States, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a tax at the rate of 3 cents per pint, such article to be bottled at the brewery: Provided, That no such article shall contain more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight: And provided further, That the manufacture and transportation of such articles shall be conducted under permits to be issued in accordance with the national workhitting act and under such regulations, including assessment prohibition act and under such regulations, including assessment and collection of the tax, as shall be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General of the United States: And provided further, That no such article shall be permitted to be transported into any State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, the laws of which forbid the manufacture or sale thereof."

This bill, which would be a painless form of taxation, would undoubtedly raise $400,000,000.

Yesterday the House voted out the manufacturers' sales tax. That left a tremendous gap which the beer tax would fill nicely. Failure to pass this Cullen amendment places the odium upon the drys of having failed to balance the Budget. They will, of course, attempt to shirk their responsibility, but we nail it at their door.

According to the Anti-Saloon Yearbook of 1920 there were 1,092 breweries flourishing during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, producing $15,237,121 worth of tax, at the war-time tax of $6 per barrel. The Cullen amendment provides for a tax of 3 cents per pint, $7.50 per barrel. Thus, this tax would be $1.50 higher than the beer war tax. Furthermore, there has been a considerable growth of population since 1918, and, undoubtedly, more beer would be consumed—more tax would be raised. The estimate stating that $400,000,000 could be raised from this source is most conservative for it would probably come nearer the $500,000,000 mark.

However, there is something more than the mere economics in voting for this tax on beer, for there is something intangible about it in this sense: The bringing back of beer might clarify the muddy waters of the depression; it might revitalize the Nation by chasing away the depression blues; it might rekindle a spirit of cheerfulness; it might be like the starting whistle of the game. Life, after all, is not so much logical as it is psychological. Beer might be the psychological signal for bringing back good times; it might be just the thing needed to "whirl things around." Those are the words of a very distinguished citizen, the president of one of America's largest banks, Mr. Harvey D. Gibson, and with him I quite agree.

In 1900 there was ushered in a new industry, the automotive industry; it kept the wheels of industry moving rapidly for 20 years. In 1920 we had a new invention called the radio, which, with aviation, helped give us 10 more years of prosperity. To-day a new industry is again needed. Let it be a revival of an old one—the brewing industry. It would set running at a feverish pace the dynamos of industry.

The average yearly consumption of coal by breweries was 3,000,200 tons; the breweries used 69,000 cords of wood, 570,000 barrels of gasoline and oil, and 3,000,000,000 cubic feet of gas for heat and fuel, each year. Think of the spur this would be to allied trading and industries! The breweries used 180,000 freight cars per annum, and it has been estimated that the total carloading from brewing was 500,000 cars per annum. Think what this would mean to the railroads, now unable to pay their dividends, with one-half million railroad employees idle! Brewing would certainly put the railroads on their feet. What a boon it would be to banks and financial institutions which hold the depreciated railroad bonds. Those railroad bonds would reach par beyond peradventure of a doubt if we would restore brewing.

In one year, at the peak of the brewing industry, 80,000,000 bushels of barley were consumed, besides the hops, rice, and malt also used in the industry. In growing this barley there was involved yearly 12,000,000 acres of land and $224,-000,000. In this industry there were employed 100,000 men, including clerks, drivers, and salesmen. All this is but one part of the picture. Some 60 other allied industries profited therefrom, directly or indirectly. Veritably an army of carpenters, painters, mechanics, electricians, plumbers, and laborers were constantly employed in the upkeep of the breweries and their equipment alone. There were the employees used in the growing of the hops, rice, barley, and corn; the farm hands used in producing these articles; men distributing to the wholesaler and disposing for the retailer the finished product. There were glass blowers to make the bottles, laborers at the cooperages and at the refrigerating plants, printers to make the labels for the bottles, and stationery men to supply the paper for these labels.

Taking it all in all, on the basis of four persons to a family, this industry meant the feeding, housing, and clothing of a vast army of employees, at least 2,000,000 individuals.

A list of the articles made for and used by the breweries, to mention but a few, are sirup, pitch, varnish, enamel, rubber, brass, electrical apparatus, faucets, bungs, corks, caps, brooms, brushes, driers, salts, coolers, pumps, tanks, compressers, and washing machines.

The injury to the farmers has been incalculable. I therefore appeal to those representing the so-called dry-farmer vote: The handle is held out to you to help the farmer; grab this handle.

In arguing the point of order the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Hoch] stated that the amendment is out of order because it sought to tax that which is illegal. Let me remind the gentleman that we have often taxed that which is illegal. In my home State of New York we tax gambling devices used for illegal purposes. In fact the Bureau of Internal Revenue levies an income tax on the ill-gotten gains of the bootlegger, whose traffic is illegal and whose business is banned.

I say to the drys, if this amendment does not legalize beer, that they could vote for it, since it might be considered as an enforcement measure, as it places extra burdens on that which they deem illegal—brewing. I do not know whether or not this amendment would bring back beer. I would hesitate to say that it would not, for only the Supreme Court of the United States could decide this. I have high hopes, however, that the courts will decide that this amendment will bring beer back; it ought to bring it back. I say to the drys that a great storm is brewing in this country. The drys who vote for this amendment will gain shelter thereunder.

The latest figures from the Literary Digest poll show that Kansas is the only State that is dry, and even there the poll indicates a very slender dry majority. Even the Southern States, celebrated for their dryness—Alabama, Kansas, Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia—all indicate the changing sentiment. Georgia seems to be 2 to 1 in favor of a change. The Literary Digest poll has sounded a tocsin note of warning to both parties; no party can win in the next presidential election unless it is wet.

Prohibition has been a cure far worse than the disease which it sought to wipe out. It banished the saloon but brought in place something far worse—the speak-easy and the blind tiger. It has made for more drinking and more drinkers. Genuine temperance was being achieved, but prohibition came across the path of temperance and prevented its further progress. The 12 years of prohibition have destroyed and prevented the fruitage of 100 years of planning for temperance.

The eighteenth amendment is called an "experiment noble in purpose." What right has an experiment in the Constitution? The Constitution is supposed to be the basis of fixed and well-nigh immutable principles. How dangerous it has been to lodge an experiment in the Constitution we now well know. We were told that prohibition would empty our jails. It has indeed filled them to overflowing. We have been compelled to build two new huge Federal prisons because of the many prohibition violators. Prohibition has increased crime in general. Racketeers, hijackers, kidnapers, bootleggers abound everywhere.

What good is a law that makes it possible for officials to use school children as stool pigeons, college coeds as spies, and prostitutes as decoys? What merit is there in a statute that destroys your right of castle, invades the privacy of your home, destroys the sanctity of your private dwelling by what Judge Holmes called "the dirty business of wire-tapping?"

We tax the profits of criminal bootleggers. Does not the Government thereby put the imprimatur of its approval on a nefarious traffic?

The American Federation of Labor, the American Legion, the American Bar Association, and the American Medical Association are but a few of the larger organizations now on record against the eighteenth amendment.

Every nation that has tried prohibition has spewed it out—Finland, Canada, Russia, New Zealand, and even Turkey. Prohibition has failed dismally because you can not dragoon a nation against its will; you can not reform a nation with a shotgun; you can not force temperance down the Nation's throat; you can not legislate goodness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 26, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

Troxell, of Troxell, Kikendall & Co., insurance, Lincoln Theater Building, Springfield, Ill., opposing House bill 4526, providing for an increase of the jurisdictional amount of $3,000, the present minimum of jurisdiction of the United States district courts, to a minimum of $7,500; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4991. Also, petition of Alvin S. Keys, 402 Ridgely-Farmers Building, Springfield, Ill., opposing House bill 4526, providing for an increase of the jurisdictional amount of $3,000, the present minimum of jurisdiction of the United States district courts, to a minimum of $7,500; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4992. Also, petition of Logan Hay, of Brown, Hay & Stephens, 714 First National Bank Building, Springfield, Ill., opposing House bill 4526, providing for an increase of the jurisdictional amount of $3,000, the present minimum of jurisdiction of the United States district courts, to a minimum of $7,500; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4993. Also, petition of William L. Patton, lawyer, 600 Security Building, Springfield, Ill., opposing House bill 4526, providing for an increase of the jurisdictional amount of $3,000, the present minimum of jurisdiction of the United States district courts, to a minimum of $7,500; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for Tou art with me: Thy rod and Thy Staff, they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: Thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, for a long time the House has been working under an unusual strain. I have talked to some of the older Members, and they all agree with me that the work the Members are performing now is unprecedented. In addition to that, we have quite a large sick list. It seems to me that we ought to do something to ease up on the strain under which Members are working. I have received a letter from Doctor Calver, the House physician, which I ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read. There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Attending Physician, Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C., March 24, 1932.

Hon. Henry T. Rainey,

Majority Floor Leader, House of Representatives.

Dear Mr. Rainey: I am writing you to invite your attention to the physical condition of many of the Members. We have had an epidemic of mild grippe, which has depleted the resistance of a considerable number. The average Member's mail and visitors have more than doubled. The sessions of committees are longer and of much higher tension than formerly. The sessions of the House have been most exacting.

These unusual conditions have created a situation unparalleled in the experience of the older membership of the House and of greater complexity than those of war time.

The nervous strain is tremendous. There are a few Members who have been able to permit the escape of their pent-up tension, but an infinitely greater number are mulling over their worries, with the inevitable increase of nervous strain. This is a considerable group, and the purpose of this letter is to avoid catastrophes among them.

May I suggest some step be taken to relieve this condition, if possible? At least the Members could be relieved from committee and House meetings for one day in the week in order to catch up with their own office work during normal working hours on that day. I believe the opportunity to relax over Saturday and Sunday would be materially helpful in our present situation.

Respectfully yours, (Signed) George W. Calver.

Mr. RAINEY. I have consulted with the Speaker and the minority leader, and I am going to propound this unanimousconsent request. Of course, we have a great deal of work to do yet and we are anxious to get along with it just as fast as possible. We are all anxious to do it without endangering the health and perhaps the life of Members. I ask unanimous consent that hereafter, commencing Monday. March 28, the House meet each morning at 11 o'clock until and including April 18. If that permission is granted, hereafter every Friday during this period of time I shall ask unanimous consent on that day that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet the following Monday. This will give us three Saturdays without sessions. Then we can determine on April 18 as to whether we will resume the old schedule and meet at 12 o'clock, continuing with sessions on Saturday.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I fully appreciate the statement the gentleman has made. I know from my own experience there has never been such a strenuous session as we have had this winter. I am entirely in sympathy with his suggestion about adjourning over Saturday for the next two or three weeks, but I am wondering if the gentleman believes it is absolutely necessary that during that time we meet at 11 o'clock in the morning. When we meet at 11 o'clock and carry through to 5 or 6 o'clock it makes a very long and trying session. Would we not accomplish just as much to meet at 12 o'clock as at 11 o'clock? Also, that would not interfere with the meeting of committees. I do not offer that in the nature of an amendment to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. RAINEY. I wish I could agree to that; and if we find the conditions are such that we can do it when we reach April 18, I shall be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to meet at 12 o'clock after that time and adjourn every Saturday. That will depend upon the condition of the work.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Would the gentleman entertain an observation that under his plan of procedure it be modified to the extent that we adjourn at 4 o'clock or 4.30 o'clock every afternoon. If men stay here five hours or five hours and a half every day attending to business, it is about all the strain they should labor under. Then the Members would have a chance to go back to their offices and sign their mail and get ready for the next day.

Mr. RAINEY. It might be possible to accomplish that. It will depend upon the condition of work here on the floor. If it is possible to adjourn at half past 4 each day, I would be very glad to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have reached on Calendar Wednesday the minor committees, where the day is occupied largely in the consideration of bills that could properly be considered on the Consent Calendar. On the first and third Mondays we generally get through the complete calendar when we meet at 12 o'clock. I am one of those who do not believe it is advisable to meet at 11 o'clock, though I do not intend to interpose an objection. I think the strain that comes to the membership of the House is in the last hour or two. when we have long sessions. I think it is a mistake to meet at 11 o'clock. I would much rather have the gentleman postpone his request and consider whether or not on consent days or on Calendar Wednesdays we should not then dispose of the business in order on those days hurriedly and take up our other business, than to meet at 11 o'clock and stay here until 5 or half past 5. That will be a worse strain on the nervous system than to do as we do now, meet at 12 o'clock and follow the usual course as to legislation. I am not going to interpose an objection, but I think the plan proposed by the gentleman from Illinois would be more racking upon the nervous system of Members who stay here and do their faithful duty than under the existing situation, even with sessions continuing on Saturdays.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has impressed me very much with his suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. Let the Chair see whether or not he can propound the unanimous-consent request as made.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Let us all appreciate that the real effect of meeting at 11 o'clock will be: First, to give a longer time for the sessions of the House; second, to shorten the time in which the committees must consider important legislation | Monday the House meet at 11 o'clock each day thereafter now pending before the committees.

By the rules of the House, we meet every day at 12 o'clock, and when there is something immediately ahead of us that is urgent we never have any trouble in getting the permission of the House to meet at 11 o'clock for that day. To lay down a program changing the order for a month ahead, when the real result will be to stop committees from considering legislation, I think is not desirable.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, speaking from the standpoint of one of the robust Members of the House, and yet having an interest always in the welfare of my older and less robust fellows. I do hope that the gentleman will not include in his request that we meet at 11 o'clock, simply because I know, in harmony with the statement of the gentleman from Michigan, that it will absolutely disrupt the work of the committees so that they could not present legislation to the House.

With that one objection, I am ready to agree to the unanimous-consent request. An extra hour of stress and strain every day will be distressing to the average Member, but as for me, well, I seem to be tough enough to stand most anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield. Mr. RANKIN. One of the main objections to this proposition has not yet been stated. My opinion is that this will make the situation worse than the present condition. I do not know whether Doctor Calver has considered both phases of the proposition.

There is not a Member in this House whose mail is not heavier than it has been at any time since the war closed. I do not know how it is with the rest of the Members, but my heaviest office mail comes in at 10 o'clock. I never catch up, although I have four stenographers working in my office; I am far behind with my mail now. I am sure that almost every other Member is in about the same condition. I believe that to meet at 11 o'clock will not only disrupt the committees but it will disrupt our office work and render it impossible for the majority of us to catch up. I hope the gentleman will not propound that request. I think if you are going to make a request you should cross the bridges as we come to them and not ask to fix this policy a month ahead.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PARSONS. How does this idea strike the gentleman; Meet at 12 o'clock and then run until 5.30 or 6 o'clock, and we will get just as much time as we would to come in at 11 o'clock and adjourn early.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not merely a question of attending to our increased correspondence, but our colleagues know that the most strenuous work now upon our shoulders is the extra work in the office, investigating thousands of bills and bureaus and to attend to departmental matters, with the many bureaus scattered all over Washington, with respect to legislation and appropriations and the business of our constituents. That is always grinding work. hope the majority leader will give us the morning to do the work.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the objections and, of course, have been impressed by them. The committees can get permission to sit during sessions, and then if we adjourn at a reasonable time in the afternoon we can attend to the correspondence after we adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr.] Tax under this paragraph shall be paid by stamp affixed to RAINEY] asks unanimous consent that beginning on next every package or box.

until and including April 18. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the argument which the gentleman has advanced with reference to getting permission for the committees to sit during the sessions of the House will not cure the situation. because the Members of this House, as everybody realizes. would not be sitting in committees when important controversial legislation, in which they are interested, was being considered in the House. I agree with what has been stated that the strain will be increased.

Some of us receive in the neighborhood of 200 letters a day in our offices. We have departmental work. We have committee work to study, and we have legislation to study, and some of the Members have been forced to work until almost midnight every night to keep abreast of it.

I believe, in view of all that has been said, that it will increase the strain, and, Mr. Speaker, I shall object.

THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill for 1932, with Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter pending before the committee at this time is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The Chair had agreed last night to recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Setberling] to offer an amendment.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Semberling offers the following amendment: On page 229, after line 8, insert the following paragraph:

(5) Matches:

Boxes or packages, with natural color sticks, holding under 60 matches, 1/8 cent per box.

Book matches, with 20 matches or under, of colored sticks, one-fifteenth cent per book.

Book matches, with over 20 matches, of colored sticks, at the rate of one-fifteenth cent per each 20.

In the case of matches imported to the United States, the adhesive or other stamp shall be affixed to each package or box while it is in the customs' custody.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall provide by regulations for the payment of the tax upon matches manufactured in the United States by means of a stamp printed or stamped on the box in lieu of an adhesive or other stamp attached thereto.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, the match industry has factories in 13 States in the United States. I want to read a list of the States so that the Members will know whether they represent a State that has a match factory: New York, Massachusetts, Maine, California, Washington, Ohio, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Alabama, Missouri, New Jersey, and Wisconsin.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. There is a match factory now at Natchez, Miss.

Mr. SEIBERLING. And Mississippi also.

Now, when we passed the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill we put a duty of 20 cents a gross on matches. It was thought at that time that would be sufficient to protect the American match manufacturers, but we found upon investigation it was not sufficient. An expert in the Tariff Commission stated to me we should have had 30 cents a gross on matches instead of 20 cents.

A provision of the Hawley-Smoot bill was that fancy matches could be admitted into the United States at 40 per cent ad valorem. So immediately after this bill was passed the Russians colored their stems red and had those matches classified as fancy matches, and they brought them in here at 40 per cent ad valorem. They established a cost in Russia of 30 cents a gross, and 40 per cent ad valorem made a tariff of 12 cents a gross, when the act provided for 20 cents a gross. So the Russians imported over 800,000 gross matches last year, over 132,000 gross last month, and are increasing the importation of those matches continually at 12 per cent duty per gross, when other nations have to pay 20 cents per gross.

The match manufacturers went to the Treasury, and the Treasury invoked the provisions of the antidumping clause of the Hawley-Smoot bill against five nations, including Russia, but the Amtorg Trading Co., representing Russia, brought a suit before the Customs Court in New York for the purpose of defeating the order made by the Treasury Department. On the 19th of March the Customs Court held against the United States Government and the Treasury Department for the reason that they could not determine what the cost of manufacturing matches in Russia was. We have no diplomatic relations with Russia, and therefore it was not possible to ascertain the cost of manufacturing matches in Russia. We do know, however, that they give their workers black bread and coffee and a place to live that American laboring men would not live in, but we do not know what it costs beyond that.

The amendment I have offered in the interest of the match industry of this country provides that a stamp tax shall be put on every box of matches; that an adhesive stamp must be attached by the importers, but the domestic manufacturers will have the right to print the excise stamp upon a label on the boxes of matches. This will result in greatly reducing the importation of foreign matches.

The consumption of matches per day in the United States is 17,500,000 boxes of 50 matches each. Multiplying this by 365 days, we have 6,387,500,000 boxes of 50 matches each. Under the sales tax that we had in our bill, that would have produced $698,000. Under the tax provided in this amendment, it will produce $7,984,375.

The purpose to-day is to assist in balancing the Budget, which is of vital importance, the most vitally important of anything that is before the Congress to-day.

We propose that this industry shall contribute its part toward balancing the Budget and receive for it the protection which was intended when we passed the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, which the importers have been trying to evade.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Are not these match companies in America owned and controlled by the Kreuger Co., of Sweden?

Mr. SEIBERLING. The Federal Match Co. is. While we were considering the Hawley-Smoot bill the Swedish Match Co. came over here and bought the Federal Co. so that their officials could testify before the committee against the tariff raised against imports.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is not that the largest match company in this country?

Mr. SEIBERLING. No; it is not. The Diamond Match Co., the Ohio Match Co., and the Palmer Match Co. are very large companies, and they are in my district.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. This is paramount to an embargo on matches.

Mr. SEIBERLING. It is substantially an embargo on Russian matches.

Mr. RANKIN. Is it not an embargo on all matches produced in foreign countries?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I do not think so.

Mr. RANKIN. Why would it be any more of an embargo on matches coming from Russia than an embargo on Swedish matches or matches coming from any other foreign country?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I do not think it will be an absolute embargo on Russian matches, not an absolute embargo. I do not know how cheaply they can make matches in Russia.

Mr. RANKIN. Here is what I want to find out: You are providing an extra penalty on the importation of these matches. In other words, you do not permit them to pay in the orderly and usual way that imports are paid.

Mr. SEIBERLING. That is correct.

Mr. RANKIN. They must go to the extra trouble and expense of attaching labels or stamps at the customhouse on each individual box?

Mr. SEIBERLING. That is correct.

Mr. RANKIN. Would not the expense and trouble connected with that be paramount to an embargo on matches coming into this country?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I do not think it will, because nobody knows what these Russian matches cost.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman know how much it costs to produce them in the United States?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes. About 56 cents a gross.

Mr. WYANT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. Is there a tariff on imported matches now?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes; 20 cents a gross.

Mr. WYANT. Would not the proper procedure be to make application to the Tariff Commission and have the tariff increased, after a careful study of the question?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we have attempted to do that. But that is a long procedure. What we are proposing to do here is exactly what Canada has done. Canada prints the excise tax on the label, and we can not ship any matches into Canada unless each box has an adhesive stamp on it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Now, this will not increase the cost of matches to the consumer one iota. They are giving matches away in every cigar store, and in almost every other place in America. I guarantee this will not increase the price one iota. Now, you may ask me how they can pay this tax without increasing the cost of matches to the consumer. The reason they can do this is because the increased volume of business will enable the industry to reduce its cost, so that this tax can be absorbed and will not have to be passed on.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes. Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As a matter of fact, is not the production of matches in the United States highly competitive regardless of the importation of matches from Sweden and Russia?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes; it is highly competitive.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SEIBERLING. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is well aware that we have been considering changes in the revenue bill to produce the necessary revenue to balance the Budget, and the gentleman is also aware that the subject of a tax or a tariff on matches has been before the committee at previous times and has been given consideration. If the gentleman will permit, let me suggest to him at this time that an effort to actually add an amendment to the bill is somewhat premature, and I hope the gentleman will not press his amendment at the present time.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I am going to press this amendment and I am going to find out whether this House is for Russia or for America. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. No; I decline to yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Well, that is not a fair statement and I resent it. I am not for your embargo and the Members of this House are not going to be for it when they understand it, and the gentleman is going beyond the amenities of the House when he accuses us of being for Russia-

Mr. SEIBERLING. I do not accuse the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN (continuing). Because we are not for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I do not accuse the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman asks if we are going to be for this amendment or for Russia. The gentleman can not get away with that kind of stuff here to-day.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I decline to be interrupted any more. Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield once more, because I think I am in position to help the gentleman? I want to call the gentleman's attention to the language of this amendment:

Tax under this paragraph shall be paid by stamp affixed to every package or box.

Let me ask the gentleman if it is not the definite intention on the part of certain people in this country to make it so very inconvenient to the importers of matches, by being obliged to place this stamp on every box as the gentleman's amendment provides, that that is really the way they are going to accomplish their purpose? It is a subterfuge pure and simple.

Mr. SEIBERLING. The purpose of this amendment is to get labor for American laborers in American factories instead of providing labor for Russians in Russian factories, and the amendment has no other purpose.

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall not take the gentleman's time further, but I shall take time myself later on.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Gentlemen, the situation is simply this. Are we going to let Russia furnish our matches or are we going to have them made in American factories with American labor? Are we going to pay the money to the American printer, to the American chemist, to the American box manufacturer, the freight on our railroads, to the lumber people up in the State of Washington, or are we going to pay this money to Russians, which would have to be paid in gold and would be taken out of this country? I appeal to you.

You passed the oil amendment yesterday and you gave the oil people a tax upon imported oil. I am coming to you this morning for the match industry and saying we will pay a domestic tax, as well as have a tax on imported matches, and I think we have gone a step farther in this matter in the fact that this industry is offering to tax its own products in order to help out the Budget, in order that the securities of this country may become reestablished and we may have prosperity in this country, which we will not have if we permit the ruin of our own industries. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I think you will all agree that I have shown no partisanship in the consideration of this revenue bill. I have tried to serve my country in a nonpartisan way to raise revenue to balance the Budget which the President of the United States, which the Secretary of the Treasury, and which ex-President Coolidge say is essential for economic recovery and to make your temporary relief measures effective.

Now, gentlemen, are you going to convert this bill into a tariff bill? I grant you there is one item in the bill which is tariff-oil. I did not want it in there [applause], but it is in there and therefore I can not consistently get up here and make points of order against these tariff amendments because I believe they are germane to the bill. But, gentlemen, are you going to write a tariff bill here on this floor under the guise that it is revenue?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. No; excuse me. I did not interrupt the gentleman and the gentleman had 15 minutes.

Here is the difference between this amendment and the oil amendment. The oil amendment was 1 cent, which will not be an embargo. Some oil will come in. This is an embargo and is intended as nothing else but an embargo.

The people representing this match industry came to me and stated that it was an embargo. They said they were willing to pay eight or ten million dollars for the purpose of having a monopoly of the American market for matches. Of course, they will raise the price to consumers. They said the way to have it effective would be to have an embargo. The matches have to be opened when they come into the customhouse, each package of matches stamped. They said they did not want it unless it was an embargo. They have it in Canada, and it is an embargo there.

Now, you Democrats all over the country who have been criticizing the present tariff law, are you going to come in here now and write an embargo tariff against the products of Russia, which the Republicans, when they wrote the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, would not do? What position are you going to leave yourselves in, what position will the Republicans leave themselves in who are opposed to an embargo?

We may just as well face the issue. I am going to appeal to this House to try and help expedite the passage of this bill. We have brought it in here with no rule, for a liberal consideration, and that system is on trial. The minority leader said—or it was so stated in the papers—that we made a mistake in bringing the bill before you for you to consider it in this way, instead of bringing it in under a cloture

Now, do you like this way of considering a bill? If so, show your appreciation by trying to expedite it. Never has there been a bill of this character considered in Congress where there has been so much debate, and this debate is not going to change any votes. Anyone can present his views on an amendment in five minutes. I give notice now that I am going to invoke the rule that there shall be but five minutes' speech for and against an amendment, and I myself will not again ask to be allowed more than five minutes. I took it at this time in order to make a general statement on the bill, and to ask you to cooperate in men on the Democratic side of the Chamber. The reexpediting the passage of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Along that line, will it not be fair to allow the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon] 10 minutes, and give me 5 minutes on these Russianmade goods?

Mr. CRISP. I will object to the gentleman from Arkansas having more than five minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman think that one can cover this section in regard to malt and wort in five minutes, in view of the fact that the printed record does not contain any evidence in relation to it, and the report does not contain evidence in relation to it?

Mr. CRISP. My answer to that is that my friend is able and industrious, and he has acquired all the information on the subject, and he can give it to the House in five minutes. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will consent to withdraw his amendment. I think every Member here, on both sides of the controversy in regard to the sales tax, feels that it would be dangerous to write a revenue bill here on the floor of the House.

Yesterday the Ways and Means Committee appointed a subcommittee of five men to propose a new revenue measure. We have been at work continually since; we worked yesterday and last night until 11 o'clock and again we have been in session this morning. We expect to be in session tonight, and, if necessary, to-morrow. In our work we have necessarily got to take in a broad field of taxation.

Let me take the illustration furnished by the gentleman from Ohio on matches. There you have no accurate statement of the conditions or the facts pertaining to this industry. Our experts and the Treasury experts have been at work on it under directions from the subcommittee and we ought to have accurate information about matches before giving a rate on them. This shows you how dangerous it is to legislate here on the floor. There has been no testimony in regard to this item before the committee. I am going to ask the members of the Committee of the Whole to please withhold action and let us bring in some amendments that will increase the revenue and bring about what I think the vast majority of this House wants.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. RAGON. Please do not interrupt me. I have only five minutes. If we break in by bringing in amendments at this time we are going to absolutely wreck the work of the subcommittee and of the Committee on Ways and Means when we get to it. Nothing is going to be brought in here by the subcommittee or the full committee that has not been thoroughly and completely considered by the committee.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAGON. You have the Crisp amendment before you now, and it has in it four things. Let us go on and adopt those things that bring in $100,000,000 of revenue, and that will give us a good working basis to start on, and when we get these things in, then any man can bring in any amendment that he has for consideration. But do not let us chop in now and mar and wreck our work upon which we have started. Some of these proposed amendments I shall support, but do not bring them here at this particular time, when we can not tell anything about what effect they will have on a bill that we all feel is demanded and expected by both sides of this House. Listen to me, you gentlemen on the Republican side, and especially the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Seiberling], who is a successful, commonsense business man. This deficit is your deficit, and I do not say that in any reproachful spirit. It is a deficit of your administration. Let me say something now to the a tax bill?

men on the Democratic side of the Chamber. The rehabilitation of financial conditions of this country is your problem, because we are in the majority, and I do not say that in a reproachful spirit. I am trying to bring both sides to a common-sense realization of the condition confronting us, and I say that irrespective of whether you want to balance the Budget or not.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman think it comes with poor grace, after having put in this tariff on oil, to talk to us about not putting anything else in?

Mr. RAGON. I know the gentleman has that in his craw, but that tax on oil was considered more than anything in the revenue bill, and the oil tax is incorporated in the Crisp amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, we have heard the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON]. If the House will be patient for a short time, the situation will clear. Several gentlemen propose to offer amendments, 8 or 10 in all, to provide for a tax on several imports in order to protect goods manufactured or mined or grown in the United States which for two years or so have been hurt by competition from a country where labor is forced to work by a new style of government. That labor receives little money as pay and that money has very small value. The Treasury Department says that it has been unable to make the present antidumping laws that we have quite reach the situation, and the Secretary has said that he thinks we need laws so worded that the Treasury officials may act as they would like to act. Now, I believe that the whole situation as to imports of Russia can be cured by the adoption of an amendment which would amount to a nearly complete embargo against all goods made or mined by forced labor.

I have such an amendment, carefully drawn and undoubtedly germane. It is a blanket amendment and names no particular commodity but catches them all. However, I am in this situation: The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Sei-BERLING] was recognized last night just as the committee was about to rise. Of course, he has the right of way, and will undoubtedly be recognized first. His amendment pertains to matches, and affects both imported and domestic matches-import tax and excise tax. It is a real revenue raiser, and it catches the Russian-made match, too. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brumm] will offer an amendment in regard to coal. The situation of that commodity in the United States is desperate, as you all know. The gentleman from Oregon, on the Democratic side [Mr. MARTIN], will offer an amendment affecting lumber but exempting imports from contiguous territory. An amendment will be ordered to restrict imports of manganese, and there will be amendments covering several other separate

As a matter of fact, the blanket amendment I shall offer relieves the necessity of offering most of these. But I have no desire to foreclose any of the proponents. But after their amendments have been offered, I propose to offer an amendment in an effort to perfect the whole text to the effect that a tax at the place of import of 100 per cent shall be placed on all goods produced, mined, or manufactured in whole or in part by labor subject to penal sanction or disabilities for refusal to work at the behest of any foreign monopoly or any state trust. That is the way that we can reach the Russian situation.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. What is the reason we can not have an emergency tariff such as we have had heretofore, in order to protect ourselves, without interfering with a tax bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Because here is the time. Otherwise the various bills we have offered are not likely to be considered until a tax bill has been reconsidered. It is not a question of whether we are for or against Russia, but in the last Congress when the Ways and Means Committee was bringing out the revenue bill we had everybody clamoring at the last moment for an embargo on goods made by forced labor.

The proponents of 20 different bills and their witnesses fell over themselves in the jam at the door of the Ways and Means Committee. The committee was then forced to decide that it could not add an embargo paragraph to its tariff bill. So we lost at that time.

Now, I am afraid the same thing will happen here this afternoon. The particular items will swamp the all-embracing anti-Russian proposal. Why do I propose 100 per cent tax-American valuation? Simply because the Russian ruble is supposed to be worth 50 cents. In reality it is worth only 1.2 cents. Labor there has to work under Government order or starve. I have their constitution here, with the labor paragraph, and I have extracts from Soviet Russia's criminal code as to how the government punishes those who do not work or produce under government orders. It will pay every gentleman here to get and keep the RECORD of March 15, so as to have the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], 30 or 40 pages, which it is said cost $2,000 to print. There you will find 92 exhibits to back up the resolution which I shall offer. That speech by Senator Oddie shows in detail the form of mining, logging, and manufacture there, with controlled labor. What country in the world is strong enough to stand up and meet the situation boldly and stop that sort of disastrous competition except the United States of America? Here is where we should try it out. Now is the time for the anticonscript legislation. I hope that you will be patient, remain on the floor, and help us with these minor amendments, with the understanding that I shall give notice later that I shall offer the perfecting amendment caring entirely for this situation which I have suggested.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address a few words to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Seiberling]. I wish to preface my remarks by the statement that, as far as competition with Russian rates of pay or labor methods is concerned, the gentleman has our entire sympathy and support. There is no question but that every American citizen feels as the gentleman does about that feature of the case, but that is not the direct point at issue at the present time.

The gentleman has offered an amendment to attach a stamp to every box of matches, whether made in this country or abroad, and when made abroad, those boxes must be taken out of the original package in which they arrive at the customhouse and a stamp affixed to each package or box while in the customs custody. Now, what does that mean? It means that the people who are interested in bringing forward this amendment are asking you to place an impossible condition upon any competition whatsoever.

These matches come in big cartons, and to break down and open every one of those cartons or boxes, as the case may be, and have the customs official place a stamp on each individual box would make impossible any competition and set up an embargo.

Now, to come to the direct point of voting down this amendment: The chairman of our subcommittee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon] frankly told you that the subcommittee has this very proposition before it, and we have asked the experts of the departments for full information regarding the match competition.

This is not a question of a tariff against the labor of Russia. It is an effort on the part of match-manufacturing concerns in this country to absolutely place an embargo against any form of imported match, from the viewpoint that placing this stamp on the box makes it an absolute physical impossibility. Therefore, it seems to me that the advice of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon] should be followed, that this matter should be left, for the time being, in the hands of the committee that has been asked to see if it can not revamp the tax bill to produce the necessary reve-

Let me show the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Seiberling] the embarrassment he is placing himself in, in that, in my opinion, the amendment offered by him would be voted down in this House. It having been voted down, as I am sure it will be when it comes up for consideration in a few moments, then where is the subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means in again taking up the question in his interest, of some kind of a tax on matches that will produce revenue? That is the embarrassment in his own interest, as I see it.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.
Mr. SEIBERLING. Does the gentleman not know that we can not export a match into a foreign country on account of the Swedish monopoly, and does the gentleman not know that we can not export to Canada because we have to do the same thing?

Mr. TREADWAY. We are talking of an effort here to secure additional revenue, and it may be possible that one of the means by which we will get that revenue will be a tax on matches, in some form or other; but if we vote for such an amendment as the gentleman is proposing here, then you are almost tying the hands of your associates in an effort to help. I put that question distinctly up to the gentleman whether it is better to take a chance of that amendment going to a vote here and having it defeated or trusting to his own associates in an effort to secure some form of relief and at the same time get some revenue? That is the question I hope the gentleman will give careful consideration to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate on this amendment has expired. The rules provide five minutes for and five minutes against any amendment when it is considered under the 5-minute rule. Therefore I make the point of order that debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maryland rise?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as a point of order is made by the gentleman from Georgia, the Chair holds that the gentleman's amendment is an amendment in the third degree, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means has now under consideration the matter of matches with a view of taking some action to protect American manufacturers, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I object, unless I can have five minutes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio is desirous of withdrawing his amendment. The gentleman from Maryland says he will not give that consent unless he has five minutes. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland be permitted to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object, on the ground that it is a bribe.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects on the ground that it is a bribe.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objec-

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair hear any objection to ! the request of the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Boland: At the end of the Crisp amendment add a new paragraph, as follows:

"That an excise tax shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the hereinafter-described articles when imported from any foreign country into the continental United States upon coal (anthracite or bituminous), coke, or coal or coke briquets, 15 cents per 100

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I just listened to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon] admonish the Democratic Members of Congress about going over the country and their districts and being elected on the strength of their being against the Smoot-Hawley tariff. I want to acquaint the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. RAGON] with the fact that I came to Congress with all nominations. I did not have to go over my district to talk against the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, although we were supposed to have two cars in every garage if it were passed.

I am here to-day pleading in the interest of the miners in the anthracite coal field. I represent the city of Scranton, which is in the central part of this great anthracite field. At the present time over 40,000 of our miners are unemployed, and they have not worked for over a year. The rest of the men who are employed in the mines are only working part time. The free importation of foreign coal is responsible to a great degree for this condition. The enactment of my amendment will be very helpful in putting many miners back to work.

The domestic problem of anthracite coal is huge, complicated, and delicate to handle. The industry's life depends upon a prompt and efficient solution. To date, the industry has handled its affairs in an orderly and businesslike manner; and if allowed to continue without too much distress from other directions, it will prove its capacity to meet any domestic situation.

Under such conditions, the industry feels the necessity of relief from conditions which it can not control; the increasing volume of foreign competition, from countries whose labor standards are below ours in every case, and where, in some important instances, the status of labor is no better than that of domestic animals in America.

Anthracite coal from foreign countries is now being transported thousands of miles over the seas and sold in Boston at prices as low as we can sell ours at the mines. Of course, the present unnatural differences in values of currencies are responsible to a degree for that condition, but only to a degree. The low cost of labor is the major element. In many instances there is almost a total lack of labor cost, investment cost, and costs similar to those of maintaining our standards of protection of human life in mining. The oversupply of freight ships, coupled with such use of labor, makes the transportation of coal halfway around the world cost less than from Scranton, Pa., to Boston.

Our collieries are making every effort to readjust the domestic and internal situation. Great sums have been and are being expended to improve facilities, reduce costs, and improve service to the consuming public. The standard of preparation and quality of anthracite are the highest in the history of the industry at the present day.

I was here and listened attentively yesterday to all the arguments in favor of an embargo and an excise tax upon oil for the purpose of protecting the American oil industry. If what was said yesterday was true of oil, it certainly to-day is true of the foreign coal that is being shipped into our country.

We established beyond any question of doubt, before the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Customs, that the coal coming in from Russia is being mined by forced labor, and I am satisfied that will be attended to in the right way.

But we have other coals coming in from foreign countries. and I ask this committee to-day to adopt this amendment and protect the miners in my district.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. Yes. Mr. PARSONS. Is bituminous coal, together with its byproducts, included in this amendment?

Mr. BOLAND. Yes; it is. Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman figures to show how much revenue his amendment would produce?

Mr. BOLAND. This will produce over $3,000,000 in

Mr. BLANTON. I am for the gentleman's amendment. Mines are closed down now because of importation of foreign coal and thousands of American coal miners are without jobs in consequence.

Mr. COYLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. Yes.

Mr. COYLE. Would the gentleman consider revising his rate from 15 cents per 100 pounds to 10 cents per 100 pounds so that no possible charge of an exclusive rate could be brought against the latter figure?

Mr. BOLAND. Owing to the fact that I know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Coyle] is thoroughly familiar with this subject, I will accept his suggestion. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment to that extent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOLAND: At the end of the Crisp amendment, add a new paragraph to read as follows:

"That an excise tax shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the hereinafter described articles when imported from any foreign country into the continental United States, upon coal (anthractic or bituminous), coke, or coal or coke briquets, 10 cents per 100 records." 100 pounds.'

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Would the gentleman be willing to modify his amendment so as to eliminate the word "continental" and make it apply to Hawaii?

Mr. BOLAND. I will accept that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to know whether Pennsylvania has withdrawn the tax which was put on coal a few

Mr. BOLAND. She has. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out the word continental."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the word "continental." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BOLAND. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. I could not hear very plainly the reading of the amendment. Is it the gentleman's purpose to take care of his coal situation the same as the oil situation was taken care of yesterday, when the oil men were talking about putting men at work? If the gentleman's amendment is adopted it will have the effect of putting miners at work, will it not?

Mr. BOLAND. It certainly will.

Mr. CONNERY. I will favor the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BOLAND. I may say, to inform the committee as to how this foreign coal is being shipped into this country, that in January, 1931, there were 63,772 tons shipped in, while in January, 1932, there were 71,954 tons shipped in. You can see at that rate just where we are going to land.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize some gentleman who is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the

Mr. Chairman, I'am opposed to this amendment just as I was opposed to the oil amendment which was adopted yesterday. I have listened to the speech of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon], the "loud speaker" of the House, and it seems to me it comes with ill grace from him to ask us Democrats, as well as the Republicans, to not further amend the bill by these tariff propositions after he and others have secured adoption of a tariff on oil in this revenue bill.

A good many think this oil question was not brought into the bill in any fair or just manner, and certainly it is a tariff provision in a tax bill. I personally feel very bad about it because it affects my State so vitally, and especially do I feel bad about it because it is against what was considered by the "policy committee" established between the House and the Senate, when it was agreed by them that tariff matters of this nature would not be taken up by this Congress. The committee brought in a tariff on oil which affects the whole country and will cost the consumers $152,000,000, and has changed the position of the Members of this House. There is no question that chickens come home to roost. When you put one tariff provision in a bill you may expect others, and hence you have this amendment for an increased tariff on coal.

I have also had some people come to me and say that we have in Baltimore the largest sugar refinery in this country and we want a tariff on sugar, and then the copper people come here and they want a tariff on copper, and the woodpulp people come and want a tariff on wood pulp, and the lumber people want a tariff on lumber. I would like to know where you are going to land. The only fair, the only just, the only Democratic position to take is to withdraw the tariff on oil and place no tariff on any article in the tax bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think it is necessary.

There is another view which has not been discussed about this tariff on oil, and that is that it will further estrange us from the people of Central and South America. I have many times contended that the United States and its people have been derelict in their duty in that they have not created more friendly feelings with the nations of the south and encouraged our business with them. We have looked to Europe for our great activities and neglected the people of our hemisphere.

We have not the proper transportation facilities to South America-not nearly so fine, commodious, and large as the ships which ply between Germany, England, and France with Brazil, Argentina, and other countries of South America. It should be our duty to curry favor with these Central and South American countries whenever it is possible, both in business and social relations, whereas instead of that, we have placed high tariffs upon goods which we receive from them, and now you propose to further alienate them by placing a tariff on oil, which is one of their great products.

I fear they will think this is just rubbing it in and will resent our action. These countries, like ourselves, are now feeling very severe depression, but they will come back and they will remember their friends and they will also remember those who added to their depression by making business more expensive and more burdensome to their people.

I do hope that this House may see some way by which this oil tariff may be released; and if it must be considered, let it be considered in a bill designated a tariff bill.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia insists that the rules be observed.

Mr. BRUMM. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, for three years we have been trying to bring about some relief for the coal industry of Pennsylvania. I have introduced no less than three or four different bills to bring this about. I was under the impression when I came here this morning that I was to be recognized to present an amendment, which was almost an identical amendment to the one presented by my friend on the majority side. I am very glad that at least it has been presented; and in the few minutes I have, I shall try to give you some reasons why this is a peculiar case and why this tax should be imposed.

Never in the history of America has there been a tax on anthracite coal. The amendment includes also soft coal and briquets, but the fight was started on anthracite, and this is the article I am particularly interested in, and I want to say here that if anybody was familiar with the great anthracite-coal industry and understood the hazards of that business and the loyalty of these people, who comprehended the vastness of the business as a great fundamental industry, he would not now talk about any technicality or hairsplitting or division of policy. If he did, I would say that he would be more interested in such importations than in the blood of these workmen. Thirty-five thousand miners are out of employment. There are 130,000 who have been employed who only work half time. This means a loss in the last few years of about $33,000,000 in wages, $27,000,000 to distributing labor, $22,000,000 to the railroads, and $9,000,000

Will you tell me, then, that this is not a provision for revenue? The speeches that are made here claiming that this is not a tariff bill are not in good taste because the institution of the tariff system by Hamilton was for the fostering of infant industries, but as a matter of fact "abundant revenue poured forth," said Webster. The tariff bills originally were not for revenue at all. If a bill for protection can raise revenue, what objection is there to a bill for revenue at the same time protecting American industry? What is the difference whether protection comes in the form of an excise tax which would bring about $9,000,000 or more into the Treasury or whether you call it a revenue bill or a tariff bill?

Mr. WYANT. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BRUMM. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. I simply wish to state to the gentleman in connection with his remarks that foreign coke is being offered on the New England coast at $6.75 per ton, which is $3 less than cost of the manufacture and delivery of that coke from Pennsylvania, West Virginia, or Ohio.

Mr. BRUMM. I thank the gentleman. Coal in the last year has been shipped into this country from Germany, from Belgium, from Russia, and from Indo-China-the product of coolie labor.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out 10 cents and inserting 101/5 cents. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman, as that is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. BLANTON. This is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not take it out of the rule. Mr. BLANTON. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. That would make no difference.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. There are always in order three propositions: First, the proposal as offered; then there is a substitute for that proposal, which is always in order; and then there is one amendment in order to the original proposition. The Chair has always recognized that. The gentleman from Georgia offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has offered a new paragraph, and I am offering a substitute. This is the only time for perfecting the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is familiar with the rules of the House. There is a substitute that would have been germane and that would be a substitute for the Crisp amendment. The substitute the gentleman is seeking to offer is a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer a substitute for the Crisp amendment. I offer to strike out subdivision 3 of the Crisp amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a substitute. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRISP) there were 92 ayes and 50 noes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. Crisp and Mr. Boland.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 113 ayes and 67 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new paragraph to the Crisp amendment, as follows:

"6. Fluorspar containing 50 per cent or more of calcium fluoride imported into the United States, $3 per ton, but the tax on the article described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to importation of such article."

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, for those gentlemen who do not know what fluorspar is I want to say that it is a crystal mineral mined from the ground similar to coal, with the exception that coal lies in veins and fluorspar lies in faults, in vertical formation instead of horizontal.

There are large deposits in southern Illinois and in the State of Kentucky. Eighty-five per cent of fluorspar is used for fluxing steel and about 15 per cent is used in ceramics and the trade of manufacturing aluminum ware, dishes, and so forth; also in the manufacture of fluoride acid.

During the year 1927 there were imported into the United States about 71,000 tons. If this amendment is adopted, it will yield revenue substantially in amount that will be yielded by the coal amendment just adopted. It costs about $20.77 per ton, according to the Tariff Commission's report which I hold in my hand, to mine fluorspar and deliver it to mills in the United States.

Mr. GARBER. From what countries do they import fluorspar?

Mr. PARSONS. England, Germany, and South Africa. The cost to mine spar in foreign countries and transport it to this country is $7.71 per ton, making a total differential in the cost of production at home and abroad of $13.56.

Mr. MANLOVE. Is that the same quality of spar?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes. During the war large deposits of spar were mined in England, Germany, and South Africa for the lead content which it yielded. The spar was not used. Immediately after the war and ever since, those countries have been sending the spar here as ballast in ships, with practically no transportation cost, unloading it here to the steel mills on the eastern seaboard for one-third of what it cost to mine it in this country. Gentlemen can readily realize that with the spar already mined, and the cost for mining already paid for in foreign lands, all the cost importers are put to, to unload the product here at the present time, is the transportation cost. We have millions and millions of dollars invested in these mines in southern Illinois and Kentucky, and thousands of miners are out of work and have been for the last three years. The Aluminum Co. of America owns several of these mines; and while they have let the men walk the streets idle, with the mines closed down, its subsidiaries have been exporting spar from South Africa for $9.91 per ton. It is only a matter of justice that we equalize the cost of production at home and abroad. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then the gentleman believes that a high protective tariff is one of the best cures for unemployment that we can find.

Mr. PARSONS. Not entirely. I believe in the principle of protection that will equalize the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

It will revive business in the mining section, relieve the unemployment situation, and increase the buying power of the people. They in turn will demand manufactured products, and to that extent the adoption of this amendment will be a genuine relief measure. You gentlemen who are getting an oil tariff, and the gentlemen on that side of the aisle who advocate protection, should be 100 per cent for this measure. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, this is a sad day for me. I love my country, and I have endeavored to serve it. I have bared my breast to every shaft of criticism, and I have done so because I believed I am right. I also love my party, and to-day I am seeing my party destroy itself. I am witnessing my party put on higher tariff rates than even the Republicans put on, putting on embargoes, and then going out and criticizing the bill. Consistency, thou art a jewel! I have tried to stem the tide. I realize that I am impotent; I realize that I have not had the majority of this House back of me. I have been long-suffering and patient and have not sought to close debate, but patience ceases to be a virtue. I am going to express myself when I say to you that, as far as I am concerned, if these amendments and other tariff embargoes continue to be added to the bill I shall myself vote against it. [Applause.] Oh, gentlemen, what are you trying to do? Are you trying to balance a Budget deficiency caused by a Republican administration? This is not a Democratic but is a Republican deficit. I have no proof of it, but as I watched the vote yesterday afternoon by tellers on the oil proposition I suspected what was going to happen to-day, and it has been happening—logrolling tariff making, with embargo rates. You may adopt all of these high-tariff amendments that you desire to, but I want the country to know it and I want your people to know it. I hope the amendment will be rejected. If these embargo-tariff rates are adopted I shall vote against the bill and you can take the consequences. The Republicans had better stop and think. Their administration is responsible for this deficit. In honor they are obligated to help balance the Budget.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. The time on the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and Mr. Parsons demanded a division.

The committee proceeded to divide.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. Rainey and Mr. Parsons to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 92. So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAWLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman from Texas for that purpose. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon, a member of the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, we are engaged in writing a revenue bill for the purpose of balancing the Budget of the United States Government. My belief is that a proper revenue bill, raising sufficient money to meet Government | expenditures, will restore public credit and bring back economic recovery, which is the thing that we all ought to work for, which is a thing extremely desired by the people. I trust that so far as I have any influence with gentlemen, there will be no more amendments offered that savor of tariff amendments. Amendments that are for the raising of revenue that are germane are proper, but they ought not to endanger by any means or in any way the passage of this bill by changing it from its original purpose, that of bringing back prosperity to the country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion to strike out the enacting clause, which usually is in

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a preferential motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret it was necessary for me to make such a motion in order to get the floor. had to have the floor for five minutes, and the only way to get it, and to be in order on what I am going to say, was to move to strike out the enacting clause. After I speak I will ask to withdraw such motion.

The Congress of the United States—that is, one branch of it, the House of Representatives-is not composed merely of the majority leader and the minority leader and the chairman of some committee. It is composed of 435 Representatives, all of equal standing, equal rights, and equal responsibility. [Applause.]

The Democratic Party here is not composed merely of the majority leader and one or two gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee who are in the lead. It is composed of each and all of the Democrats in this House, each one being the duly commissioned representative of all of the Democrats in his own district who look to him, and him only, to vote their wishes and preferences in the Congress of the United States

Every Democrat here has equal rights, equal standing, and equal responsibility; and if he is not a "yea man"rubber stamp-he does his own thinking and votes his own judgment.

I regret exceedingly the speech made by our good friend, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. The gentleman knows there is not another man in this House who has greater regard or respect or love for him than I have.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. But I support him more.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I do not yield for interruptions from Republicans sitting on the Democratic side. [Laughter.] I refuse to yield, Mr. Chairman. I want to address myself to this situation.

Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

Our friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has never been mad until this morning. I want to congratulate him. He, until a few moments ago, has held his head, under trying circumstances, and there never has been a moment throughout this entire bitter fight over the sales tax when he did not have the affection of the Democratic side of this House, and likewise there has not been a moment when the great Speaker of this House has not had the undivided respect, confidence, love, and affection and support of his party. [Applause.] There was no "breaking away" from the Speaker or from Chairman Caish. There was merely a turning down of a Republican-Treasury Department sales tax. We Democrats are not like Republicans. We are entirely different.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BLANTON. I regret I can not yield, because I have only a few minutes and I have some important things to say that must be said, and said at this juncture.

You Republicans, when you come here and have a majority of a hundred, as you had in the last Congress, were willing to have two or three men do your thinking for you and do your acting for you and to vote you like sheep under an ironclad rule that gagged you. You let them bring in rule after rule here that hog-tied you so on many important bills of great magnitude that you could not move, and you could not offer any amendment, and could not be heard in debate, and you were compelled to swallow just what your few leaders stuck down your throat.

We Democrats are not like that. We are different. We can not be led like sheep by any leader. When we come to Congress we do not come as the tools of any machine. We are under no obligations to any machine. We are elected by the Democrats of our district, who have confidence in us, who have seen us tried at home in many public emergencies, and who know that they can depend upon us to carry out the pledges of the platform of our Democratic Party and to uphold at all times the fundamental principles of Democracy.

The fundamental of all fundamentals in our Democracy is the principle of "equal privileges to all; special privileges to none." Every Democrat in this House has equal privileges with every other Democrat. He is a servant only to his own constituents. He obeys no one here. He takes orders from no one. He does his own reading. He does his own seeing. He does his own investigating. He does his own thinking. He does his own talking. He reaches his own conclusions. And then he does his own acting. He is not led like a sheep.

Our Republican brothers are not used to that kind of proceeding. When in the last Congress we Democrats twitted you Republicans about having to swallow so many bills of importance under special rules prepared for you by your triumvirate—your Speaker, your Republican leader [Mr. Tilson], and your then chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. Snell]—giving you no opportunity whatever to amend them or to discuss them in debate, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] took the floor and by way of retaliation tried to prophesy what would happen when our then distinguished minority leader [Mr. GARNER] became Speaker of this House, saying:

Our friends on the Democratic side of late are having a great Our friends on the Democratic side of late are having a great deal of trouble about the triumvirate on the Republican side of the House. Let me call your attention, gentlemen, to the fact that instead of a triumvirate on your side, if there is such a word, you have a "oneumvirate," and the best part of it is he makes you like it; and there is not a single one of you who dares to raise his voice above a whisper in opposition to the czarlike rule of the leader of the minority at the present time.

If you will examine my reply, which I made on February 5, 1931, you will see that I promptly denied that Mr. GARNER was that kind of a leader; and then asserted that Democrats followed him when he was right and refused to follow him when he was wrong, but that Mr. GARNER was right most of the time, and that it was a pleasure and privilege for Democrats to follow him.

There has never been any demand upon Democrats here either from our Speaker or from our majority leader [Mr. RAINEY] or from our friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that the sales tax should be made a party issue and that Democrats should vote for it, but every Democrat was left to do his own thinking, and to form his own opinion and conclusion, and to vote his own sentiment. We Democrats held no caucus. If we had held a caucus and had decided upon a sales tax as a party matter, then all Democrats without proper excuse who refused to support a party matter would have been renegades and insurgents. But as there was no party arrangement or understanding, there were no insurgents and no renegades, and no breaking away of any kind

A group of so-called Republican leaders had the audacity to assert that a mistake was made in not bringing the tax bill into the House under a rule that would preclude debate and all amendments. That is just what the Republicans would have done. It would have been a bill framed by the Treasury Department, approved by a few Republican leaders, and passed in an hour or so, giving to none of the Republican membership any privilege or right whatever concerning it and that is the kind of procedure that "big monopolies," and the "big press," and the big tax-evading multimillionaires approve of and want. The Republican leadership look upon all of the rest of the Republican Members as just so many votes they can poll at any and all times for any and all measures they want to put through. And Republican leaders have taught Republican Members—

Theirs not to make reply. Theirs not to reason why, Theirs but to do—and vote as they are commanded. That was splendid war discipline for Lord Tennyson to preach in his Charge of the Light Brigade, but it is a poor rule of procedure for free and independent Democratic Representatives of Democratic constituencies to be governed by in the Congress of the United States.

Democrats do not act like that. They are real representatives of the people.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is not confining himself to a discussion of the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am discussing this entire bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I will, Mr. Chairman. I know the rules. The pro forma amendment to strike out the enacting clause made by me affects everything in this bill and everything that can be put in it or taken out of it, and the reasons for putting in and taking out, and that is the only reason I made the motion, because I do not want the enacting clause stricken out. When the gentleman from Oregon has been here a little longer he will understand that. [Laughter.]

I want to say to my friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] and to my good friend the leader of this House [Mr. Rainey], who has been a veteran for years in fighting the battles of Democracy, that the Democratic Party right now is stronger in this Nation than it has ever been for a single moment since Congress met. The Democrats of the Nation have confidence in the Democrats in the House [laughter], and they know that we are not going to stand for something that is not right and just to the masses. And they know that we are not going to stand for increasing first-class postage from 2 to 3 cents, or for putting a stamp tax on checks.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I am sorry; I have not the time. We will get to wort after a while. [Laughter.]

Because a great majority of this House, 223 Members, if you please, saw fit not to pass a sales tax to put the burden of the expense of the Government on the backs of the poor people, the millionaire monopolies call them renegades and insurgents, and these multimillionaire newspapers, one of whom caused all this trouble last fall when he had this wet Canadian junket, poke fun at Congress in editorials and cartoons. [Laughter.]

I want to say that William Randolph Hearst tried to lead the Democrats when he was a Member of this House, and he could not do it then and he has not done it since, and he will never lead the Democrats of this House or this Nation on any matter that is against the wishes of the people.

There has been no trade between any coal men or any oil men, I will say to my friend. There has not been an agreement of any kind. There has not been any consultation between them. [Applause and laughter.] The only oil provision in this bill was put in by Chairman Crisp and his Ways and Means Committee. And he certainly can not criticize us for supporting his action and that of his committee by speaking for and supporting the excise tax against foreign oils imported into the United States.

In conclusion, let me state that we Democrats are going to balance the Budget, and we are going to balance it in a proper way. We are going to put the taxes and burdens where they belong. We are going to put a proper tax on gambling transactions on Wall Street and other gambling stock exchanges in the United States, which, more than all other causes combined, are responsible for the numerous bank failures and the suffering everywhere in consequence. And when we get through with this tax bill the people of the United States everywhere will have confidence in and respect for the Democrats in Congress and for the Democratic Party in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that was a pro forma amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, up to yesterday there was a strong, decided division in the House on a matter of principle, a question which involved the taxing policy of this country, as some of us saw it.

The sales-tax provision, inspired for selfish purposes and passed on to the committee under misrepresentation, misinformation, and deceptive methods, was brought into the House, but that is now a matter of the past. It has been eliminated from the bill and I believe it will be many, many, many years to come before Congress will ever be presented with another sales-tax proposition. [Applause.] But, gentlemen, our battle with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] from this point on is over. He was a worthy foe, chivalrous and generous. His task continues and so does ours. I see no reason why we can not now cooperate in bringing forth a real revenue bill in keeping with American tax traditions.

I wish to say to my good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] that we must ignore these continued vicious, foul abuses that are being heaped upon us from certain quarters smarting from the licking we gave them, and we have to stand by the committee and bring out a bill that will raise sufficient revenue. [Applause.]

I do not bear any animosity against any Member for anything which may have been said in the heat of debate.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LaGUARDIA. I can not yield now.

I do not even bear any animosity for some of the nasty things that have been said about me in the cloakroom. I certainly can ignore vicious attacks that are being made by certain individuals who are sore that we did not relieve them of their taxes and pass them on to the American people. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that some of my colleagues who were most vociferous in their criticism of us and our opposition to the sales tax are now attempting to load down this bill with a number of tariff provisions. We fought in the open; this tariff drive is sniping. Some one will say, "You supported the oil-tax provision yesterday, did you not? I did; but it was a part of the bill, and I stated in general debate that I would stand by the oil provision. Regardless of the merits of the separate amendments for tariff protection, I submit that it is impossible to write a tariff law at this time on the floor of the House. It is our duty to perfect this revenue bill, and I want to assure the committee of my cooperation to that end. [Applause 1

I worked on a revenue bill all summer. Why, back last October I announced a tentative plan to raise revenue. I then stated—and it was not yet popular to do so—that I did not believe in passing the current expenses of our day on to the next generation. I stated last October that revenue must be raised to meet the deficit and that I disapproved of issuing long-term bonds for that purpose. I was criticized by some of the very people who are now saying, just like a parrot, "Balance the Budget." I stand ready to work with the committee at any time I may be called. I will support any measure in keeping with our tax policy. [Applause.]

I want to say that the Committee on Ways and Means now has under consideration various provisions for the raising of revenue which belong in a tax bill. Until the committee brings us its proposals I think what we ought to do is to proceed with the orderly consideration of the administrative features of this bill, over which there is

I shall offer perfecting amendments at the proper places. Then when the committee brings in its recommendations for new sources of revenue we can take each one of them, discuss them, and decide them on their merits.

In spite of the way we have been misrepresented throughout the country, in spite of the abuse that has been heaped upon us-disregarding all that-I appeal to my friends who stood together in our fight against the vicious sales tax to show that we can rise to the occasion and that we now proceed to help pass a bill which will bring in the necessary revenue. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. In conformity with the prior ruling of the Chair, the Chair holds that all debate has been exhausted, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to strike out the enacting clause.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FULMER: At the end of the Crisp amendment add the following:

amendment add the following:

"(5) Waste bagging and waste sugar-sack cloth, 3 cents per pound; jute and jute butts not dressed or manufactured in any manner, 3 cents per pound; fabrics, composed wholly of jute, plain woven or twilled, 5 cents per pound; bags or sacks made from plain woven fabrics of single jute yarn or from twilled or other fabrics composed wholly of jute, 5 cents per pound."

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, no doubt we will hear again that this amendment is a matter that should come before the Ways and Means Committee as a tariff proposition.

I listened to the statement of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], romping on Members of Congress, and also the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], wherein he especially ripped the Democrats up the back who apparently differed with him as to what class of people should bear the burden of taxation. I want to say to the gentleman from Oregon that he has been on the Ways and Means Committee for years as a leader in placing tariff duties on my people in the interest of his constituents. In the meantime, he has allowed the American markets to be flooded with foreign jute at the expense of the cotton South amounting to millions of dollars annually. My good friend from Georgia, for whom I have a very high regard, has also been a member of the great Ways and Means Committee for many years, and is now the acting chairman. He has either refused in the past to put a tariff on jute or he has been unable to do so. I think it comes with poor grace, and certainly poor statesmanship, on the part of the gentleman from Georgia to be romping on Democratic Members who refuse to go along with him in placing a sales tax on his people and our people who are now facing bankruptcy.

In the gentleman's amendment now pending, and which I am trying to amend so as to place a tax on jute, he proposes to place a tax on oil. Certainly if my amendment is a tariff proposition, it is on all fours with his amendment in which he proposes to place a tax on the importation of foreign oil and gas. I know of no oil wells in the gentleman's State; yet the gentleman is offering the amendment but is unwilling for other Members to enjoy the same privilege that he has taken upon himself. If this oil and gas provision raises revenue, it will be paid by his people and my people. In the meantime when I offer an amendment to outlaw jute to give his farmers and my farmers a chance to control the very little controversy except as to one or two provisions. | American market he would try to have the Congress and the country believe that I am trying to destroy the Democratic Party.

Let us think seriously for a moment and see what the status of this proposition is. Jute comes from India, which is next to the United States in the production of cotton. India is not only our largest competitor in growing cotton, but she is permitted, free of duty, to flood American markets with jute and jute products, displacing the consumption of American cotton from two to three million bales annually. I have served in Congress for 11 years and have listened to southern Democrats in season and out of season, when considering tariff legislation, howling "Thief, thief, thief!" In the meantime the tariff policy which has been in force for over 100 years goes on.

To-day we have the highest tariff rates ever written in a tariff bill; and what does it mean? My friends, it means that the people of the South are paying millions annually to protected industry while we of the South are denied the same benefits in the way of protection for our cotton farmers and cotton mills against foreign products-jute, oil, and so forth. I am against a tariff policy which proposes to place tariff rates on foreign products higher than on a competitive basis. In the meantime, when I find out of my experience during the past 11 years that we Democrats of the South are unable to stop the high-handed stealing on the part of protected industry-in the words of the late Senator B. R. Tillman, of South Carolina:

I demand for my people their just share of the steal.

I want to ask my Democratic friends, especially those from the South, if you are willing to stand idly by and see foreign countries that are increasing the production of cotton, which is shutting out the exportation of our cotton, come in and take our own American market from us? I say to you frankly, that I am not. I could stand here and give you just as sad a picture of my people in the cotton South as the gentleman from Arkansas did in arguing for the oil amendment in behalf of the independent oil producers and the thousands of starving coal miners.

Last year we produced 17,000,000 bales of cotton. Every pound of that cotton, my friends, was picked with human fingers. It was picked largely by white women and their children with jute bags tied to their backs. In the meantime, that cotton has been sold or is now selling for 5 cents per pound below the actual cost of production. Cotton farmers by the thousands are losing their farms. Men and women are going to their untimely graves because of the worry of their poverty-stricken condition. Why? Largely because you allow the Jute Trust to take the American market free and unhampered. Foreign jute twine used in all post offices in the United States; old ragged disgraceful jute bagging covering American cotton; jute sacks for American grain; jute products used in American-made rugs; millions of yards of jute burlap used in building public highways; and millions of other uses of jute where American cotton, especially of low grade, could be used.

I have a bill pending that would outlaw this old, disgraceful jute bagging and permit the use of cotton bagging. I have the support of this legislation of western Republican friends, but certain southern Democrats are against it because jute manufacturing plants in their States oppose it. No other cotton country in the world uses this old, wasteful jute; not even India where it is produced.

You have been voting millions this session for special interests. In the meantime the gentleman from Georgia and the Democratic leaders are willing to place a sales tax on the backs of millions of unemployed and the already broke agricultural people, as well as allow the Jute Trust to continue to destroy the cotton farmers' market in the United States. Some time ago you gave to the Farm Board $500,000,000 for the relief of the wheat and cotton farmers. To-day this Farm Board is in control of between three and four million bales of cotton with millions of losses. In the meantime they do not know what to do with it. If you will pass my amendment, we can use practically every bale of cotton that is in the hands of this board to replace jute. I want the people of the cotton South to understand just why we have never given them the same protection that other sections are enjoying at their expense. It is because of Ludlow, the jute king, and his association, and just what you have heard here from southern Democrats to-day.

Every time a tariff bill is up for consideration Ludlow or his representative appears before the Ways and Means Committee protesting against a tariff which would operate against his Jute Trust. In the meantime southern Democrats apparently are satisfied in cursing out the tariff policy without any beneficial result to the South. When the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was being considered only about three or four Democrats appeared before this committee in the interest of cotton farmers-ex-Senator Ransdell, Louisiana; Whittington, Mississippi; Jones, Texas; and myself. Where is Mr. Ludlow to-day, with his millions made out of jute in the United States, my friends? He has one of the largest jute plants in India of any plant that has been moved from the United States to any foreign country. There he is working Indian labor at 10 cents per day, flooding the American market with jute products at the expense of millions of unemployed Americans and the cotton farmers of the South. In the meantime he is operating his foreign plant as an American citizen under the protection of Uncle Sam's expensive Army and Navy. The records will show, according to the last report I have, that on a $50,000,000 capital he made a profit of $21,000,000, or 41 per cent on the dollar. In the meantime he is given the benefit of certain tax exemptions for operating in a foreign country as an American citizen. My friends, I am not surprised that there is so much unemployment, poverty, unrest, and dissatisfaction on the part of agriculture, labor, and the great masses of people in the United States to-day.

Some days ago we voted 40,000,000 bushels of wheat for the starving unemployed in this country. If we could substitute cotton for jute, as proposed by my amendment, you would put millions of cotton spindles into operation, as well as thousands of unemployed to work. I want to tell you, my friends, that if you will pass my amendment and give to our people this market—to which they are justly entitled—it will do more for the relief of the cotton South than all the so-called farm-relief legislation you have passed in Congress since I have been a Member. I am offering this amendment as a revenue amendment, on the theory that it will bring in from twenty-five to thirty-five million dollars revenue, based on the amount of jute and jute products imported during the year 1923.

Mr. RANKIN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it would bring in a revenue of $35,000,000?

Mr. FULMER. Yes; from $25,000,000 to $35,000,000, based on the present importation of jute and jute products.

Mr. RANKIN. And the cotton growers will pay every cent of it?

Mr. FULMER. I want to say, my good friend, that Democrats like you from the South are all the time raising the roof about a tariff, and in the meantime I might say to the gentleman that you still have the tariff policy, and the Congress continues to impose a high-tariff protection for every other section except the South, which is paid by your people and my people. When it comes to placing a tariff on a foreign product, where you can help the southern people, you stand up and vote against it.

Mr. RANKIN. Do you help the southern cotton growers by imposing a penalty of $35,000,000 on them?

Mr. FULMER. Pass my amendment and we will take a chance on what the cotton growers will have to pay just like protected industry is taking. May I state to my friend that this amendment will give to the cotton growers of the South a market for from two to three million bales of cotton, and it will do more to help cotton growers than all the gentleman has accomplished since he has been in Congress? To-day you are having us pay millions to protected interest, while we are being paralyzed with a surplus of cotton that could be substituted for jute. Oh, my friends, give my people a chance to dispose of two or three million bales of cotton in our own markets that you are now giving to the Jute Trust and to India and see what will happen to the southern cotton farmer.

In the words of Gerald Massey may I say to my people?-

O men, bowed down with labor,
O women, young, yet old,
O hearts, oppressed in the toilers' breast,
And crushed with the power of gold;
Keep on, with your weary struggle, Against triumphant might;
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

[Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, there is not a man in the House or out of it who is more in sympathy with the toiling cotton growers than I am. There is no man who is more familiar with their problems. I am one of them, and I believe I understand their conditions equally as well as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Fulmer].

There is no subject on which there has been more misleading propaganda "dished out" to our farmers than that of a tariff on jute. The gentleman who has just spoken admitted that it would raise the price of the bagging which the cotton growers of the South use to the extent of $35,000,000 a year. I submit they are in no condition to assume this extra burden.

Unless you raise this tariff high enough to make it a complete embargo it would not benefit the cotton growers one dollar to offset this $35,000,000 it would cost them. And even if it were made a complete embargo, I have grave doubts whether or not it would not cost him $5 or $10 for every extra dollar it would bring him.

Besides, this is no time to be raising tariffs. Why should a Democrat stray off into the tariff field at this critical period, when the American people are groaning under the burdens of a high protective tariff and appealing to Congress for relief? Our battle now is to get rid of the tariff instead of encouraging its extension. How can we do this if we Democrats join in the stampede and vote for extra tariffs on oil, coal, jute, manganese, copper, and everything else the American people use?

As I pointed out before, the tariff has already stripped the agricultural States of their resources. Since its enactment in 1922 it has cost the American people on an average of approximately $4,000,000,000 a year—taxing everything they use from the cradle to the grave, and then taxing the tombstones that mark their last resting places.

That means that approximately $40 per capita for every man, woman, and child is taken from our people every year through this indirect tax called the tariff. Of that $40 the Federal Government has received $6, while the other $34 has gone into the pockets of beneficiaries of the tariff.

That means that the people of States like Mississippi and South Carolina have contributed from $50,000,000 to $100,-000,000 a year and received practically nothing in return.

No wonder our people are poverty stricken. No wonder they are calling out and appealing to Congress to relieve them from these unjust discriminations. Yet instead of relieving them certain Democrats come here and ask us to vote tariffs on various things that will not only impose additional burdens but absolutely close their mouths whenever it comes to fighting the iniquities of the tariff.

These Democrats who are straying off and advocating tariffs on various and sundry commodities have been called "tariff hitch hikers" by a certain distinguished gentleman at the other end of the Capitol. He said the hitch hiker rides with a man without paying any of the expenses, burns up his gasoline, wears out his car, sometimes sandbags the owner and takes it away from him, and if he is injured in the slightest manner invariably sues him for damages.

He has compared these Democrats who are trying to impose tariffs on various commodities as "political hitch hkers."

I am not one of them. I believe that the tariff is the outstanding cause of our trouble. It has drained the agricultural States of their resources. It has impoverished our farmers. It has concentrated the wealth of this Nation into the hands of the favored few. It has provoked retaliation on the part of foreign countries to an extent that has destroyed our foreign trade, paralyzed world commerce, and brought about the greatest economic crash of modern times.

The Democratic Party has always condemned a high protective tariff. It will be the outstanding issue in the coming campaign between the representatives of the American people and the representatives of the predatory interests.

I opposed the sales tax and did everything I possibly could to bring about its defeat. I am glad to recall that out of 219 Democrats in this House, only 35 of them voted for it. The defeat of that provision of the bill was the greatest victory that has been won for the common people of America since the close of the World War. It gave to the toiling masses of Americans a new hope that their interests were being looked after in Washington and that this rule of the superrich, under the present administration with its "Billion Dollar Cabinet" and its subservient sycophants was at last coming to a close.

But would we be consistent, after having defeated the vicious sales tax, to join in imposing high protective tariff duties at this time? A high protective tariff is even worse than a sales tax, for the reason that every dollar you take from the people under a sales tax goes into the Treasury. while, as I have shown, under a high protective tariff only $6 out of every $40 goes into the Treasury, while the people are robbed of an extra $34 to go into the pockets of tariff beneficiaries.

And these embargoes that are proposed are even more vicious, for the simple reason that they raise the prices of commodities to the American people and do not raise any revenue at all.

Would I be consistent, after protesting against the legalized robbery of my people through a high protective tariff for the last 10 years, if I then voted to place a tariff on oil, the most vicious tariff of them all, to take from the people of a State like Mississippi four or five millions of dollars a year with little or no revenue to the Federal Government?

Would I be consistent, after having opposed the tariff all these years, if I capitulated now, joined in the loot so to speak, and added $35,000,000 a year burden to the cotton growers of the South through a tariff on jute?

No, gentlemen; the tariff has wrecked the economic structure of our country. It is the outstanding evil of the day. It is the commander in chief of all the allied forces that seem to be combined to wreck the economic existence of mankind.

We can not compromise with it. It is a common enemy, and every Democrat and every other individual on American soil who is interested in the welfare of the masses of the American people and in the perpetuity of American institutions should join forces against it. We must oppose these tariff raises, these embargoes, and I for one propose to help defeat them or strike them from the bill.

Besides this is not a tariff bill, it is a tax bill, and even if a high protective tariff were ever justified it would have no place in this measure.

Having purged the bill of its greatest evil, when we eliminated the sales tax, let us not wreck it now by injecting provisions equally as bad. But let us join hands in the fight to raise revenue to meet the current expenses of the Government without violating our pledges to the American people and without unnecessarily adding to their present burdens.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. RANKIN. Yes; for a question, if I have any time left. Mr. McGUGIN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the tariff is the cause of all our ruin at this time?

Mr. RANKIN. Practically all of it. I thought the gentleman knew that.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman think that the proposition of coming here and voting for all appropriations and not voting to raise the necessary revenue to meet them has not had anything to do with it?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is trying to hunt a storm cellar, after his vote for the sales tax, which would have levied a tax of twenty or thirty dollars a year on every man, woman, and child in Kansas. Yes; this tariff has robbed the agricultural States.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does not the gentleman think-

Mr. RANKIN. Do not interrupt me until I yield. It has robbed the agricultural States, it has bled them white, it has brought about retaliation and destroyed our foreign trade and produced the great panic in which we find ourselves to-day, and we on the Democratic side are going to continue to fight it, as we have in the past, and we expect to sweep on to a victory for the American people in the end.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not be recognized for that purpose, as that is an amendment in the third degree, under the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the enacting clause can again be made, after debate, and the gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, we have arrived at a stage here where we have the majority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], on the floor; the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], is on the floor; we have the responsible leadership of the House here, and it is a shame and a pity that this Congress is permitted to go to the country in the light in which it is going to the country. Important technical amendments are being passed upon without consideration. Amendments are being placed in the bill for the purpose of killing the bill. Members are introducing amendments which have no connection with a genuine tax bill. Amendments proposing tariffs under the subterfuge of tax are being offered by Members who talk the loudest against a protective-tariff system. Many of those who have talked so much about reducing tariffs are under this subterfuge trying to increase tariffs.

This debate, if we are to judge by the last two speeches, has degenerated into a tariff fight between Members of the majority party.

Now, this matter is too important—there is too much at stake-to permit a continuance of this kind of thing. There is no member of the Ways and Means Committee, there is no responsible leader of the House here, who will stand up and say that it is his judgment that we should proceed in this way. It seems that the House is beyond the control of its responsible leadership. This bill should go back to the committee, where these important amendments can be considered by those who understand what they mean and be reported in an intelligent way to the House.

I am not going to say "I told you so," but in days gone by we have discussed the necessity of responsible leadership assuming responsibility and invoking the rules of the House in making a catastrophe and show of this kind impossible.

The rules of the House are still in force and effect, and you should invoke those powers and bring order out of

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to his amendment and that he has no authority to lecture either side

Mr. MICHENER. When addressing the committee a few minutes ago the gentleman from Texas, when discussing a similar motion, suggested that that motion was broad enough to cover the remarks he was making, and he has been here long enough to know that under a motion to strike out the enacting clause one can go a long way.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman says the rules of the House are being violated. Will the gentleman inform the House what rule has been violated?

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Kentucky misunderstood me. If I said the rules are being violated I used unfortunate language. I said there were rules of the House whereby those in responsible position—the leadership could put an end to this fiasco. They could arise and assert their leadership. They could demonstrate that they were going to have the kind of leadership that the Democratic Party has said time and time again that we would have if they were in power. Where is that leadership? [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Chairman, we did not bring this bill in under a rule. We could have done so. Bills of this character have been brought in under rules before, and amendments have been limited or made impossible by rule.

We brought this bill in in order to permit the freest expression of opinion and the freest debate possible and not to gag this House. [Applause.]

We brought it in under the impression that this was a deliberative body. You gentlemen have been elected to Congress, you have filled your high offices, you have the confidence of your constituents, and we believe that you are going to discharge fully your duties as Members of this—which we have heretofore referred to as the greatest deliberative body in the world. I think myself that we ought to keep up the standards we have laid out for ourselves. [Applause.]

This is not a tariff bill. You are proposing amendments here which have not been considered by the committee. We have committees that study these questions and bring out their bills after long and continued and intensive study. I follow the committees of this House. When they have studied for weeks and months an important measure and bring in here their recommendation, I very rarely vote against them. I have confidence in them. None of these motions to amend this bill which you are proposing now has been considered by the committee, and I commend my friend from Oregon, Mr. HAWLEY, who stands for tariffs, and one of these tariff bills bears his name, because a few moments ago with courage he stood before his side of the House and impressed upon them that this is not a tariff bill and that he did not want to make a tariff bill in this way. I am wondering now if I can impress upon the Democratic side of the House-I am afraid not as forcibly as he didthat this is not a tariff bill, that none of these propositions has been studied by this committee, and that gentlemen ought not to treat it and handle it on this floor upon the theory that it is a tariff bill and that they can inject into it these tariff amendments.

There is pending before the Ways and Means Committee the proposition of raising additional revenue and a subcommittee is at work now to report back to the full committee. We have an immense amount of money to make up on account of the defeat of the sales tax the other day. The sales tax is ended, it is out of the picture, but we must balance this Budget.

Why can not gentlemen here who think they have propositions that will yield revenue submit them to the Committee on Ways and Means to be considered, to be brought back here by the committee and suggested by the committee if it finds that these propositions will yield revenue, when these new propositions come in to the House next week?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I hope that nothing that is said by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp], by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Hawley], and others with regard to the necessity for orderly procedure will react against the amendment which I propose to offer, a proposal which amounts to almost an embargo against Russian-made goods. Still it may produce some revenue. I want to help the leaders perfect the text of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I know the Committee on Ways and Means did consider in the last Congress dozens of embargo bills and was practically swamped by the number of them at the last moment before adjournment. If this bill or proposal to be added to it is again considered by a subcommittee, it is probable that the thing which amounts to almost an embargo against Russian-made goods might not be considered as a tax-raising measure. Besides all proponents of these amendments will desire to be heard by the subcommittee. The gentleman from Illinois worried about communism the other day. Do we want to encourage the Soviet Government by buying their goods at any price at which they are dumped here?

Mr. RAINEY. This is not the time to discuss embargoes against Russia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is not a full embargo if we get it in this way. It is a blanket amendment in lieu of all these 1-item amendments which have been up to-day. The amendment I offer should, in the immortal words of the late Senator Vest, nevertheless and notwithstanding, be adopted.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman's argument is for an embargo against Russia. That matter can come up later in a proper bill when the committee has considered it and brought it before the House in an orderly way.

Mr. RAGON. When these other taxes that are going to be proposed by the Ways and Means Committee are brought in here there will be the same opportunity to offer these amendments at that time as now. If we are to proceed upon the theory that we are raising revenue, I do not see how we can sensibly pass on these things now until we know something of what the Committee of the Whole will do with the propositions I refer to.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman is absolutely right. I can not yield again because I am taking too much time, but I appeal to my friends on both sides of this Chamber to proceed in order to keep out of this bill the things which ought not to be here and which ought only to be in a tariff bill, if we are to have a tariff bill at some future session. We should proceed now calmly and without any animosity, and without disturbing the orderly course of procedure in this House, with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me make one suggestion. If the gentleman from Georgia or if the minority leader will make a motion to close debate upon the Crisp amendment and all amendments thereto now, we can proceed with the bill.

Mr. RAINEY. I would be glad to see that done.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAINEY. No; I am through.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GOSS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to strike out the enacting clause. The motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina to amend the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a preferential motion. I have no desire to cut off these gentlemen from speeches. I move that all debate upon the Crisp amendment and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. When that is concluded, I am going to move that this committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that debate upon the Crisp amendment and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of my good friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. In the Crisp amendment and in the original bill there is a provision for a tax of 4 cents a gallon on lubricating oil. When the bill was originally reported | with manufacturers' excise provisions therein, under the license system 4 cents per gallon on lubricating oil would operate in such a manner that our manufacturers would pay only 21/4 per cent, the base rate provided in the bill. That is what the committee intended, as I understand it. We did not intend that the business of the Nation should be compelled to pay 1 cent a quart for lubricating oil used in industry. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if that is not a correct statement—that the committee never intended to impose 1 cent a quart on the use of lubricating oil in the industry?

Mr. CRISP. No. When that provision was in the bill, with the manufacturers' tax title, lubricating oil in industry was exempt, because that went into a part of the cost of the manufactured article, and the tax levied on the complete article would cover it. Personally I think that a tariff of 4 cents a gallon on lubricating oil is excessive.

Mr. McCORMACK. And the gentleman would agree to an amendment to the extent of providing that this does not apply to lubricating oil used for industrial purposes?

Mr. CRISP. Yes. Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. JONES. Was it the intention of the committee, under the general terms of the original bill, to exempt industries that used oil, and compel the farmers, who use oil on their tractors, and others, to pay 4 cents a gallon?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a question I can not answer. Mr. JONES. That does not seem to me like a fair proposition as the committee had worked it out.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a problem I did not have under consideration.

Mr. JONES. Industry would pay only 21/4 per cent and the farmers would pay the full rate for the use of oil on their tractors, of which rate the gentleman is now com-

Mr. McCORMACK. That is correct. I agree with the gentleman. He is absolutely correct.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Would the gentleman not say that the farmer who used a tractor is just as much engaged in industry as a man who drives a truck or runs a machine?

Mr. McCORMACK. I think he should be exempted, because one way of helping the farmer is to put as little tax on him as possible. That is the position I have always maintained.

Mr. JONES. I have an amendment which I expect to offer to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. McCORMACK. I will support the gentleman's amendment if he will incorporate the proposition which I made in his amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Schafer: Strike out subsection 2 of the Crisp amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, in five minutes it is impossible to scratch the surface in presenting facts in favor of this amendment. It is unfortunate that under the parliamentary situation more than five minutes can not be obtained. If you go through the printed hearings of the Ways and Means Committee and the committee report, you will not find one word of testimony justifying this iniquitous sales tax of 30 per cent on malt sirups. If you go through the debates on the floor of the House on the tax bill, you will not find one statement by any member of the Ways and Means Committee justifying this iniquitous tax.

I yield now and challenge any member of the Ways and Means Committee or any Member of the House to rise and name one particular thing that brewers' wort can be used for except to make wildcat beer containing much more than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol in the alley breweries. [After a pause.] Not one Member of this House responds, and yet we are asked to legalize the Capone and other wildcat breweries, in direct contravention of the Volstead Act.

Section 18, title 2, national prohibition act, provides:

It shall be unlawful to advertise, manufacture, sell, or possess for sale, any utensils, contrivances, machine, preparation, compound, tablet, substance, formula direction, recipe, advertised, designed, or intended for use in the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor.

Title II, section 25, of the national prohibition act provides:

It shall be unlawful to have or possess any liquor or property designed for the manufacture of liquor intended for use in violatthis title, or which has been so used, and no property rights shall exist in any such liquor or property. A search warrant may issue as provided in Title II of the Public Laws No. 24 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, approved June 15, 1917, and such liquor, the containers thereof, and such property so seized shall be subject to such disposition as the court may make thereof.

If the above sections are applicable to or prohibit the manufacture and possession of any material or substance, surely they prohibit the manufacture and sale of brewer's wort, which, as its name implies, is a product designed and intended solely for the manufacture of beer. During the past 30 days, 60 persons were indicted by a Federal grand jury at Detroit, Mich., for conspiracy to violate the provisions of the national prohibition act, in that they manufactured and sold wort to alley brewers for use in the illegal manufacture of intoxicating beer.

It is rather difficult for me, a wet, to have to call this to the attention of the dry Members of the House, but I am one of those Members of Congress who are in favor of legalizing 2.75 per cent beer for consumption in the homes and not in favor in legalizing 14 or 15 per cent bootleg beer manufactured in alley breweries by the wildcat brewery industry—the Capone gangsters and other racketeers.

The common people, the poor and lowly, do not have the funds to purchase this wildcat beer at 50 and 75 cents a bottle. My amendment also strikes out the indefensible 30 per cent sales tax on malt sirups. Oh, the committee at this late day now proposes to exempt malt sirups sold to large baking establishments. However, when the small bakers who can not purchase in large quantities and the housewife who wants to make bread or gingerbread or who wants to bake beans or follow the hundreds of recipes contained in these two books which I hold in my hand desire to purchase malt sirups produced from the American farmers' grain, they have to pay a manufacturers' sales tax of 30 per cent.

If they want to buy this powdered malt produced from grain grown on American farms, to mix with milk produced on American farms to make malted milk for children in the homes, the poor people will have to pay a 30 per cent sales tax on it. If the poor man wants to buy a can of this malt to make a healthful, nonintoxicating beverage in his home, he will have to pay a 30 per cent sales tax on it because he is a home-brewer.

I call upon all of you who opposed the 21/4 per cent general sales tax, I call upon all of you wets who are opposed to Congress legalizing the Capone wildcat breweries brewing 14 per cent beer in violation of the prohibition law and in favor of legalizing a good wholesome beer, I call upon all you drys who are opposed to even a little more than one-half of 1 per cent legal beer, in the name of justice, in the name of equity, in the name of fairness, to vote for my amendment to strike this vicious, un-American 30 per cent sales tax and wort tax provision which is embodied in the Crisp amendment, particularly in view of the fact that no evidence whatever has been placed before you to justify its passage.

It is said that much of this malt sirup is used for homebrew, and some Members take the position that this fact justifies the 30 per cent tax on the class of malt sirup as contained in the exhibit which I now hold in my hand. In making home-brew you use sugar and yeast and, for some, use a few potatoes, also. Are you, therefore, in favor of placing a 30 per cent sales tax on all sugar, yeast, and potatoes? Corn sugar and corn sirup are used extensively in the illegal manufacture of distilled liquors. Millions and millions of pounds of it are thus used. Are you, therefore, in favor of putting a 30 per cent sales tax on all the corn sugar and sirup used in America because some of the racketeers are using it to make illegally distilled liquors?

Rye, corn, and other grains are used by the million bushels for the illegal manufacture of distilled liquors. Are you, therefore, in favor of placing a 30 per cent sales tax on all of these grains used in America?

Charcoal and barrels are used to a great extent in manufacturing illegal liquors. Are you, therefore, in favor of placing a 30 per cent sales tax on all charcoal and barrels used in America?

This kind of malt sirup, while used by home-brewers, is also used in the making of the hundreds of food products contained in the cookbook which I hold in the same hand. It is also used in the manufacture of textiles and by the drug industry, as well as in the manufacture of breakfast foods and cereals.

Now, my friends, let us approach this vote as a matter of principle, neither wet nor dry. By adopting my amendment you will strike out a provision which has not been defended by any member of the Ways and Means Committee, upon which there is no testimony in the committee report, and upon which there is no testimony in the printed committee hearings.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The other day you voted against taxing beer. I am going to ask you to be consistent. I want to call the attention of the drys to the fact that in this bill taxing malt, grape concentrate, and wort you are doing the very thing asked for in the beer tax bill. The thing you are doing here in taxing wort and malt is merely to create a method to recognize an illegal act. I am now throwing it back to you with the statement that this can of malt extract I hold is nothing more than just about 5 gallons of beer concentrated. I am saying that this can of malt, brought here by the gentleman from Wisconsin, gives to the American people 5 gallons of condensed beer. All that is necessary to make beer out of it is to add a little water and a cake of yeast.

Now, as regards wort. I congratulate the gentleman from Michigan on their showing in that State. Delivery wagons drive up to these wildcat breweries, fill their cans with wort, take them out into the alleys, and make deliveries in the nighttime. Everything is perfectly legal up to that point. Then the alley speakeasy owner runs out with his 5-gallon can, turns the spigot, looks around to see if there is a snooper abroad, runs back to his speakeasy, drops in a cake of yeast, and sells it to the gullible public at 50 cents a quart. I know this will be a means of revenue if it is taxed, but I am not for it. I believe we should be consistent. How can you go before the people of this country and tell them you are opposed to the taxing of beer if it is manufactured in a scientific way when you turn around and say you are going to furnish every home and every housewife with a tin of malt from which, through the use of a cake of yeast and plenty of water from the faucet, they can make a product that you gentlemen are afraid to tax? I hope you drys will keep malt, wort, and grape concentrate in this tax bill, because you will get revenue from this source and you will also make yourselves the laughing stock of the Nation.

What about this grape concentrate you are going to tax? What are you going to make out of it? Nothing but wine. What are you going to do with this wort? You are going to use it for nothing else but beer. That is the only use it has. If you can get by with it with the public, I am going to congratulate you. But as one opposed to such fanatical construction, I want you drys to go out to the country and tell them you are taxing grape concentrate, which is wine condensed, and malt, which is beer in its condensed form. I am opposed to this tax, and I rose in opposition in order to be permitted under the rules of the House to speak on this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Schafer) there were—ayes 20, noes 74.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers. Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Knurson: At the end of the Crisp amendment insert as a new paragraph the following:

"An import tax of 1 cent per pound shall be levied on the metallic manganese content of all imports into the United States of manganese ore (including ferruginous manganese ore) or concentrates, and manganiferous iron ore, all the foregoing containing in excess of 10 per cent of metallic manganese; and an import tax of 1% cents per pound shall be levied on the metallic manganese content of all imports into the United States of manganese metal, manganese silicon, ferromanganese, and spiegeleisen.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am safe in saying that this is one of the most important amendments to be offered to the pending bill.

Manganese is found in 35 States of the Union and is being actively mined in 15. If the amendment now pending before the House is adopted, it will serve not only to raise $6,250,000 in revenue but revive an industry that is practically dormant for lack of adequate protection. The rate of 1 cent per pound would mean an increase of only 16 cents per ton in the cost of steel, consequently no one can raise the point against the amendment that it amounts to an embargo.

Russia is laying down manganese ore in this country at the present time at something like $2.05 a ton. It costs about that to take the ore out of the ground in this country, and then you have the local taxes, cost of transportation, and other items to add to it, bringing the total cost of American-produced manganese up to about $4.08. We know that if we can secure the adoption of this amendment it will just about equalize the difference in cost of production in foreign countries and at home. At the present time the manganese industry is practically down and out, and thousands of miners who have heretofore been employed in the industry are now walking the streets looking for other work.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am curious to know how much manganese is imported.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. Five hundred and two thousand tons of manganese were imported last year, an increase of 215,000 tons, or 339 per cent over the previous year. This amendment would bring in $6,250,000 in revenue and revivify a dying industry.

Mr. MANLOVE. If the gentleman will permit, I would also like to inform the gentleman that this is one product that America had to put an immense profit on in order that we might mine it and meet the necessity for it during the period of the war.

Mr. KNUTSON. Bearing right on that point, let me read an extract from a letter recently written by one of the Assistant Secretaries of War:

The question of assuring during war time an adequate supply of manganese cre to maintain the production of the steel industry at the rate demanded by any military program is one that has received much thought in the War Department. This question resolves itself into a situation in which foreign sources of this ore are denied to this country and reliance must be placed on domestic or near-by producers.

In view of the dependence of the military requirements upon steel products and of the supreme importance of manganese in the making of sound steel, it is deemed essential to have available at the beginning of a major war a domestic or near-by operating source of manganese ore.

To create such an operating source during peace time the producers must have a market for their output. It is therefore suggested that you bring to the attention of the members of the institute who are consumers of manganese ore the viewpoint of the War Department, and its hope that the domestic and Cuban projects may possess sufficient merit to warrant their assistance in ercouraging the development during peace time of these sources of manganese supply for war-time needs.

The purpose of my amendment is not only to provide work for the unemployed manganese workers but also to assure this country a dependable supply of manganese in time of emergency, and I am going to appeal to this House, with all the fervor at my command, to adopt the amendment, because I assure you, gentlemen, no matter from what angle you may view it, this is one of the most meritorious amendments that has yet been offered to the pending bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope this amendment will not be adopted. I happen to have manganese in my State, and I have just talked with Judge Crisp, and he has it in his State. Various Members have manganese in their States, but, gentlemen, there was not a single line of testimony produced in our committee upon this proposition.

You must stop and think about it when you put in a rate here that you do not know whether it is a prohibitive, a protective, or merely a revenue-producing rate.

Take the oil illustration, for instance. Last year before our committee the oil people came in there and asked for a protective tariff for their industry. There was not a single suggestion that the rate should be less than 2 cents a gallon, or 84 cents a barrel, and so in order to make the rate a revenue producer, and not put it under the ban of a protective tariff or a prohibitive tariff, after a long investigation and after hearing many witnesses, the committee was able to determine that 1 cent a gallon on oil would be a fair revenue measure.

Now, you come in here and ask for a tax on manganese. Who is there here except the proponent of this amendment that is able to tell what is a reasonable tax or what is a protective tariff or what is a prohibitive tariff upon this item of industry. Then, in addition to this, you all know that in placing a tariff on one of these items you have to pay some attention to its relationship to other articles of industry.

We placed a tax on copper. We thought we could raise some funds that way. The next day, upon investigation, we found that the subject was complicated with other industrial articles—we found that it affected 38 tariff schedules.

Now, on the subject of manganese, it affects the steel products of this country. Do you think that in 10 minutes' discussion on the floor of this House you are able to put an adequate tax or tariff, whatever you call it, on manganese and compensatory rates on other articles that it affects? Why, such a suggestion does not approach the dignity of good nonsense. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I want to say to the gentleman that the compensatory taxes are taken care of in another

Mr. RAGON. Yes; the compensatory taxes that you gentlemen from Minnesota and South Dakota want; but are they the compensatory duties that the House wants to put on this schedule?

Mr. KNUTSON. It only amounts to 16 cents a ton on steel.

Mr. RAGON. Why do you gentlemen not allow the committee to say what it amounts to; why did not you come before the committee, as the oil people did, and give these facts?

Mr. KNUTSON. Because we were not given the oppor-

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLIVER of Alabama). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Knurson) there were 56 ayes and 85 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out paragraph 1 of the Crisp amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BANKHEAD). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would like to ask the Chair if the 25 minutes' time agreed upon is not exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. JONES. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. Will it be in order for a perfecting amendment to be offered before the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to offer a perfecting amendment to paragraph 1?

Mr. JONES. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Jones: In line 1 of subdivision 1 of the Crisp amendment, after the word "oils," insert the following: "except when used for farm tractors, or for other agricultural or industrial purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Jones) there were 45 ayes and 97 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I object, and I make the point of order that all time has been exhausted under the agreement entered into with the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote now comes upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Christopherson], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Christopherson: Add a new paragraph to the Crisp amendment to read as follows: "Butter, 22 cents per pound."

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote now comes upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Johnson], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Johnson of Washington: On page 228, after the Crisp amendment, insert a new paragraph, as follows: "All goods, wares, or articles of merchandise produced, mined, or manufactured wholly or in part by labor subject to penal sanctions or disabilities for refusal or failure to work at the behest of any foreign monopoly or state trust, imported into the United States, 100 per cent of the American wholesale value as of the date of passage of this act; but no article described in this paragraph shall be exempted upon importation from tax under this title as an article for further manufacture, and no credit or refund of tax imposed upon the importation of any article described in this paragraph shall be allowed under section 605 (a)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment. The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Johnson of Washington) there were—ayes 27, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Stafford) there were—ayes 185, noes 14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Bankhead, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill for 1932, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Beck (at the request of Mr. Darrow), for one week, on account of important business.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record upon the subject of Muscle Shoals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues of the House of Representatives, there is no proposition which will come before this Congress of greater interest or importance to the farmers of the Southland, and, in fact, to the farmers of the Nation as a whole, than the new bill on Muscle Shoals, which was, by a vote of 13 to 8, reported to the House on Thursday by the Military Affairs Committee. This is really a matter of vital importance. We have seen several bills providing for the leasing of this great project put through the House of Representatives. We have seen other bills pass the Senate. We have seen conferences between the two branches of Congress agree upon conference reports, and twice we have seen bills providing for the disposition of Muscle Shoals reach the White House, where both received a presidential veto.

We well realize that it is a very difficult matter for many conflicting opinions to agree on all the details connected with the disposition of such extensive and vast properties as are included in the great Muscle Shoals project. However, we now come again to the Congress with another bill and with renewed hope.

SOME EXPERIENCES OF THE PAST

In the past we have heard much testimony from people who would not like to see the nitrates plants at Muscle Shoals operated at all to the effect that fertilizer could not be produced there. We have always felt confident that such testimony was incorrect and misleading, and now we have the benefit of the study which has been given to the proposition by the joint commission appointed by the Governors of Alabama and Tennessee. And that commission in its report confirms in positive manner the contention which we have made all these years that fertilizer for the impoverished farm lands of our country can be produced at Muscle Shoals, and that the price of fertilizer can thereby be materially reduced

Efforts to bring about the leasing of the Muscle Shoals project to some private enterprise with sufficient financial responsibility have been made over a period of years. Stiff opposition has been encountered every step of the way. We have had to fight the influence of the National Fertilizer Association of the United States, sometimes referred to as the Fertilizer Trust, and from the extensive testimony offered by the representative of the National Fertilizer Association just recently before the Military Affairs Committee, I take it that we may consider ourselves forewarned that we may as well again expect the opposition of the same interests which have heretofore fought this proposition. When the Government first sought a contract for a lease for the entire Muscle Shoals project the power people, and the Alabama Power Co. in particular, expressed themselves as not being interested in the proposition and declared that the great nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals were of no value except as " junk.'

However, when Henry Ford put in his bid for a lease contract on Muscle Shoals the project then became very valuable overnight, and the influence of the power company was immediately thrown full force against the Ford offer on Muscle Shoals. This was evident from the very beginning, and, under date of Friday, September 22, 1922, I stated to this House that the propagandists of the Fertilizer Trust, the Aluminum Trust, and the Power Trust had undertaken to poison the public mind by calling the Ford proposal a "fraud." I stated further that the farmers of every agricultural section of the United States have told us in unmistakable terms that they were unanimously in favor of the approval of a contract between the Government and Henry Ford, and that the agricultural organizations of the country had made very exhaustive investigation of the whole subject and that they had faith in Ford's ability and preparedness to handle this tremendous development. The people believed that Henry Ford had the proper inclination with regard to the operation of the nitrate plants for the production of cheaper fertilizer, and that he would not exploit the consumer.

No final action was taken on the matter in 1922, and during the next long session of Congress, in the spring of 1924, we found the Muscle Shoals problem still unsolved, and we found that the Ford offer was still pending before the Congress.

THE BIDS OF THE COMBINED POWER COMPANIES

At that time there was presented a proposal from the combined power interests of Alabama and Tennessee. The proposal of the power people was in two parts, or two separate propositions, one proposition being a bid for a contract on the power development at Muscle Shoals, and the other part of their proposal was a bid for a contract on the nitrate plants. Their proposals were not all in one bid, as was the Ford proposal, but were divided. Both proposals of the power companies were signed by the same three companies namely, the Tennessee Electric Power Co., the Memphis Power & Light Co., and the Alabama Power Co.; but they refused to make one complete bid for a contract on the whole Muscle Shoals project, including both the great power development and the nitrate plants.

Of course, they pointed out they would have an interlocking directorate but still they wanted the two features of the Muscle Shoals project-(1) the power development. and (2) the nitrate plants-kept separate, so far as their proposal was concerned. Their plan was a smooth one, but it was very easy to see through it. If they could have gained possession of the entire Muscle Shoals project under that sort of a dual arrangement with divided responsibility, it would have been a simple matter for them to have later forfeited the contract on the nitrate plants by simply failing to operate them successfully, and then the Government would have been compelled to take back the nitrate plants. while the power companies, under their other contract on the power development, would have been in position to hold that end of the project, thus gaining possession of the thing which they were really after, namely, the power development at Muscle Shoals, and turning back to the Government the fertilizer plants. But our citizens were not fooled, the farmers of our country were not fooled, the working people were not fooled, and a storm of protest was immediately heard against this attempt by that combination of the power interests of the South to grab the great water-power development at Muscle Shoals.

In my speech on the floor of the House on March 8, 1924, when we were approaching a vote on the proposition I stated, in part, as follows:

I believe that it is undeniable that the Ford offer has been, and is now, the only comprehensive and all-inclusive offer that has yet been made to the Government. Other proposals that have been made would split the great project by means of separate offers for the water-power project and for the nitrate plants. In my opinion, it would be a very serious and fatal mistake to split the project. The first and foremost and primary objects of the power development at Muscle Shoals are that we have a supply of nitrate for national defense in time of war and nitrate for fertilizer in peace time, and it appears to me that the nitrate plants should be linked inseparably with the water-power development under some reliable contract. Will Congress ignore the prayer of the people and give way to the powerful pressure of the influence of the Fertilizer Trust, Aluminum Trust, and power monopoly? I believe not. Nearly two years ago I stated that I was in favor of the approval by Congress of the Ford proposal. I believe that the House is now about to go on record in that way, and I am glad that the House at last has that opportunity before it.

In support of their effort to secure control of Muscle Shoals under their double-barreled proposition, and in their effort to block favorable consideration on the Ford proposal the Tennessee Electric Power Co. and the Alabama Power Co. sent their representatives to Washington to appear before the Military Affairs Committee of the House, and many other witnesses suddenly appeared here on the scene at the same time to testify against the Ford proposal and in favor of the power companies. These witnesses were very closely cross-questioned by members of the Military Affairs Committee. The members of that committee, having had such long experience with the Muscle Shoals problem, were naturally curious to find out what was the real reason behind the sudden appearance in Washington of this group of witnesses, and their questions to those witnesses brought out some very interesting and illuminating information.

THE TESTIMONY OF MR. HUNT FRASIER, OF SELMA, ALA.

One of those witnesses was Mr. Hunt Frasier, the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Selma, Ala., and I cite his case particularly since Selma is one of the cities located in the congressional district which I have the honor to rep-

In the course of his testimony, Mr. Frasier claimed that he came to Washington as the representative of the Chamber of Commerce of Selma, Ala., and at first he stated positively, as the following record of his testimony clearly shows, that the whole membership of the Selma Chamber of Commerce at a meeting had instructed him to appear here, and then, under the direct questions of Mr. McSwain, of South Carolina, a member of the committee, he was forced to admit the incorrectness of his statement that he came here by the direction of the membership of the Selma Chamber of Commerce, and he then said that he came here under the instructions of some of the directors; and at the same time it was brought out in the testimony that one of the directors of the Selma Chamber of Commerce, Mr. E. C. Melvin, who sent him to Washington to testify, is also one of the directors of the Alabama Power Co.

Another claim made by Mr. Frasier was that he did not come to Washington to testify in behalf of the Alabama Power Co., but in spite of his statements it was very apparent to the members of the Military Affairs Committee that Mr. Frasier was against the Ford offer and in favor of the proposal of the Alabama Power Co., and finally one of the members of the committee, Hon, LISTER HILL, of Alabama, noticed that the notes from which Mr. Frasier was reading while giving his testimony were on the stationery of the Washington Hotel, Washington, D. C., and by closely questioning Mr. Frasier on that point Congressman Hill developed the very telling evidence that Mr. Frasier had arrived in Washington on the morning of the day on which he appeared before the Military Affairs Committee, and that the first and only thing Mr. Frasier did after he got off the train in Washington and before he made his appearance before the Military Affairs Committee was to proceed at once to the Washington Hotel and go straight to the rooms of Mr. Thomas Martin, president of the Alabama Power Co., and there on the stationery of the Washington Hotel, under the direction of the president of the Alabama Power Co. and the lawyer of the Alabama Power Co., the notes were prepared which Mr. Frasier later read as the basis of his testimony before the Military Affairs Committee. I quote from Mr. Frasier's testimony, as follows:

Mr. FR ISIER. I am secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Selma, Ala.; I am also manager of and principally interested in one of the largest farming interests in Dallas County. I am also a member of the Farm Bureau Federation, although I am at this time not speaking for the Farm Bureau Federation. I am expressing my own views, so far as that organization is concerned.

I must say that it was very fitting that Mr. Frasier stated that he was expressing his own views, in so far as the Farm Bureau Federation was concerned, because he knew very well, of course, that the Farm Bureau Federation, as well as our farmers who were not affiliated with the Farm Bureau Federation, were practically unanimous in their support of the Ford offer for Muscle Shoals, and that our farmers were very strongly opposed to turning Muscle Shoals over to the Alabama Power Co. or to the combination of the power companies of Alabama and Tennessee. He said he was a member of the Farm Bureau Federation, but, of course, he knew he was not representing their views . and feelings, nor the views of our farmers generally.

Here follows the cross-questioning of Mr. Frasier by Congressman McSwain, of South Carolina, and Congressman LISTER HILL, of Alabama, to which I have called your

Mr. McSwain. Do you represent yourself or your chamber of commerce?

Mr. Frasier. I represent the chamber of commerce, sir.
Mr. McSwain. Now, did the members of the chamber of commerce, as a chamber of commerce, take any action on this?

Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir. Mr. McSwain. When did the members of the chamber of commerce take action? That is, when did the hoi polloi of the members meet and take action?

Mr. Frasier. They met right recently. Mr. McSwain. What was the date of that? Mr. Frasier. The latter part of last week.

Mr. Frasier. The latter part of last week?
Mr. McSwain. The latter part of last week?
Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.
Mr. McSwain. Not merely the directors, but all the members?
Mr. Frasier. The directors met.
Mr. McSwain. I asked you if the individual members of the chamber of commerce met.
Mr. Frasier. The directors met.

Mr. McSwain. The directors met? Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir. Mr. McSwain. Not the individuals?

Mr. Frasier. Not the individuals, no, sir. Mr. Hill of Alabama. Is Mr. Melvin a member of your board?

Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. He was present? Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. He is a member of the board of directors of the Alabama Power Co.?

Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.
Mr. Hill of Alabama. Do you know when Mr. Melvin was made a member of the board of directors of the Alabama Power Co.?

Mr. FRASIER. No; I do not.

Mr. Frasier. No. 1 do not.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. It has been a recent date, has it not?

Mr. Frasier. Probably five or six months, I think.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. Mr. Melvin was made a member of the board of directors of the Alabama Power Co. five or six months

Mr. Hill of Alabama. You recognize this fact, so far as that State is concerned, the Alabama Power Co. has gone down there and endeavored to get influential men like Mr. Melvin with them, has it not? Has not that been the policy?

Mr. Frasier, I do not know if that is their policy. Possibly it is not unlike Ford's in that respect.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. They have done that thing, have they not?

Mr. Frasier. They have got Mr. Melvin. I do not know the policy.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. I have been interested in what you have Mr. Hill of Alabama. I have been interest in any par-ticular offer. I have been interested in this paper you have. On the back is the name of the Washington Hotel. I take it that you titular older. I have been interested in this paper you have. On the back is the name of the Washington Hotel. I take it that you are at the Washington Hotel?

Mr. Frasier, That is the Washington Hotel.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. Did you get this paper at the Washington

Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.
Mr. Hill of Alabama. You got it there this morning?
Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.
Mr. Hill of Alabama. Who gave you that paper, if I may ask, as a matter of interest to me? Mr. Frasier. I got that paper out of the room of Mr. Tom

Martin

MARTIN.

Mr. Hill of Alabama, Tom Martin?

Mr. Frasier, Yes, sir.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. In other words, I judge the first thing you did this morning when you got to Washington was to go to the room of Tom Martin, president of the Alabama Power Co., at Washington Hotel?

Mr. Frasier. Yes; that was the first thing.
Mr. Hill of Alabama. That was the first thing of any importance?

Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.
Mr. Hill of Alabama. He then provided you with this paper, and you went and sat down and worked out, you and he, these notes to be the substance of your testimony before this committee?

Mr. Frasier. I went over some of those things with Mr. Martin;

yes.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. You went over them with him as soon as you got there, and he is a representative of the power company?

Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. And you also talked to Mr. Thompson, who is the lawyer for the company?

Mr. Frasier. Yes.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. You held a conference at the Washington Hotel and wrote out the substance of what you should testify to before this committee?

Mr. FRASIER, Yes, sir.

Mr. Hill of Alabama, That is a fact? Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir. Will you read that last question? Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir. Will y The reporter read as follows:

"Mr. Hill of Alabama. You held a conference at the Washington Hotel and wrote out the substance of what you should testify to before this committee?

"Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir.
"Mr. Hill of Alabama. That is a fact?
"Mr. Frasier. Yes, sir."
Mr. Frasier. I beg to amend that. These things were things I had worked out myself; practically everything on there I worked out myself on the train coming up, and they were gone over with Mr. Tom Martin.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. You discussed those things you worked out with Mr. Martin, a lot of those things on that paper, which you used as the basis of your testimony. You made them out at the room at the hotel?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. Hill of Alabama. In the room of Tom Martin in the Washington Hotel?

Mr. FRASIER. Yes, sir.

Now, there you have samples of the duplicity of that witness, Mr. Hunt Frasier, secretary of the chamber of commerce from Selma, Ala. There is the picture; you can see it for yourself. You can see Mr. Frasier leaving Selma, Ala., at the instance of Mr. E. C. Melvin, a director of the Alabama Power Co., and coming to Washington, and then the first thing he did upon his arrival in Washington was to report immediately to the rooms of Mr. Thomas Martin, president of the Alabama Power Co., to receive his instructions regarding what he should testify before the congressional committee. Can you see any connection with the Alabama Power Co. there? And yet, Mr. Frasier appeared before the Military Affairs Committee and pretended that he had no connection in any way, shape, form, or fashion with the Alabama Power Co.; and, be it remembered that he also attempted to give the impression that the entire membership of the Selma Chamber of Commerce acted in sending him to Washington, and made a positive statement to that effect, and then, under the pressure of close examination by Mr. McSwain, a member of the committee, he was forced to confess that the membership of the chamber of commerce had not met or acted on the proposition at all, but only some of the directors had instructed him to come to Washington to appear before the committee, and one of those directors who instructed him was also one of the directors of the Alabama Power Co.

I am glad to say that the testimony of Mr. Frasier and the other witnesses who came to Washington to fight against the Ford proposal for Muscle Shoals had no effect upon the membership of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, or upon the House of Representatives, and on March 10, 1924, the bill which embraced the Ford proposal was passed in the House by a vote of 227 to 142; and I am also glad to be able to state that all 10 members of the Alabama delegation in the House of Representatives stood unanimously against the effort of the Alabama Power Co. and the other power companies associated with it to take control of that last great water-power resource in the State of Alabama. Although we were able to pass the Ford proposal in the House it was blocked in the Senate, and so it never became effective. The loss of the Ford contract for the operation of Muscle Shoals for the express purpose of producing fertilizer was the saddest and most bitter blow which has been suffered by the farmers of the South. If Muscle Shoals had been put into operation under the Ford proposal, our farmers would have been better off by millions of dollars by reason of the cheaper price of fertilizer which we believe would have been brought about. They would have been receiving these benefits for the past eight years or more.

LOOKING TO THE FUTURE-THE NEW BILL BEFORE US

As I stated in the beginning, we now have before us a new bill providing for the leasing of Muscle Shoals if a proper offer can be secured. The Muscle Shoals Commission has given us their opinion, as the result of their research and study, that fertilizer can be produced at Muscle Shoals.

and that a cheaper price on fertilizer can be brought about. I hope we can pass this bill and then, when it is passed, we must bend our best efforts to secure the operation of that great project under a leasing contract with some responsible agency that will guarantee the production of fertilizer that can be sold at a price that will be a great saving to the pocketbooks of our farmers, and that may be expected to produce direct beneficial result in the improvement of the impoverished farm lands of the South.

In fairness to the Alabama Power Co., I want to say that I have no feeling whatever against that great corporation as such, or against people who are connected with it. The statements which I have made are based upon the record which shows what has happened in the past. I do not believe it would be for the general welfare of the State of Alabama, or of the southeastern section of the United States, for that last great water-power development at Muscle Shoals to fall into the hands of the Alabama Power Co., or of the combination of the power companies of Tennessee and Alabama. That is simply a statement of policy regarding this great governmental project at Muscle Shoals.

The experience of the past teaches us that we must be alert and on guard in the future regarding this proposition. I honestly feel that it will be for the best interests of our State and Nation that we guard against the contingency of the hydroelectric power development at Muscle Shoals falling into the hands of the power companies. If they secure control at Muscle Shoals it is easy to see that they will have a complete monopoly on all water-power resources in the entire southeastern section of our country, and thus they will have an absolute stranglehold on consumers of power in the South; and there will be no production, in any form, of fertilizer to rehabilitate the washed-out and cotton-poor farm lands of our country.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing a resolution by the Democratic committee of my State and a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Lake City, Fla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GREEN. I will state that the petition is for additional beds at the veterans' hospital at Lake City, Fla.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest the gentleman incorporate that in his own remarks rather than by invading the rule. I object.

IDLE GOLD

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the President and the Secretary of the Treasury know what will restore business conditions, but they are not favorable to the plan because it is alleged to be against the interest of the ultrarich.

The failure of the bondholding class, who have charge of our currency system, to permit the use of the idle gold in the Treasury is the cause of our troubles.

INFLATION NEEDED

The velocity of money and credits is about one-half what it was three years ago. There is only one way to make up for the lack of velocity and that is to increase the volume of money. The public welfare will be promoted by such a move. If the volume of money is increased, commodity values will rise. Farmers will get a better price for their products; they already have consuming power, and this will give them purchasing power; factories will supply their needs, which will put labor to work.

There is one way that the currency can be inflated by placing money in every nook and corner of America without paying a dole or bonus but by paying a debt.

VETERANS CAN BE PAID WITHOUT BOND ISSUE

The remainder of $2,200,000,000 due 3,660,000 veterans of the World War on their adjusted-service certificates can be paid without a bond issue, without increasing taxes, without additional interest charges, and save the Government annual payment of more than $112,000,000 until 1945, in addition to abolishing a Government bureau, which will save the people tens of millions of dollars.

If not paid now, practically all the remainder due a veteran who has borrowed on his certificate will be consumed by compound interest paid to banks and the Government. The veterans and the country need this money now.

THAW OUT FROZEN ASSETS

This money can be paid by the issuance of United States notes. We have $346,000,000 of these notes outstanding now which are backed by 40 per cent gold. We have sufficient idle gold to back the $2,200,000,000 in a similar manner. The result of this operation will be to convert a Government noncirculating obligation into a Government circulating

The issuance of this additional currency will not affect the gold standard; we will still have more than a 40 per cent base; in fact, we need two and one-half billion dollars of gold to stabilize our currency, and we have four and onehalf billion dollars in gold.

BONDHOLDERS' SELF-OPPOSITION

The holders of bonds that were voted by the people to build roads, schoolhouses, and to make other public improvement when one bale of cotton would pay $100 on the bonds do not want the currency inflated, because they are now getting four bales of cotton for a $100 payment; this is equal to increasing the interest and the bonds four times. The same illustration can be applied to other commodities and

THE BECK-LINTHICUM RESOLUTION

Mr. MAJOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the so-called Beck-Linthicum resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAJOR. Mr. Speaker, I have received a letter from the Rev. George B. Safford, State superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Illinois, concerning my vote on the so-called Beck-Linthicum resolution, and to that letter I have replied as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 24, 1932.

Rev. George B. SAFFORD,

State Superintendent Anti-Saloon League of Illinois

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Mr. Safford: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 16, in which you state, among other things, the following:
"In the newspaper report of the vote yesterday upon the BeckLinthicum resolution your name appeared in the list of those who voted for the submission of this resolution. I am writing to inquire if we are to interpret this as indicating a change in your attitude toward prohibition?"

attitude toward prohibition?"

I am glad to reply to you that it does not. I was not a Member of Congress at the time of the submission of the eighteenth amendment, but it has always been my belief that a mistake was made in trying to regulate the customs and habits of people by constitutional amendment, and that it is a matter which should be regulated by the several States.

Prohibition has been designated by one in high authority as "an experiment noble in purpose"; and it might be truthfully added that 12 years have demonstrated that it is the most expensive and unsatisfactory experiment ever undertaken in this country. Nevertheless, when I was first elected to Congress in 1922 I sive and unsatisfactory experiment ever undertaken in this country. Nevertheless, when I was first elected to Congress in 1922 I believed it my duty to do what I could in seeing that this "noble experiment" should have a fair and honest trial. Acting on that theory I have consistently voted for all appropriation bills making provision for its enforcement, even going so far as to vote for what has often been termed "the notorious Jones bill," so that it could be truthfully said that those in charge of its enforcement might have every opportunity to prove the wisdom of national prohibition. prohibition.

I quote another paragraph from your letter, as follows: "I realize that one might have voted for submitting that resolution and still be a dry, having in mind the idea that a vote upon the question was desirable. However, as it stands now, it seems to indicate a change of attitude."

It is inconceivable to me in view of the situation existing to-day, with the widespread dissatisfaction with the law, with its almost complete repudiation in many of the larger cities and various parts of the country, that any Member of the House, whether he be labeled wet or dry, should refuse to again submit this very controversial question to the people for their approval or disapproval. You have asked me the question if I have changed my attitude, and in reply I desire to inquire why you have changed your attitude. And that you may be sure what the attitude of the Anti-Saloon League was in times gone by I desire to quote in full an editorial, lengthy as it is, from the American Issue, the official publication of your organization, which appeared in January, 1915, entitled "Advice to United States Senators and Congressmen," as follows:

ary, 1915, entitled Advice to Chief States of the Members of both branches of our National Congress, which will convene in Washington in December next, to vote as early in the session as possible to submit to the States for their ratification or rejection the proposed constitutional amendment providing for the national prohibition of the liquor traffic.

"First. Because its submission is requested by more citizens of the Nation than have petitioned for the passage of all the amendments combined that have heretofore been submitted and adopted.

Second, Because it is unjust for the representatives of the people who compose Congress to thwart the will of the people thus expressed, when it is the only means permitted by the Constitution itself for the people in the various States to consider constitutional amendments.
"Third. Because men are elected to Congress to represent and to do the will of the majority of the people, when that will is known. Congressmen should be servants and not masters of the people whom they were elected to serve.

"Fourth. A Congressman's vote to submit this amendment to the State does not commit him to support the amendment when the State does not commit him to support the amendment when its ratification shall come up for consideration, nor mean that he favors prohibition.

"Fifth. The one question for Congress to decide is, Do the people of the States desire to vote upon this proposed amendment? The issue is democracy—the people's right to rule. Can not Congress trust this amendment to the people?

"Sixth. It would be expedient for Congress to vote to submit this amendment to the States, in order to eliminate the liquor question from consideration when its Members are candidates for election.

"Seventh. It would be expedient for Members of Congress as soon as possible to submit this amendment in order to clear the congressional calendar of this question that is, to many, so embarrassing and enable them to employ their time in considering other questions of statecraft, for the liquor question will be kept to the front in Congress until this proposed prohibitory amendment has been submitted.

"Eighth. It would be expedient for Congress to submit this proposed amendment this winter, to remove, if possible, the question as an issue before the national conventions of the great "Ninth. The liquor question will continue to embarrass with greater intensity every national politician and every candidate for President, United States Senator and Representative in Congress, until this issue has been removed from national consideration by its submission to the States.

"Tenth. When this proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution has been once submitted by Congress to the States, the question will then become an issue in the States, will enter into the election of members of State legislatures, and be before each the election of members of State legislatures, and be before each legislature for ratification or rejection.

"Eleventh. For a Member of Congress to vote against the submission of this amendment when 6,000,000 people have petitioned for its submission is a public declaration that he is a better representative of the liquor traffic, a great corrupt special interest, than he is of the people of this Republic; or a manifestation of the fact that he is a morally afreid of the political influence of the fact that he is so morally afraid of the political influence of the liquor traffic that he lacks the courage to do his duty.

"Let our readers make it plain to their Congressmen and Senators that they are expected to vote for the submission of this proposed amendment and wear the badge of a freeman or stand branded a slave bound in the shackles of political bondage and wearing the brewers' and distillers' collar.

"Elect to Congress a man, not a vassal nor a chattel."

Notwither and the lacks the Courses a man, not a vassal nor a chattel."

"Elect to Congress a man, not a vassal nor a chattel."
Notwithstanding your attitude in 1915, as above expressed, you have now boldly threatened the political annihilation of any Member of Congress who votes contrary to your command, and who believes now, as you believed then, that the people have the right to express themselves upon this issue. If the people were entitled to express themselves upon the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, there certainly is no reason why they are not how entitled to express themselves upon a proposed change of the eighteenth amendment or even its repeal. If it was good logic in 1915, as stated in the editorial above quoted, that "Congressmen should be servants and not masters of the people who they in 1915, as stated in the editorial above quoted, that "Congressmen should be servants and not masters of the people who they were elected to serve," it certainly is good logic now. If at that time, as stated in the editorial, "the issue was democracy, the people's right to rule," then certainly the issue now is democracy, and after 12 years of the experiment the people surely are as much entitled to rule as they were then. You at that time asked the very pertinent question "Can not Congress trust this amendment to the people?" and I ask you the question, "Can not Congress now trust the same people?"

Paragraph 8 of the editorial above quoted is a resort to political expediency, but if it was expedient then for Congress to submit the amendment before the meeting of a national convention of the great political parties, in order to remove the question as an issue therefrom, why would it not be expedient now for Congress to submit the question before the meeting of the conventions of the two parties in Chicago?

If as stated in the concluding paragraph of the above editorial a vote for the submission of the eighteenth amendment was an emblem of the badge of a free man, why is it not the same character of a badge now? If it was good advice for the people to elect a Congressman, not a vassal nor a chattel in 1916, why isn't it good advice in 1932?

In other words, in now opposing the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people of this country you occupy the same position that was formerly maintained by the wets who originally opposed submission of the eighteenth amendment, but just as the logic of the situation then compelled the wets to finally accede to the widespread demand that the amendment be submitted to the people, so will the logic of the present situation, sooner or later, compel the friends of prohibition to accede to its resubmission. Any other course is undemocratic and contrary to our system of Government where the voice of the people is entitled to be heard.

I also note with interest your reference to the various referendums which have been had in Illinois upon different phases of the prohibition question. You seem to get great satisfaction from the fact that only a little more than a million votes were cast by the so-called wets in 1922 and 1930, but you overlook the fact that in each of those elections the wet vote outnumbered the dry vote almost 2 to 1. I recognize the fact that many persons did not participate in those elections and that at least some honest and well-meaning persons refused to participate on account of orders issued from your office. In my experience I have never known of such unfair, undemocratic, and unpatriotic advice given to people by any organization, much less one that claims to represent the moral and Christian influence of the State. All these propositions as you know were legal under the law of our State. represent the moral and Christian influence of the State. All these propositions, as you know, were legal under the law of our State, otherwise the secretary of state would have been enjoined from submitting them. But notwithstanding the legality of their submission you deliberately advised people to refuse to participate in an election submitted to them in the most sacred way provided by the law of the land. In other words, because the particular law providing for a referendum was not satisfactory to ganization you sought to nullify it, a charge so often directed at the opponents of prohibition.

You also make reference to the impressive demonstration of interest on the part of the people of Illinois to the governor before his veto of the repeal of the search and seizure act passed by the general assembly, and remind me of how the political leaders had their eyes opened by such protest. I do not doubt but that there was much protest concerning this action, but I am curious to know if you learned anything regarding the protest against the governor for his action in that respect. It is a matter of rather common knowledge, I think, that the governor was so thoroughly condemned that he declined to become a candidate for

You conclude your letter by referring to the last senatorial campaign, and you declare that the tremendous vote received by Senator Lewis was not an indication of a change of heart on the part of the Illinois drys but was a vigorous repudiation of Mrs. McCormick and her methods. I think there is some logic in this statement. There were no doubt many drys who supported Senator Lewis because of the eminent position occupied by him as a statesman and public official. However, I am reminded of the fact that there was another candidate in the election by the name of Lottie Holman O'Neill, who was the candidate of and had the backing of your organization and who received fewer than 100,000 votes in the State, or about 5 per cent of the vote cast. This leads me to believe that the repudiation of Mrs. McCormick was mild compared with the repudiation of your organization in that campaign.

Please excuse the length of this reply, but the questions raised and comments made in your letter seem to justify it.

Sincerely yours,

J. E. MAJOR.

DEATH OF HERMAN E. WILLS

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by calling attention to the death of Herman E. Wills, an officer of the Brotherhood of Railroad Engineers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted by the House, I desire to say that Herman E. Wills, who died this morning, was born in 1848 in Vermont. Had he lived until July 16, 1932, he would have been 84 years of age. He was really among the leaders in the labor movement. He went West when only 18 years of age. He was a locomotive engineer before he was 25, running in Iowa and Nebraska at a time when they had to ferry the trains across the Missouri River at Omaha.

He succeeded in bringing about the first labor agreement between large American railroads and labor 50 years ago, 1882. His advocacy of this agreement resulted in his being denied employment on many of the roads.

He was a grand lodge officer-this takes in the international aspect of matters concerning labor-in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. He came to Washington some 22 or 23 years ago as national representative of the transportation activities in which labor was involved.

Perhaps his outstanding achievement was the passage of the locomotive inspection law. As the result of this law there are no doubt hundreds of engineers and firemen now on the retired list who owe their lives not alone to this act but to Mr. Wills. At the time the bill was pending in the Congress it was opposed by the railroads, but were an effort made to repeal it, or any of its provisions, such repeal would be bitterly opposed by them in view of the great benefits that have accrued.

He was practically retired about five years ago. This retirement, however, did not lessen his ardent devotion to labor, for he was chairman of the educational committee of labor and was chairman of the advisory editorial committee of the newspaper Labor, in the founding of which he played no small part.

Herman E. Wills was a good American citizen, and he will go down in the accomplishment of organized labor as one of its leaders in any movement for the betterment of the welfare of working men and women. He was one of the bestloved members of the labor leaders and all of the Members of Congress and Senate who have served for the past several sessions knew of his dignity, his kindness, and his work for sane legislation and against the proposals of a wild and visionary nature.

THE PRESIDENT'S APPEAL TO THE NATION

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD the statement made this morning by the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made this morning by the President of the United States:

I have received many hundred inquiries from different parts of the country as to the prospects of balancing the Budget and for other information connected herewith.

other information connected herewith.

I am confident that the undertaking of the representatives of both political parties to balance the Budget remains and will be fulfilled. It is the very keystone of recovery. It must be done. Without it the several measures for restoration of public confidence and reconstruction which have already been undertaken will be incomplete and the depression prolonged indefinitely.

For a clear view of the situation our people should understand that the deficit for the next fiscal year, excluding further reduction of the national debt during that year, is estimated at about $1,250,000,000. This follows a deficit of $500,000,000 last year and a deficit of over $2,000,000,000 this year, likewise calculated without reduction of the debt. These deficiencies are almost wholly due to decrease in tax receipts. due to decrease in tax receipts.

METHODS OF ELIMINATING DEFICIT

We must eliminate this deficit for next year by the further reduction of governmental expenditures and by increases in taxa-tion. The expenditures budgeted for the next fiscal year as sent to the Congress amounted to about $4,100,000,000, after reduction by the administration of $365,000,000 under the total for the current year. In considering possible further economies in expenditures we must not forget that of this total about $2,100,000,000 is of such character that it can not be reduced; it is largely an inheritance of the Great War through increase of payment on Government obligations and the care of veterans and their fami-Government obligations and the care of veterans and their families. In addition, our Army and Navy cost about $700,000,000. We should not further reduce the strength of our defense. Thus we must make our further economies mainly out of this balance of $1,300,000,000 remaining from the total of $4,100,000,000, together with economies in the post office, as to which only the net operations are included in these figures. Out of this sum of $1,300,000,000 the many other vital services of the Government must be carried on. Every reduction that can be made without serious injury to these services and in justice to our people should be effected. Further economies can be made and, I am confident, will be made through authority of the Congress to eliminate unnecessary functions of the Government or in postponement of less-essential activities, together with businesslike reorganization less-essential activities, together with businesslike reorganization and coordination of Government activities. The Appropriation and Economy Committees of the Congress are now earnestly engaged on all these problems. But when all this is done the balancing of the Budget must, in the main, be accomplished by an increase in taxation, which will restore Government revenues

DANGERS OF CONTINUED BORROWING

Economies in expenditure or increase in taxes alike call for sacrifices—sacrifices which are a part of the country's war on depression. The Government no more than individual families can continue to expend more than it receives without inviting serious consequences. To continue to live on borrowed money only postpones the difficulty and, in the meantime, begets all manner of new evils and dangers, which create costs and losses to every workman, every farmer, and every business man far in excess of the cost of courageous action in balancing the Budget.

the cost of courageous action in balancing the Budget.

The American people are no less courageous and no less wise than the people of other nations. All other great nations of the world have been faced with even greater necessity during the last year. In order to preserve their national credit these countries have increased their taxes far more severely than our deficit demands of the American people.

One of the first requirements to the accomplishment of the absolute necessity of a balanced Budget is that the people and all their organizations should support and not obstruct the Members of Congress in sound efforts to both reduce expenditures and adjust taxation.

It must not be forgotten that the needs of the Government are It must not be forgotten that the needs of the Government are inseparable from the welfare of the people. Those most vitally concerned in recovery are the ones whose margins of savings are the smallest. They are affected by the depression more seriously than any others; ultimately they will pay the biggest price for any failure on our part of the Government to take the necessary action at this time. We can overcome this national difficulty as we have overcome all our difficulties in the past by willingness to sacrifice and by the resolute unity of national action.

WAGES AND THEIR EFFECT UPON THE DEPRESSION

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of Federal salaries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, we have seen from the report of the Census of Manufactures that the percentage of wages paid 25 or 30 years ago was above 20 per cent of the value of the wealth they helped to produce. In 1923 the percentage fell to 18 per cent of the value of the manufactured products; in 1929 to 16% per cent. This resulted in the reduction of purchasing power of the group of wage earners in this particular field. We have no general statistics that I can refer to, showing the percentage of wages in regard to the creation of wealth in other fields, but we do know from experience that in the building trades through modern devices of handling concrete, electrical hoists, mechanical stonecutters, and so forth, in comparison with the production wage percentages fell off in these fields equally or perhaps more than in the manufactures. The same is true of public

The increased power of engines, the increased trainloads, and the amount of freight carried from one point to another involves not more than 50 per cent of the labor to-day that was required even 10 years ago. department of American industry we see a constant effort to reduce the number of wage earners. At the present time about the only fields in which the normal number of employees are at work with the normal wage are the civilservice departments-Federal, State, and municipal. Any reduction of wages in this group, instead of remedying the condition, will increase the seriousness of the problem. The Federal Government should be the one to take the initiative in protection of the wage group. The selfishness of individuals may cause them to follow the principle of supply and demand and reduce the wage far below the minimum requirements. The Federal Government should take every possible means to prevent such a policy rather than set an example which will be only too readily followed. The primary purpose of Government is the protection of the weak.

The average citizen, as far as lies within the power of the Government, should be enabled to enjoy a living wage which does not merely include the necessities of life but normal comforts according to American standards of living. The root of the depression to-day is the concentration of wealth and its consequent inertness. Money at the bottom of a vault adds no more comfort or joy to living than though it were at the bottom of a mine. It is only when in circulation that it can give to mankind the blessings which American citizens have a right to enjoy. The only normal way of distributing money is through wages. When money is circulating through many hands, the rich will benefit because of the percentage which they will gain from the businesses and industries which they conduct, and the wage earner will be benefited by the comforts of life which it will provide for him as it passes through his hands.

REVOLT OF THE HOUSE

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of March 20, entitled "Revolt in the House."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

REVOLT IN THE HOUSE

Revolt in the House of Representatives, such as has occurred over the tax bill, has been a comparatively rare phenomenon in recent years. Owing to the docility of the Democrats, the herd instinct of the Republicans, and a set of rules muffling debate and paralyzing legislative initiative, the House, in general, has operated like a well-oiled machine. Major measures, such as the tariff bill of 1930, have in reality been enacted in committee, and have been passed without anything resembling deliberation on the part of the whole House.

Some few exceptions may be noted. In 1922 the House rejected the conference report on the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill and instructed its conferees to eliminate the embargo on dyestuffs and to place potash on the free list, which was done. In 1924, by a vote of almost 2 to 1, the House killed the Ways and Means Committee's proposal for a constitutional amendment to tax State and local bonds exempt from Federal taxation. In the same year the local bonds exempt from Federal taxation. In the same year the revenue bill was practically written on the floor of the House, but that was due largely to the fact that the Ways and Means Committee was hopelessly divided and submitted a half dozen reports. Until the rumpus over the tax bill, Speaker Garner directed the present House with the noiseless precision of his predecessor. The break came when the usually all-powerful Ways and Means Committee displayed a lamentable want of judgment, and the revolting Representatives began to exercise the new liberty afforded by liberation of the rules. It seems likely that the House is about to ation of the rules. It seems likely that the House is about to recapture some of its ancient prestige as a deliberative body responsive to popular will.

ORATION OF HON. CLEVELAND A. NEWTON ON HON. RICHARD BARTHOLDT

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the life and services of a former Member of this House, Hon. Richard Bartholdt, who recently died in St. Louis, and to include also the oration delivered by a former Member of this House, Mr. Newton, of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Cleveland A. Newton has paid a marvelous tribute to the life and services of the late Hon. Richard Bartholdt. I appreciate the privilege which has been granted me of making Mr. Newton's memorial a part of the permanent Record of the House of Representatives, where both served with distinction for many years.

Emblematic of that great army of German born who left their native heath and sailed across the sea because they were Americans at heart, Richard Bartholdt came to this country an apostle of peace and liberty.

The record of his life is written. So long as time shall last ambitious youth will find inspiration in the story of his long and useful service to mankind. So long as the peoples of all nations shall pray for peace they will turn to those pages which record his supplication that the dragon of war shall forever be banished from the earth.

Others have told of his strength of character, his swaying oratory, his logical debates, and his sturdy manhood. I am pleased to chronicle the loveliness of his kindly life as I first knew him. Years ago a country boy came to Washington as a Government clerk bearing in his pocket, from a German-born friend, a letter to this great Missourian. I would that I had words in which to picture the gracious reception, the words of encouragement, and the strength of companionship with which that stalwart statesman met the timid approach of the young stranger. I was that country boy and Richard Bartholdt was that statesman.

They mourn him most who knew him best. I speak not only for those of his own home city, St. Louis, but also for multitudes who honored and respected him throughout the whole State, because he belonged to and was loved by all Missourians. Truly, "Tis not death to live in hearts we leave behind." What I may say will add little to the record already written. Let honor rest where honor is due. Richard Bartholdt was a part of that great army of German born who lent the very substance of their lives to make our State a great and mighty Commonwealth.

In the city of St. Louis, where he lived so long as the idol of untold thousands, he was laid to rest. A poet has beautifully said:

I would like to have my story told By smiling friends with whom I've shared the way; Who thinking of me nod their heads and say, His heart was warm when other hearts were cold.

How apropos those words; Hon. Cleveland A. Newton, a friend and companion of many years, delivered an eloquent oration which I am privileged to extend as a portion of my tribute to this grand and noble American.

IN MEMORY OF HON, RICHARD BARTHOLDT

By Cleveland A. Newton

We have met to-day to honor the memory of a man distinguished by his own achievements. As a lone immigrant boy Richard Bartholdt came to this country in 1872 with the avowed purpose of becoming an American citizen. Imbued with ideals of liberty and freedom, he came to a land where they had been written into its fundamental law. To these ideals he devoted threescore years, and for these ideals he was pleading when he left us.

As a young man he was a journalist. As a writer and editor he expounded his philosophies of life and advocated his conceptions of government. This training gave him the discipline and poise which equipped him for a long and successful career in the Halis of Congress.

During his journalistic period and before he entered public life he made a profound and lasting contribution to the school system of St. Louis. In 1890 he became a member of the board of education. He found among other defects in the school system an utter lack of any facilities or equipment for the physical development of the children. Having received his education in a gymnasium in the very heart of Germany, he recognized that no educational system was complete which did not provide for the physical development of the student. Moved by this conviction and supported by other progressive members of the board, he succeeded in having gymnasiums established in the St. Louis public schools.

In 1892 he was elected to Congress and for 22 years he represented a district with a larger population than any other district in the United States. His repeated elections from that district by ever-increasing majorities bore abundant evidence of the confidence, esteem, and affection in which he was held by his people. In Congress he was recognized by his colleagues as conscien-

In Congress he was recognized by his colleagues as conscientious, able, dependable, and resourceful, and these elements of character gave strength to his leadership. In legislative matters he was studious, attentive, and active, and his votes were actuated by a patriotic desire to be of service to the whole country.

Richard Bartholdt served with great men in Congress—such men

Richard Bartholdt served with great men in Congress—such men as McKinley, Bourke Cockran, Uncle Joe Cannon, Claude Kitchin, Theodore Burton, Champ Clark, Jim Mann, and others of their caliber. He enjoyed the respect, confidence, and esteem of all of these men, and his ability as a legislator and a debater enabled him to hold his own with the best of them.

He served under the administrations of Presidents Cleveland, McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, and no man of his time was more trusted, more esteemed, or more welcome at the White House than was Coursessman Bertholdt.

was Congressman Bartholdt.

Mr. Bartholdt, like millions of our immigrants who went into the melting pot from whence comes our American stock, was of German origin, and I have always felt that his patriotism and zeal for public service were inspired by the contribution which other Americans of German origin have made toward our national defense and civilization. We can not forget that when the fight for American independence was in the balance, when the footsore, weary, half-starved army of Washington was encamped at Valley Forge it was Baron von Steuben, then military genius, trained in seven campaigns under Frederick the Great, who gave up rank and wealth and position and came to this country to espouse our cause and train our soldiers so that they could successfully battle with regulars of George III. It was the great Lutheran clergyman, Muhlenberg, who threw off his clerical robes, left his pulpit, and with the battle cry of freedom, led a volunteer regiment of American patriots as they hurled themselves against the armies of England in our fight for independence. It was Americans of German origin who were chosen as a bodyguard for General Washington when others had proved faithless. It was Americans of German origin, under leaders of German stock, who captured Camp Jackson and saved Missouri to the Union. It is patriots such as these who inspire men like Richard Bartholdt to achievements which make history.

Among Mr. Bartholdt's contributions to the public service were his efforts for world peace. In this cause he labored to the end. In his autobiography he quotes peace sentiments from the world's greatest leaders. From Victor Hugo he quotes, "Peace is the virtue, war the crime, of civilization." From Benjamin Franklin he quotes, "There never was a good war or a bad peace." From George Washington he quotes, "My first wish is that the plague of mankind, war, may be banished from the earth." From Thomas Jefferson he quotes, "I abhor war and view it as the greatest scourge of mankind." From the sainted and immortal Lincoln he quotes, "Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away."

Inspired by the sentiments of these great leaders, Mr. Bartholdt

Inspired by the sentiments of these great leaders, Mr. Bartholdt attended practically every conference of the Interparliamentary Union during the past 30 years. He pleaded fervently for world peace and amity in the Halls of Congress and in conferences in Europe. His heart was in the cause, and now that he is gone let us hope that others, as able, as earnest and persevering, will follow in his footsteps until the plague of war has been banished from the earth.

His was a long and useful life—a life full of hope and endeavor, a life abundant with service and success. His name and his achievements are interwoven with more than 20 years of American history, and his works will live as long as our country and its institutions shall endure.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the Record the text of an amendment I expect to offer upon the question of the taxation of transfers of stock, and the amendment which would avoid the threat of moving the exchanges to Canada or elsewhere.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

PROPOSED STOCK EXCHANGE AMENDMENT

(c) The tax provided for in subsections (a) and/or (b) shall be imposed on all sales, agreements to sell, and/or memoranda of sale or delivery consummated entirely within the United States or between citizens or residents of the United States; and in addition, such tax shall also be imposed upon the seller or transferor resident in or a citizen of the United States when the buyer or transferee is not a citizen or resident of the United States. When the seller or transferor is not a citizen or resident of the United States and does not pay the tax imposed by subsections (a) and/or (b), the buyer, if a citizen or resident of the United States, shall be liable for the full amount of such tax subject to the provisos and penalties set forth under subsections (a) and (b). A resident or citizen of the United States, acting through a broker or agent abroad, shall be liable for the full amount of the tax provided in subsections (a) and/or (b) as though buying, selling, receiving, or transferring without the intervention of such broker or agent. A broker or agent resident in or a citizen of the United States shall be liable for the full amount of the tax provided in subsections (a) and/or (b) notwithstanding that his principal is or may be a resident or citizen of a foreign country. In all cases where sales or transfers of stock taxable under subsections (a) and/or (b) are consummated through dummies or by ruse or device designed to evade the tax provided in subsections (a) and/or (b), the parties shall be liable for the full amount of the tax as though such dummies, ruse, or device were not employed, provided that nothing in this sentence shall be construed to relieve the parties from the operation of the penalties provided under subsections (a) or (b).

EXTENSION OF REMARKS-THE REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to print granted to all Members, I submit the following statement. We have seen to-day in the House two shining examples of Democratic inconsistency.

The Democratic side orates loudly and often against tariffs, and yet to-day we have witnessed Democratic Member after Democratic Member offering amendments to this bill that to all intents, purposes, and effects are tariff proposals.

Then the majority leader [Mr. RAINEY] told the House and the country that the Democrats were against gag rule and wanted full and free discussion of the tax bill. Following that the acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. Crisp] moved to close debate and applied the gag rule to the debate this afternoon.

Amendments offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Jones] and myself that would have exempted lubricating oil used by farmers from a tax of 4 cents a gallon were voted upon without debate as a result of Democratic gag rule and defeated, the House being compelled to vote without knowing the effect of these amendments that were proposed to prevent further burdens upon the operating costs of the farmer. The amendment by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Johnson], aimed to prevent the importation into America of goods manufactured in Russia, was submitted without debate, thanks to Democratic gag rule, and defeated, with practically a unanimous Democratic vote against it.

By such a procedure they hope to pass a bipartisan revenue bill and hold the confidence of the country.

Mr. TURPIN. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the Boland amendment, I plead with you as a representative of a half million of our people from the anthracite district of Pennsylvania. In a greater sense I am intensely concerned as to the welfare of all our people. It has been my privilege to vote for a tariff on every importation that was believed by my colleagues to be detrimental to American industry and directly threatening to deny the American laborer his wage.

At the last session of Congress I voted to further restrict immigration; not because of racial hatred, not because of differences in creed, not because of class distinction, but because this great country of ours already has millions of ablebodied men who can not find employment and because I am convinced that the American labor market is entitled to the same protection that our tariff laws give to that which American labor produces.

This bill passed the House but was killed in the Senate. I can not reconcile myself to the inconsistency of my colleagues who, voting to exclude the low-paid imported laborer from our shores, are urging that the conscript labor of Soviet Russia and the coolie wages of China be encouraged and that the product of these countries shall be dumped upon our shores while our American workers remain in the bread line of this great Nation. I can see no consistency in keeping an oversupply of labor from our shores by legislation and at the same time allowing that which it produces to come in tax free to compete with that produced by fairpaid American labor.

The great anthracite basin in Pennsylvania, of which I represent a major part, normally employs 150,000 men upon whom 2,000,000 American folks depend for the necessities of life. The plight of these workers and their dependents is critical. They cry out for relief. Their cry is reechoing throughout these halls to-day. At many of the collieries the morning whistle calling men to work has not sounded in months. At other collieries the occasional blowing of the gong is the most welcome music heard.

I should like to quote statistics, but time will not permit. Suffice it to state that in 1926, 387,000 net tons of anthracite came to our shores from foreign countries. In 1931 this was increased to 638,000 net tons, and new contracts insure importations of more than a million tons for 1932. The tonnage and proportionate increase are even greater in the bitumunous-coal markets.

Thirty-five thousand anthracite miners in the United States are without work. Of the 130,000 miners who are employed, nearly all are working less than half time. In the year just passed, due to importations of untaxed fuel from abroad, 60,000 people in mining and transportation were idle for a total of 3,000,000 workdays, what should have been their earnings going to Russian serfs and Chinese coolies and totaling $15,000,000. Either this money should be paid to our people at home or collected as tax. The underground toilers of the bituminous and the anthracite fields alike offer no protest to the increased cost brought about by the protection of their fellow workers in mills and factories. They do ask that they be treated as fairly.

To my colleagues, who yesterday joined so loyally in placing a tax on oil imports, and more particularly to my colleagues representing the Atlantic Coast Line States, may I suggest that unless American labor can find employment there will be no market for your products, for only through the pay envelope can things be purchased by the masses.

I plead with you, my colleagues, to vote here to-day as you shout at home, "America first."

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to the manufacturers' sales tax of 21/4 per cent of the sale price of all manufactured articles as provided in this bill. It is not right. It is not just. It will not promote the best interests of our people or of the country, even though it is proposed for passage by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, a majority of whom are Democrats, and for whom I have the greatest respect. I am constrained to oppose this bill, or that part of it which provides for a sales tax. This feature of the bill is un-American and un-Democratic, and contrary to the principles of the party of Jefferson as taught for more than 100 years.

The levying of a tariff, and that is what this bill does, has never been the policy of the Democratic Party, but quite the opposite is our creed and has been our practice. It would be unwise for the Democratic Party in control of this House to pass a measure of this kind, and it is certainly contrary to all the fundamental principles of the party. It is contrary to the platform of the Democratic Party framed in Houston in 1928 and also the national platform of 1924, both of which committed the party in opposition to all sales taxes. The provisions of this bill mean that we are raising the already too high tariff wall 21/4 per cent as a tax on all goods imported into this country. It simply means a tariff, or tax, and surely the Democratic Party does not want to stand sponsor for any additional taxes or tariff levies against our people. If so, they misjudge the mandates of the people and the needs of the hour. Even during the emergency which confronted the country during the World War, when there was urgent need for rapidly increased and vast revenues, neither the Democratic nor Republican Party turned to a sales tax as a means to raise additional revenue for the Government but depended on high-income taxes, luxury, and other special taxes. This should be our policy at this

A sales tax is so unjust to the masses of the people of the country that neither party has ever before had recourse to it. And certainly the people of the country were not expecting our leadership in the House, over the position and promise of our party through its representatives in the last national convention, to now propose this measure against which our party is pledged and has always gone on record in opposition to this method of raising revenue. It would violate the party platform and violate our duty to the people of the Nation. It is an indefensible measure. New taxes should not be levied, of any kind, until our Budget of expenses is heavily reduced in every department of government.

A deficit can be cured by reducing expenses as effectively as by increasing taxes.

We do not need 600,000 officeholders to run this Government. Let us reduce the pay rolls. Let us do away with unnecessary bureaus, unnecessary boards and commissions, and have a general reduction of expenses. Let us do away with big appropriations which the conditions in the country so justly demand be left off. Let us stand by and for the people and the taxpayers and against the boards and the unnecessary officeholders. When expenses and appropriations are cut, then we can talk about new taxes, and not until then.

Let us first fight extravagance in government.

A sales tax is unjust because it is levied according to needs, rather than according to ability to pay. The income tax rests not upon needs but upon ability to pay.

A sales tax is the tax prescribed by aristocracy, and one used in the dim past in Egypt, in Babylonia, in Rome, and in France before the revolution, when emperors and kings dictated the methods of raising revenue from their subjects to support the state. This tax comes off of necessities required by the common man.

One of the reasons for a democratic form of government has been to get rid of such taxes as these.

Mexico formerly had a sales tax and abandoned it because of its injustice to the poorer classes. Cuba had a sales tax when the United States first exercised dominion over her, but one of the first things this country did when we took possession was to abolish this tax.

England has always refused to adopt a sales tax; so has Italy. A tax must be fair to the average citizen. Of course it requires more effort to collect an income tax, but effort is the price of justice. A sales tax sins against the principles of equality in taxation.

I have the honor to be a member of the great Committee on Agriculture in the House, and I know from my experience as a farmer, and from reports coming before our committee daily, that the farmers of the United States can not pay higher taxes and live. Less tribute must be levied upon them and upon the toiling masses of our people rather than to increase their burdens, as do the provisions of this bill.

Ten per cent on all admissions to all the moving-picture shows of 25 cents and over is levied in this bill. The poor man who has labored and struggled all through the week can not go to the movies on Saturday night with his family and enjoy a night of recreation and fun without paying a tribute to the Federal Government for every laugh he enjoys during the show.

Special excise tax on lubricating oil of 4 cents per gallon is imposed, and a tax of 1 cent per gallon is levied on all gasoline, or imported oil, which simply means that the consumer, the buyer, will pay more for the privilege of carrying the family to church, to town, or to visit the neighbors, or to enjoy a trip to see more of the country in which he lives that so grievously taxes him.

In my State we already pay 7 cents per gallon gasoline tax, which is too high, and to levy more means the man of humble circumstances will be denied the right to the use of the highways. He can not afford to pay the tax on the gas to run the family car or to run the truck for hire. It would be an outrage to pass this kind of a tax measure on our people in the midst of this awful panic which prevails. This question of taxation is tremendously important to the people. What is needed is not more taxes but less taxes. We have already levied too much taxes upon the people without a sales tax. Let us defeat this provision of the bill. We need remedial legislation. We need a law to safeguard depositors in our banks, which is soon to come before this House. We need relief along many lines, and the people are looking to us to bring about relief and not to add further burdens upon them.

I recognize that it would be well to balance the Budget, which means simply that we should levy a sufficient tax to meet the expenses of Government. It is proposed by this bill to increase Federal taxes $1,246,000,000 during this year. That means an additional tax of approximately $10 on every man, woman, and child in the United States, and this means a tax of about $50 is visited on every average American family and home in addition to the taxes now being paid by them

In the district, which I have the honor to represent, it means an additional tax of over $3,000,000. My people are already suffering from an excessive State, county, and municipal tax. They are forced to pay more than should be required of them without adding this excessive Federal tax. It must not be done. It would be unjust to them and wholly unfair

No necessity exists for this tax. The deficit, as exists now, was created in 1931, when the Republicans were in power. The same necessity existed under their administration to balance the Budget as now exists. The necessity for a balanced Budget seems to come mainly from those who own Government bonds. It is insisted that bonds will go below par in value without it.

Everybody in the Government has witnessed the value of his holdings reduced almost one-half, and ofttimes reduced to nothing, during the present panic, and why then should the bondholder not take his loss along with the rest of us? He will still be in better position than any other investor for his loss will only be temporary. We know he has the best investment, with the best collateral of any man on earth—the good faith of the people of the United States of America—guaranteeing the payment of his debt. We know that in a short time these Government bonds will go back to a premium.

I have no tears to shed for the bondholders and international bankers in this country, who have brought on the necessity for this emergency revenue measure. They should be required to undergo more hardships than the passage of this measure will or can visit upon them, for unfortunately it will not affect them and those most able to pay taxes, but it will fall upon the consumers of the country, the men of small means, men in humble circumstances; poor men, with large families, would have to bear the burdens under this bill, and not the wealth of the country, and hence my opposition and my vote against it.

Not over 5 per cent of our people own Government bonds, and they are the rich class; then why, in the midst of this panic, when the ability of our people as a whole to pay out more in taxes has reached the breaking point, with bankruptcy and failures on every hand, should 95 per cent of the people make sacrifices and be ground to poverty and pay more to accommodate the 5 per cent who hold the Government bonds? Surely we should be, and are, concerned about the welfare of the 95 per cent of the common people of America before the small minority of the 5 per cent of the rich of the Nation.

Why this rush to balance the Budget, when only three weeks ago the Congress voted $500,000,000, with power to float a billion and one-half dollars in bonds and Government obligations, to be used in the next two years.

Nothing was said then about balancing the Budget. We appropriated another $125,000,000 to the Federal land banks, and nothing said about the Budget.

The $600,000,000 sought to be raised under this bill would come, in a large part, off the small wage earners, laborers, and farmers, who are forced to buy clothes, groceries, merchandise, and machinery to live.

Let us get the taxes to run the Federal Government off the big incomes, and the wealth of the Nation, rather than the consumers of the Nation. As I said before, a sales tax is wrong in principle. It is not based on ability to pay, but on necessity to live.

An income tax is fair. It falls on those who are able to pay—those who profit by having the Government protect them while they accumulate the wealth; while under a manufacturers' tax of this kind, it levies a tax on the consumer for the benefit and protection of the Government. This is unjust and unsound.

Let us levy heavy luxury taxes, individual income taxes, and corporation income taxes, on excess profits and surtaxes on corporations, and individuals, and gift taxes on big estates, and increase rates on all incomes and inheritances, and thus have the wealth of the Nation bear this tax rather than the unfortunate consumers of America.

All the farmers and farm organizations of the country oppose a general sales tax as a part of our national fiscal program. Only a national emergency, which does not exist, could ever justify such a tax.

Let us remember that we have to balance the Budget not only of the Federal Government but also of 48 States, of 3,000 counties, and of 10,000 towns and cities and school districts, all of which have outstanding bonds and securities.

The Federal Government owes seventeen billions. The States, cities, and towns of the United States owe fifteen billions, and it is just as important that these budgets be balanced also. The six hundred millions sought to be raised by a sales tax would come from the pockets of the American people, from the same pockets that have to balance the budget for State, county, and city governments. The credit of all these branches of Government is equally important.

Can you take this $600,000,000 from our people under a sales tax without crippling further the ability of these same taxpayers to pay their own local, State, county, and city taxes? They must have credit to carry the $15,000,000,000 they now owe on their own local taxes at home. You endanger the whole credit structure of the Nation by the plan you now propose.

It will take from the taxpayers of Tennessee, who are already overburdened with taxes, many millions of dollars.

People pay taxes even before paying grocery bills or doctors' bills. They pay taxes first, because otherwise, they lose the home, the farm, and the cottage of the wage earner, into which so much toil and sacrifice has gone. They are losing their homes now. Millions of dollars of taxes are in default

More than one-tenth of the farmers in this country have been foreclosed upon during the last six years—since 1926. This means others in the same community must pay more taxes to balance the local budget from year to year. We sold $900,000,000 worth of bonds last week at 3½ per cent, which was oversubscribed by $2,000,000. The borrowing capacity of our Government greatly exceeds the borrowing capacity of our States, counties, and cities. We must take care of them and the home owners, if the Government is to prosper. Our local States and counties must have adequate governments properly maintained. We must have credit there. Naturally I think more of the schools, the roads, the hospitals, the police, and fire protection, and conveniences around home, than I do of so many Federal bureaus and boards here in Washington.

Let us keep our credit back home in our States and local communities.

It has been said that "it was the last straw that broke the camel's back." Do not take $600,000,000 more away from the people, who are locally obligated to pay $15,000,-000,000 in the States and municipalities. Remember, both budgets are equally important to balance.

If a man is able to pay his income tax, he is able to pay his property tax and will not lose his home. But the consumers are the ones who are now suffering, and the men of small means are losing their homes, as their credit is exhausted. Let us not add more to their burdens, but let us seek a way to relieve them if possible. Let us take from, rather than add to, their grievances.

When you tax his clothes, his shoes, his hat, and everything else he buys, you then make it more difficult for him to pay his property tax, or to pay his mortgage, and to save his fireside for himself and family, which is so sacred. This sales tax must come out of the same pocketbook that is now paying the property tax in each State and county, and would therefore impair the credit of all local indebtedness. The same people who own Government bonds own largely State bonds and are therefore equally interested in having the credit structure sound from top to bottom.

We must stop emptying the Treasury with a steam shovel. We must reduce the cost of Government. That is the crying need of the hour. The deficit would not exist in the Treasury but for the reckless expenditure of the people's money in such criminal waste as the building of a national highway from Washington to Mount Vernon at a cost of over a million dollars per mile—an outrageous price for even a boulevard of the kind that was built; other expenditures, such as seventeen million for a Department of Commerce Building, with private elevators installed; seven million for office buildings for Members of Congress now under process of completion, which are not needed at this time.

It has been said that 90 per cent of the people have only 10 per cent of the country's wealth, and under this proposed bill 90 per cent of our people with only this 10 per cent of the wealth of the country will bear fully 90 per cent of the sales tax. This must not be. Let this great Government extend a helping hand to the great common people of America. Let us tax the wealth of the Nation; let us protect the interests of the distressed and oppressed people of our land and not crush them further with added burdens when they already have more than their part of expenses levied against them.

The best way to balance the Budget is to keep money in the Treasury and stop voting it out. Let us cut down the expenses of Government in all departments. Let us reduce the number of boards, bureaus, and commissions and begin making money by saving it.

Rather than seeking all the time to find some new mode of levying a new tax on the people of the country who are required to support the Government by paying taxes, this policy of levying excessive taxes must be stopped in all branches of Government—State, county, and city. The people can not and should not longer endure it. They must not and should not carry any additional tax burdens. We should be trying to reduce taxes rather than to increase them.

Let us, as Members of Congress, begin by setting the right example ourselves and reduce at once our own salaries at least $2,500 per year each, and thereby work a saving of Government expense on the taxpayers of a million and eighty-seven thousand five hundred dollars in the House of Representatives alone. Then, according to prices which prevail for commodities produced by those who send us here and those who pay the bill, and whose servants and representatives we are, we have not then taken our share of the loss, which has been so patiently borne by the people of our respective districts.

This is a time for self-denial. It is a time for self-sacrifice. It is a time for patriotism to manifest itself. It is a time to share the hardships of our fellow man and to make his burdens lighter. It is no time for greed or selfishness. Let us put our own house in order and begin an economy that affects us first and then we can more clearly see how to fairly affect the rights of others.

If this tax bill passes, which provides for 2½ per cent tax levy, the manufacturer when he bills out his $100 worth of goods will add to the bill $2.25; so the jobber gets a statement of $102.25, and then the jobber will invoice to the wholesaler, after adding 15 per cent profit, which will amount to $117.55. Then the wholesaler bills invoices to the retailer with another 15 per cent added, which runs the bill up to $135.25, and then the retailer adds 25 or 30 per cent profit to this price when he sells, and so finally the consumer pays around $175 for the $100 worth of merchandise, and by thus continuing to pyramid and pass on the tax it grows from 2½ per cent to around 20 per cent which the consumer has to pay on all manufactured articles of every kind—hats, boots, shoes, shirts, overalls, farm machinery, and so forth.

An article which now retails for 5 cents would be sold at 6 or 7 cents, which would be a tax of 20 per cent, and so it would be added to the burden of the consumer at every turn in the road. The excess profit which the manufacturer, the jobber, the wholesaler, and the retailer would add on to the price of merchandise would cost the consumer in the country a billion, eight hundred million, instead of six hundred million, as estimated, and all this extra billion and more dollars would be divided up between the manufacturers, jobbers, wholesalers, and retailers of the country, but all paid by the buyers or consumers, who must have the merchandise.

If we had collected the foreign debts due us instead of voting the moratorium to the European nations, more than $250,000,000 of the deficit would now be paid, and hence that much less to be levied against our own people. No wonder the people cry out against more taxes in the face of such unwise action on the part of Congress. Another $250,000,000 can be easily saved to the taxpayers as heretofore indicated by reducing appropriations and stopping the unnecessary expenses of Government.

The Budget has been balanced many times in the history of our Government by bond issues. In fact, almost as many times this way in the past as by additional taxes. The people will be in better condition to pay after the panic and when business revives again. They can not assume greater tax burdens now. To do so means to further depress business and to prolong the panic and to practically work disaster on the American taxpayer. Then let us declare a moratorium on our own people toward further tax paying.

Let us not destroy the American taxpayer; let us not destroy the Democratic Party by the passage of this bill. Taxes come all too often. They recur each year. Then let us not pass a law that will require our people to pay a Federal tax every time they make a purchase at the store of some needed article of merchandise for the home.

This measure is a customer's tax really, for whoever does the buying will do the paying of the tax. The manufacturer will always pass the tax on to those to whom he sells. Ultimately the farmer and the laborer will pay this tax. It would come from the toiling masses of the people of to-day who are struggling for bread and from whose income they keep the family going. It is the poor man who has to spend the most for clothes to protect the family and to buy what he eats. The rich man pays only a small percentage of his income for something to eat or to wear. The farmer who buys a piece of machinery needed on the farm to raise the crop with which to feed his family and to pay off the mortgage would have to pay this 2¼ per cent sales tax in addition to the already high prices he is required to pay for machinery. Thus an additional tribute would go to the International Harvester Trust.

If this tax is once adopted, it will never be removed from the shoulders of the consumers of the country, for it is the entering wedge of the rich, whether so intended by our leaders who propose it or not, to get rid of the income tax and finance the Government by this so-called sales tax.

It is an effort to have those least able to pay assume the burdens of Government expense, while the rich make an opening to escape the burdens which they should carry.

This bill taxes all kinds of wearing apparel. It taxes furniture, pens, pencils, ink, paper, books, shoes, stockings, all kinds of chinaware, crockery, woodenware. The lumber sold to build houses is to be taxed. We are taxed to keep out the heat and the cold; the nails that build the house are taxed under this bill; the hinges, the windowpanes, the doors, the shingles that make the roof, the concrete that makes the foundation, the bricks that make the chimney, and the walls—everything that goes to build the home is taxed.

If the farmer builds the house and tries to keep up the battle with the taxgatherer and begins to fence the farm, his wire is taxed to do this; if he buys harness to fit up the team of mules, he must pay the tax; if he buys a tractor, he must pay the tax; or a mowing machine, a rake, a plow, harrow, hoe, binder, cultivator, corn planter, or any other piece of machinery, he is made to pay the manufacturer's tax of 2½ per cent, which never gets less but always greater in amount.

If he gets sick, he is carried to the hospital in a sales-taxed ambulance; the doctor examines him with instruments bearing the sales tax; he is put in a room filled with furniture bearing the sales tax, including the bed upon which he lies, the carpet on the floor, and the pictures on the wall. If he gets a drink of ice water to cool the fever, he takes it from a tax-ridden glass, the water cooled with sales-taxed ice, and should the unfortunate end come and life is extinct he is put away in clothing, every stitch of which is taxed. The casket in which he is placed is likewise bearing the tax, and even the flowers that cover the grave bear the same label of a sales tax. This is too much. It must not be. It is too serious to contemplate, and too unjust and intolerable to be borne by a great and free people.

Let us reduce expenses of government; let us reduce salaries: let us levy higher income taxes upon the wealth of the country, those able to pay and those who have prospered and should be willing to pay; and let us levy taxes against big estates and the wealth of the country, and then if revenue is not sufficient issue short-term notes and bonds to defray expenses and not burden the humble home owners, the laborers, and the toiling masses with this unconscionable, unjust, unfair, and undemocratic tax measures. Let us rise up and defeat it as freeman and patriots should do. This, and this only, is the full measure of our responsibility to our people and to our common country. That this will be done I have the fullest confidence. Like the soldiers on the field of battle, and this is an important battle for the rights of the toiling masses of this country, that they may remain free and independent and be not crushed with burdens too great to bear-let us say-it shall not pass. Let the patriotic men and women of this House rise to the importance of the occasion and vote down this bill. Let us not levy this unjust burden upon the people of America.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, "Balance the Budget or the credit of the Nation will be impaired" is a fallacy. The wealth of the Nation is $400,000,000,000, so we are told by President Hoover through the antihoarding advertisements. The Nation owes, or will owe June 30, $18,000,000,000, of a ratio of 22½ to 1. The situation is comparable to an individual who owns a business worth $22,500 and who owes $1,000 on it.

The increase of $4,500,000,000 in our national indebtedness will be comparable to the individual increasing his $1,000 debt on his $22,500 business to $1,250. Do you think such an increase would impair the credit of either the individual or the Nation? During the past 10 years we have exceeded the sinking fund law in the retirement of our national indebtedness by $3,500,000,000. Let us utilize that surplus payment and we do not have a deficit. Moderate inflation will cause an increase of profits which will increase the amount of income taxes paid to the Government. Mr. Mills, the Secretary of the Treasury, stated in a speech about 90 days ago that the Government could safely borrow three or four billion dollars without impairing its credit, and that a few years ago we owed $26,000,000,000 and the credit of the Nation was not impaired. Let it not be forgotten that while we owe $18,000,000,000, the railroads, including the Panama Canal Railroad, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, Inland Waterways Corporation, the Federal intermediate credit banks, the Federal Farm Board, Shipping Board, Grain Corporation, and foreign countries, owe us twelve and one-half billion dollars. Not such a big public debt. after all, when we deduct what is owed to the Nation, which leaves five and one-half billion dollars. Can we collect from foreign countries? Not if we keep on paying for them without insisting on payment but letting international bankers collect their money 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the time is up for the consideration of the Schafer amendment to section 2 of the Crisp amendment, which amendment asks to strike out section 2 placing a tax upon malt and wort.

I am heartily in favor of Mr. Schafer's amendment to strike out this tax. Yesterday we asked this committee to pass an amendment providing for a tax upon 2.75 per cent beer and providing for its legal manufacture. This committee voted down the amendment and refused to allow the country to have a beer which is nonintoxicating and which would produce a revenue of more than $400,000,000. We felt that this amendment should have been adopted and the people allowed to purchase a good beer manufactured under scientific conditions, under cooling processes and such other means as are only attainable in the splendid breweries of our country. It was to my mind a great mistake to strike down this amendment at a time when the country needs the proceeds and when the people are drinking home-brew to a greater extent than they were drinking real beer before the prohibition amendment.

I believe if we had granted the people real beer, it would have put a different face upon the situation in this country. People would feel that they were at least securing a part of their liberty again and would feel more like cooperating with the whole Nation in bringing back prosperity and success. Now, here we have a provision brought in by the Ways and Means Committee which would tax malt and wort with which home-brews are made. The gentleman from Georgia has provided that malt used in the manufacture of bread or malted milk or the like should be exempt from this taxation, which leaves the tax on malt and wort used in the manufacture of beer. It is another one of those hypocritical provisions. Here the Government proposes to make the home-brew fellows pay a tax and yet yesterday it would not let them have real beer.

It seems that the prohibition proposition has made more hypocrites out of people than any other measure in the history of the country, and now it is turning the law into a hypocritical position. Here they decide to tax beer, grape juice and its concentrates, and provide a revenue of some $50,000,000 from illicit manufactures and then when bootleggers make a large sum of money, the Treasury Department comes in and collects income taxes from these violators. These bootleggers on their part, in order to protect themselves against the collection of this income tax and to protect themselves further from investigations as to their violation of the law, hire safety boxes in the banks and trust companies and store their money where the Government can not ascertain the facts it needs.

The consequence of this procedure is that we have vast hoarding of the currency of the country by bootleggers, racketeers, and so forth, and that in its turn helps bring about the depression, because you can not conduct business without currency and the hoarding of the currency has been done on a considerable scale. If you want to tax beer, do not tax it indirectly, but tax it directly and provide for its manufacture. Remove this manufacture of beer from the home and family and let it be brewed as it should be brewed so that it will be healthful and nutritious.

I am opposed to the taxing of malt and wort and through it taxing the home-brew manufacturers, who have trouble enough when they have to manufacture their own beer.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is still detained from the Senate because of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GLASS. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson] is absent in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva.

Mr. BYRNES. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily detained by serious illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

DEATH OF HERMAN WILLS

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I shall absent myself from a part of the day's session of the Senate long enough to attend the funeral of one of the foremost leaders in social legislation, Herman E. Wills, who died in this city last Saturday morning at the ripe age of 84.

Mr. Wills for 50 years was one of the pioneers not only in extending railroads to the West coast, but in the organization and advancement of the principles of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. He had been in Washington for 22 years as the national representative of transportation activities in which labor was interested.

The passing of Mr. Wills is mourned not only by the railroad brotherhoods but by men and women in every walk of life regardless of their social station or their political affiliation. He possessed a quiet dignity which endeared him to all with whom he came in contact. His vision of legislation was practical and he will be revered for years to come.

TELEPHONE SERVICE ON PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE STATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize telephone service in Government-controlled buildings on Public Health Service stations, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FEDERAL AID TO STATES IN FORESTATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to Senate Resolution 175, relative to the practicability of Federal aid to States in utilization of lands suitable for forestation, stating, in part, "Arrangements have already been started to insure compliance with this request, and the results will be submitted to the Senate at the earliest practicable date. Because of the scope and the importance of the inquiry it may not be possible, however, to submit the material requested before December next," which was ordered to lie on the table.

THE BASING-POINT FORMULA AND CEMENT PRICES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the commission on the basing-point formula and cement prices, including a survey of pricing systems used in industry generally, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORT ON DEAD OR CREOSOTE OIL (S. DOC. NO. 73)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting, in compliance with Senate Resolution 470 of the Seventy-first Congress, a report of the commission covering the costs of production of dead or creosote oil in the United States and in the principal competing country, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE, Albany, March 9, 1932.

(By Mr. Webb)

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed such legislation as may be necessary to provide suitable and adequate regulation of the transportation of persons and property in interstate and foreign com-merce by motor carriers operating motor vehicles for compensation, by charter or by contract, on the public highways in interstate or foreign commerce: And be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the United States Senate, and to each Member of Congress elected from New York State.

By order of the senate.

A. MINER WELLMAN, Clerk.

In Assembly, March 9, 1932.

Concurred in without amendment. By order of the assembly.

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Virginia, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Senate joint resolution ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress

Whereas the Seventy-second Congress of the United States of America, in both Houses by a constitutional majority of two-thirds thereof has made the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, in the following words, to wit: "Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution.

"Section 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"Sec. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"Sec. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President.

such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

"Sec. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have decided when the control of the death of the d shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

"Sec. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission."

Therefore be it

Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Delegates of Virginia:

First. That the said proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, ratified by the General Assembly of the State of Virginia.

Second. That certified copies of this preamble and joint resolution be forwarded by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the Secretary of State at Washington, to the presiding officer of the United States Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Agreed to by the Senate of Virginia, March 4, 1932.

O. V. Hanger,

Clerk of the Senate.

WORLD-WIDE DISARMAMENT AND OUTLAWRY OF WAR

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a letter and petition sent by Miss Mary Winsor, legislative chairman of the Pennsylvania Committee for Total Disarmament, Philadelphia, which urges our Government to instruct the delegates from the United States to the International Disarmament Conference to stand for total disarmament.

The petition is signed by thousands of citizens, 1,578 of whom reside in Pennsylvania, who, as Miss Winsor says, sincerely believe in total disarmament and, furthermore, urge "the immediate passage of an amendment to the United States Constitution prohibiting war and all preparation for war, in order to bring to our country the honor of being the first nation to disarm."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

The letter from Miss Mary Winsor, legislative chairman. is as follows:

> PENNSYLVANIA COMMITTEE FOR TOTAL DISARMAMENT, Philadelphia, March 18, 1932.

Hon. James J. Davis, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Davis: When I had the pleasure of seeing you in Washington last week and walking with you from your office to the Capitol you will remember that I requested you to present our disarmament petitions to be read in the Senate. You were kind enough to say that "All sensible people want disarmament," and that we might send you our petitions. There are two petitions one reading: tions, one reading:

"PETITION FOR TOTAL DISARMAMENT

"We, the undersigned, being citizens of the United States and over 21 years of age, do hereby request our Government to instruct the delegates from the United States to the International Dis-armament Conference to be held in 1932 to stand for total disarmament by international agreement or by national example.

"We further urge our Government to do all in its power to promote the immediate passage of an amendment to the United States Constitution prohibiting war and all preparation for war, in order to bring to our country the honor of being the first nation to disagram" nation to disarm.

The second:

"PETITION TO CONGRESS FOR COMPLETE INDEPENDENT DISARMAMENT AND THE OUTLAWRY OF WAR FOR ANY PURPOSE "We, the undersigned, being citizens of the United States and over 21 years of age, do hereby ask the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives to further by every means in their power, and whenever opportunity presents itself, to act favorably upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States which will make it legally impossible to prepare for, declare, or carry on war. The full text of this proposed amendment is on the reverse side of this petition."

The Pennsylvania Committee for Total Disarmament, although organized only two years ago, has a rapidly growing membership in all walks of life and is led by responsible and representative

Sincerely yours,

MARY WINSOR, Legislative Chairman.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and the body thereof ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

USE OF ASSETS OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in connection with the so-called Glass bill, which is now being considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency, I have received a very interesting telegram signed by the presidents of a number of national banks at New Haven, Conn. I ask unanimous consent that the telegram may be printed in the RECORD at this point and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

New Haven, Conn., March 23, 1932.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,

United States Senate:

We view passage of Glass bill at present time and under present conditions with greatest apprehension. Objection detailed in recent letter of New Haven banks not met by new draft. Believe passage would inevitably be followed by withdrawal of hundreds of banks from system and by further drastic fall of securities, including Government bonds. Conditions in many communities will not permit such strictly limited commercial banking as bill contemplates unless brought about very gradually. Many objects sought probably ultimately desirable, but foolish to seek radical wholesale reform during emergency like present. In interest of preserving national system we urge calm consideration of successive steps and complete avoidance of such sweeping changes as sive steps and complete avoidance of such sweeping changes as now contemplated.

NEW HAVEN BANK, WILLIAM G. REDFIELD, President. THE MERCHANTS NATIONAL BANK, LEWIS H. ENGLISH, President. SECOND NATIONAL BANK, Louis L. Hemingway, Chairman of the Board. ## DUTY ON REFINED SUGAR

Mr. BARBOUR presented a letter from Hon. A. Harry Moore, Governor of the State of New Jersey, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> STATE OF NEW JERSEY EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, March 21, 1932.

DEAR SENATOR: I desire to call to your attention a situation DEAR SENATOR: I desire to call to your attention a situation which vitally affects the economic welfare of the State of New Jersey as well as the entire port of New York. As you doubtless know, one of the largest sugar refineries in the world, the plant of the National Sugar Refining Co. of New Jersey, is situated at Edgewater, and this refinery, as well as the entire sugar-refining industry of the country, is imperiled by the inequities in the present tariff bill as relating to the duty on refined sugar. Not only does the refining industry in this country receive no protection but actually must face what amounts to a subsidy on foreign-refined sugar of 2 cents per 100 pounds. This is because of the fact that in 1930, when the present tariff act was passed, Congress imposed a duty of 2 cents a pound on Cuban raw sugar and 2.12 cents a pound on Cuban refined sugar, ignoring the fact that a United States refiner requires 107 pounds of raw sugar to make 100 pounds of refined sugar, and, therefore, must pay 2.14 cents duty for every pound of refined sugar produced as against a duty of 2.12 cents a pound on sugar refined in Cuba.

As a result of this traiff situation and of the fact that it refers that it is a sugar to the fact that it is a sugar to the fact

As a result of this tariff situation and of the fact that it requires only a moderate investment in extra machinery to convert Cuban raw sugar factories so that they may produce refined sugar, Cuban producers have been rapidly increasing their production refined sugar. During 1931 imports of refined sugar amounting to 435,030 tons came into the United States from Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines as against only 13,128 tons in 1925, an increase of over 3,000 per cent in six years. Of this amount 351,464 tons came from Cuba as against 1,182 tons in 1925. Every pound of this refined sugar produced by labor, which is paid by 25 to 50 cents a day, displaces a pound of sugar which otherwise would be refined by American labor at refineries in this country. Unless checked this swiftly increasing flood of sugars refined elsewhere may mean the elimination of the American sugar-refining industry. Two local refineries in the port of New York have been closed down for over a year, and this year the Edgewater refinery of the National Sugar Refining Co. of New Jersey has been operated at about 50 per cent of capacity. What this loss of production means to New Jersey may be visualized by citing a few figures: During the last 10 years the Edgewater refinery has purchased and melted over 8,000,000,000 pounds of raw sugar, has docked approximately 1,300 steamers, has paid to the United States in customs duties nearly $100,000,000, has used over 2,750,000 barrels of fuel oil and over 500,000 tons of coal, and has expended over $40,000,000 for its own pay roll and for the purchase of supplies manufactured by American labor. During this same period about 250,000 cars of in and out bound freight were handled at the Edgewater refinery. These figures represent about 40 per cent of the total for the National Sugar Refining Co. of New Jersey, so that it may readily be seen not only what they mean for the State of New Jersey but for the merely equalizing the difference in the tariff rates will not save the sugar-refining industry. Refiners in this country, in order to survive, must have tariff protection against lower labor and other operating costs in Cuba and elsewhere.

Our tariff laws aim to protect the United States manufacturers against foreign competition. Duties on manufactured articles almost invariably exceed those on the raw materials going into such articles. Refined sugar is practically the only exception.

Over 100 countries have duties, bounties, embargoes, and export devices to stimulate home production of sugar and bar foreign sugars. England imposed a differential duty of over 75 cents per 100 pounds on refined sugar. Canada increased its dumping duty to as high as 50 per cent. France decreed an absolute embargo on refined sugar. Only in the United States is the sugar-refining industry afforded no protection and discriminated against in favor of foreign interests by its own Government.

This situation could be corrected either through action of the This situation could be corrected either through action of the Tariff Commission, before whom the hearing has been set for April 12, under the "flexible tariff" provisions of the tariff act, or by action of Congress. I believe that no other United States industry confronted with radically changed competitive conditions more urgently requires relief than the sugar-refining industry of this country. Your interest in the correction of a manifestly inequitable situation resulting from the last tariff bill in helping to obtain a correction of this situation, either through the Tariff Commission or in Congress will be of inestimable value to our even Commission or in Congress, will be of inestimable value to our own State of New Jersey as well as to the country at large.

Respectfully yours,

A. HARRY MOORE, Governor.

Hon, W. WARREN BARBOUR. Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. BROUSSARD presented a letter in the nature of a petition signed by Col. Edward S. Bres, Engineer Reserves. president New Orleans (La.) Chapter Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESERVE OFFICERS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES, NEW ORLEANS CHAPTER, New Orleans, La., March 12, 1932.

Hon. EDWIN S. BROUSSARD.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The attention of the New Orleans Chapter, Reserve Officers' Association, has been drawn to certain legislative activities, which, if successful, would almost inevitably bring to an end the effectiveness of the military policy of the United States as set forth in the national defense act.

The New Orleans Chapter has authorized me to present its views on the proposed legislation having to do with national defense. In doing so the chapter deems it proper to give reasons for assuming to entertain these views and transmit them to you.

The acceptance of a commission in the Reserve Officers' Corps in no wise brands the officer as being militaristic. The 500 and more reserve officers of New Orleans are well known to you as representative civilians—citizens and taxpayers, the highest type of business and professional men. Every effort which is put forth by these individuals in behalf of what they concive to be service to the country is put forth with some reserved.

by these individuals in behalf of what they conceive to be service to the country is put forth with some measure of sacrifice. Although declaring that militarism is abhorrent to an American citizen, it is none the less our opinion that some measure of prepa-ration in time of peace will mean economy of human lives in time of war. Our observations during the World War lead us to this inevitable conclusion.

The cross section of our membership represents a type of men who are sincere citizens, and whose every-day activities involve them in matters of more than ordinary importance to American civilization and progress. We believe it natural to assume that in an emergency the leadership would be drawn in large measure from men of the type and standing to be found in the Reserve Officers' Association privilege of setting forth our views.

Finally, in the sincere belief that what we are doing in this association is to help the country help itself, we assume the privilege of setting forth our views.

The very purpose of our organization is to obviate the necessity of a large standing Army. We are therefore not advocating a Regular Army greater in size and number than it is at present constituted. A large part of the Regular Army at the present time is giving valuable assistance in instructing the civilian components of our defense establishment. We believe that the World War had the effect of further defeating any tendency to the growth of a military caste. In its contacts with the Reserve Officers' Association, National Guard, citizens' training camps, and Reserve Officers' Training Corps units, the Regular Army has come to learn and respect more and more the views of those of us who are primarily civilians and whose efforts as members of the citizens' components are those of disinterested service to the cause of national defense. To curtail the appropriation of the Regular Army would almost inevitably put an end to the training so necessary to make the citizens' components service of any value. essary to make the citizens' components service of any value.

Better to fit themselves for valuable service should emergency

Better to fit themselves for valuable service should emergency arise, the reserve officers should receive practical field training in addition to the training they now receive in conferences and by correspondence. It therefore follows that the amount of the appropriation set forth in the Budget should not be reduced. Having been assigned the rôle, almost, of the first quickly mobilizable line of defense of our land forces, it is our opinion that the National Guard should continue to be supported by appropriations sufficient to permit its efficient training.

There is no doubt that many of our countrymen are still bask-

There is no doubt that many of our countrymen are still basking in a false sense of national security and preparedness. They imagine that the several hundred thousand reserve officers trained during the World War are still available. At present there remain only 40,000 reserve officers with this experience. These are gradually being decreased with this experience. ually being decreased and will pass out of military consideration within the next 10 years. Of the 254,000 officers required under the 1928 general-mobilization plan, 218,000 must come from the Organized Reserves. Should an emergency arise to-morrow we would be short 111,000 officers. The reserve officers have no peace-would be short 111,000 officers. The reserve officers have no peacetime mission other than preparation for wartime responsibilities.

Annual separation from the service of reserve officers is brought about, even with the present appropriation, by the fact that this appropriation is not sufficient to formulate training facilities which can be taken advantage of by reserve officers without the greatest sacrifice, even at times having to jeopardize their civil pursuits in order to fit themselves for service of some value.
With the decreasing number of World War experienced officers it follows that an appropriation should be maintained for the purpose of replacements by training young men, otherwise the coun-

it follows that an appropriation should be maintained for the purpose of replacements by training young men, otherwise the country will revert to a condition comparable to that which existed at the time this Nation entered the World War.

It has been our observation that perhaps the most healthful activity thus far supported by the Congress under the national defense act has been the citizens' military training camps. In his first two weeks at a camp the elements of valuable training are absorbed by the trainee. While he learns the training of the soldier, he learns in greater measure the training in life—precision, orderliness, sanitation, social contact, responsibility, respect for constituted authority, and cooperative effort. It is our view that sufficient appropriation should be dedicated to the continuance of these citizens' military training camps.

In a national emergency the first and most essential need will be junior officers. The logical, almost the only source from which these are to be drawn, is the Reserve Officers Training Corps. It is our opinion that their continuation is an investment in economy is our opinion that their continuation is an investment in economy of lives and material, should an emergency arise. To quote from the Annual Report for 1924 of the Secretary of War, "The life and effectiveness of our entire reserve system and citizen army depend on the Reserve Officers Training Corps."

We believe, finally, that the War Department and the Navy Department should continue to be maintained separate and distinct. In their present separate establishment they have the sanction of the element of time. To combine them we believe would destroy the efficiency of national defense because it would disrupt their spirit and traditions without in any way effecting a saving in money. Many years of uninterrupted peace would be required for founding securely the national defense under one department. Very sincerely, Very sincerely,

CLAIMS FOR LOSSES IN MINNESOTA FOREST FIRE OF 1918

Mr. SHIPSTEAD presented a resolution adopted by the Republicans of Minnesota, in state-wide conference assembled, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas in 1918 a vast devastating fire, of railroad origin, then being operated by the United States as a war-time measure, ravaged northern Minnesota, burning cities, villages, towns, taking human life and causing destruction to an immense amount of property; and

Whereas liability was fixed upon the United States by the Min-

AMENDMENT OF WORLD WAR VETERANS' ACT, 1924

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance, I report back with amendments the bill (S. 929) relating to the taking of depositions in cases arising under section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, and I submit a report (No. 476) thereon.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this is the bill which by unanimous consent was to have been reported on last Thursday. Thursday the Senator from Utah called me on the telephone and said a report was coming to him from the bureau and that he would not be able to get the bill reported Thursday, but would be able to do so on Friday. Since we were not in session on Friday nor on Saturday, this is the first opportunity the Senator has had to report the bill.

As I understand it, under the unanimous-consent agreement, though I have not examined the calendar, the same bill automatically went back on the calendar, so it is now on the calendar twice. While I am anxious to take it up and am going to urge to have it taken up as soon as I possibly can, yet I am perfectly willing to take up the bill as now reported by the Committee on Finance. I make this statement so there may be no misunderstanding when it is reached on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator withdraw his motion to discharge the committee, which was made the other day?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes: that motion may be withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, at this point I would like to have incorporated in the RECORD a letter just received from a war veteran named Stanley T. Andrzejcuski, of South Bend, Ind., indicating difficulties encountered by him in connection with the very situation which the bill is intended to relieve.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that I have received a letter which I believe to be the same

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is probably the same letter.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest to the Senator that I think the letter has a very important bearing upon the bill to which it refers. I hope when the bill is brought before the Senate for consideration the Senator will read the letter to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I had expected to do that. but I thought, in view of the remarks made by the Senator from Nebraska just a moment ago, that it would be well to have the letter incorporated in the RECORD at this point. I ask that that may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 26, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR R. ROBINSON, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am sincerely in favor of your stand in reference to the above-entitled bill now pending. As I had the pleasure of going through one of these lawsuits just last week, of pleasure of going through one of these lawsuits just last week, of course, I am speaking from experience, which is as follows:

I enlisted in the Army April 17, 1917, took out insurance in the amount of $5,000, and went to France. While there, I was wounded March 22, 1918, and again wounded on July 22, 1918; this last damaged me quite severely. I was brought back to the States as casual in October, 1918. After several months in hospitals, I made a demand on my war-risk insurance policy, but was told that to collect I would first have to lose my head, which, of course, is still upon my shoulders. I was discharged on July 7, 1919, and from time to time thereafter was hospitalized. I made another demand on my insurance, which demand never was answered demand on my insurance, which demand never was answered.

In October, 1930, I again applied, and this time I received a letter of denial; then proceeded to file suit, which occurred on the 28th day of February, 1931. During the fall term of court the Government refused to go to trial; then, during the February, 1932, term of court, Judge Thomas W. Slick disqualified himself and named Judge Balzell to try my case.

To go back—in November, 1931, a representative of the Veterans' Bureau by name of Jack Stratton called on me in my home and after a lengthy conversation told me that there was no question but the Veterans' Administration would pay my claim without a lawsuit and save me the 10 per cent attorneys' fees. Since October, lawsuit and save me the 10 per cent attorneys' fees. Since October, 1931, there were six other Government investigators in South Bend checking up on my activities since the war.

Then, on the 9th day of December, 1931, I was called into Indianapolis for examination for insurance purposes. I made the trip to Indianapolis, and reported to Mr. John H. Ale, manager, and advised him that I refused to be examined at that time and for reason I stated that since the suit was filed and the date of trial was at the back door they had no right to call me in for examination. To this he agreed.

Finally, on the 10th day of Fahruary 1932, I was saved with a tion. To this he agreed.

Finally, on the 10th day of February, 1932, I was served with a notice to take the following depositions on the 15th day of February: Doctor Kimball, Nashville, Tenn.; Doctor Shepherd, Baltimore, Md.; and Doctor Buckley, Bedford, Mass. The examination of Doctor Buckley was made with two other doctors who are in the Veterans' Administration service, and were available on the date of trial, but we were not required to take their depositions, wither were the substance for on the date of trial, but we were not required to take their depositions, neither were they subpœnaed against me as witnesses for the Government. These depositions were to be taken on the same day and the same hour. During a lengthy conference between my attorneys and the United States district attorney's office it was finally agreed to have these depositions taken by written interrogatories, which were duly sent to the respective places. However, upon the return of these interrogatories we found that questions and cross-questions agreed upon were not used, but the deponents were questioned directly by United States district attorneys and depositions were sworn to and subscribed by notaries public in Government service.

I know of two other similar cases in South Bend; but as I can not fully explain the circumstances, I am not going to take up your not fully explain the circumstances, I am not going to take up your time with unnecessary correspondence. I was of the opinion that perhaps my experience might aid you and support your claim that the 100-mile requirement is not unreasonable. If I were to make the trip to Nashville, Baltimore, and Bedford, retain a sufficient the trip to Nashville, Baltimore, and Bedford, retain a sufficient army of counsel to represent me at the above-mentioned seaports, there would have been of no use to claim any war-risk insurance, as there would not be anything due me. I also feel that under present procedure the 10 per cent attorney's fees are insufficient, for a lawyer earns that much in drawing papers to answer all technicalities that are introduced by Government counsel, who are especially trained and paid by the Government and who have nothing else to do.

Again hoping this letter will prove beneficial, and wishing you success. I am.

success, I am,

LOAN OF WAR DEPARTMENT EQUIPMENT TO AMERICAN LEGION CONVENTION

Mr. REED. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3765) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the fourteenth national convention of the American Legion at Portland, Oreg., during the month of September, 1932, and I submit a report (No. 477) thereon. This is a bill introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Steiwer]. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma objects. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 24th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 3282. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco from the Rincon Hill district in San Francisco by way of Goat Island to Oakland; and

S. 3409. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused Indian cemetery reserves on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma to provide funds for purchase of other suitable burial sites for the Wichita Indians and affiliated bands.

DEATH OF SIR HORACE PLUNKETT

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on yesterday I noticed in the dispatches an account of the death of that great Irish cooperator, Sir Horace Plunkett. I remember when he visited the Senate and was accorded the privileges of the floor. He was one of the great humanitarians of the world who sought to organize economics upon the basis of the Sermon on the Mount itself. I spent a day once at Plunkett House in Dublin, Ireland, one of the most profitable in my life. I did not want this occasion to pass without a word in the RECORD for that great humanitarian.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the Senator from Iowa take occasion to offer this comment upon Sir Horace Plunkett. I knew him personally and join with the Senator in expressing sentiments of the highest commendation for his fine public service and for his great humanitarian efforts and accomplishments which he performed for the people of Ireland.

CONTROL OF IMPORTS AND OIL PRODUCTION

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I introduce two bills, and because of their importance I ask that the bills may be printed in the RECORD, and following them I ask consent to insert a short statement printed in one of the Washington papers explaining the two bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. King in the chair).

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 4231) for the purpose of protecting the continuity of American sources of supply of oil and products thereof, the prevention of premature exhaustion thereof, and the maintenance of adequate foreign and domestic markets for such sources of supply, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

8 4231

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tariff Commission, in addition to the authority vested in it by the provisions of United States Code, title 19, chapter 4, Subtitle III, Part II, is hereby authorized and directed to make the following findings on April 1 and October 1 of each year:

(a) An estimate of the quantities of oil and products thereof required during the succeeding six months (a) from domestic production, and (b) from withdrawal from storage within the United States, and (c) from importation from foreign countries, in order to supply, without undue injury to American sources of oil, the estimated demand within the United States and for export. Said estimates shall be promptly transmitted to the governors of the oil-producing States and to such interstate advisory body as may be created by an interstate compact authorized by the Congress.

(b) A determination of the conditions upon which oil and products thereof originating in foreign countries may be admitted to the United States and its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the island of Guam) without undue injury to American sources of oil, including the fixing of such fees, duties, and charges upon importations of oil and products thereof as should in its opinion be levied and collected in order to equalize the cost thereof at major points of consumption within the United States with the cost of domestic oil and its products at the same point, but with due regard to the preservation of American sources of supply from premature exhaustion: Provided, That no duty or fee determined by the Tariff Commission under this section shall exceed 100 per cent of the cost of the imported article delivered at refineries or major points of consumption, nor increase the cost of imported oil or products thereof to American consumers above the cost of oil or products thereof of like grade originating within the United States, nor impose any burden upon the importation of oil or products thereof for purposes of export (including the furnishing thereof in American ports for consumption upon vessels) in original or manufactured form: And provided further, That all importations of oil or products thereof shall be subject to all of the provisions respecting drawbacks and refunds contained in United States Code, title 19, hapter 4, section 1313. (b) A determination of the conditions upon which oil and prodtitle 19, chapter 4, section 1313.

SEC. 2. The findings authorized by section 1 of this act shall be promptly certified to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Federal Oil Conservation Board, which shall transmit the same to the governor of each oil-producing State and to such interstate advisory body as may be created by interstate compact or otherwise pursuant to authorization of the Congress.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, upon receipt of the certificate of the Tariff Commission authorized by section 2 of this act, to promulgate the conditions, fees, duties, and charges therein stated and to enforce, levy, and collect the same with like force and effect as the rates of duty specified in United States Code, title 19, chapter 4, Subtitle I.

The bill (S. 4232) for the conservation of oil and gas and protection of American sources thereof from injury, correlation of domestic and foreign production, and consenting to an interstate compact for such purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 4232

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of the Congress of the United States is hereby given to an agreement or compact between any two or more of the oil-producing States, for the following purposes, or any of them:

(a) To agree upon uniform principles and for enactment of laws in their respective States for the conservation of oil and gas and for the prevention of premature exhaustion of American sources of supply including provisions effecting any or all of the following objectives:

(1) Requirement of the most effective and economic use of reservoir energy.

(2) Equitable apportionment of the contents of a common

(2) Educate apportunities of source of oil or gas.

(3) Regulation and control of drilling, producing, refining, distribution, and operation methods, so as to promote maximum ultimate economic recovery and use.

(4) Retention underground of oil and gas whose production would be in excess of transportation or marketing facilities or reasonable market demand, and when required to preserve the oil pools of settled production.

(5) Prohibition of unreasonable waste of all kinds, whether occasioned by breach of the foregoing objectives or otherwise.

(6) Ratable taking or production of oil and gas from competing fields and from wells within the same field.

(7) Authorizing and regulating unit operation of a single oil

(7) Authorizing and regulating unit operation of a single oil or gas field or area.

(b) To establish by agreement an Interstate Oil Conservation Board, whose members shall be appointed by the respective compacting States (whose members may act through representatives). Said board shall, with the Federal Oil Conservation Board (composed of the Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of Navy, Secretary of War, and Secretary of Commerce of the United States, and whose members may act through representatives, for the purposes contained in this act), constitute a joint committee, to be known as the Federal-Interstate Oil Conservation Board, which may exercise the following powers: Provided, That in any action taken by the said joint committee or board which affects interstate commerce or Federal regulations the concurrence of a majority of the Federal Oil Conservation Board shall be required.

of the Federal Oil Conservation Board shall be required.

(1) To recommend to said States laws and regulations for the economic production, refining, and distribution of oil and gas;

(2) To study and forecast demand for American oil and oil

- (3) To recommend the allocation of such demand among producing areas;
- (4) To recommend State quotas of production to supply such demand:
- (5) To approve agreements operative within the several producing States entered into for the purpose of complying with the recommendations made for conservation of oil and gas of those
- (6) To cooperate with such agencies of the United States as Congress may designate and in such measures as Congress may authorize, for the coordination of imports and agreements with foreign producers;

(8) To recommend to Congress and to the States legislation to protect the consumer of the products of petroleum; and
(9) To make by-laws for the procedure of said joint committee.
All of said recommendations and all agreements approved shall be promptly filed with the Federal Oil Conservation Board, or such other agency as Congress may hereafter direct, with the governors of the compacting States, and such other agencies as said States may provide.

(c) To agree to severally make effective within their respective jurisdictions, in such manner as each State may provide, the recommendations of such body as may be established pursuant to section 1-b of this act.

section 1-b of this act.

Sec. 2. The oil and gas conservation laws of the States, whether now or hereafter enacted, in so far as they affect the foregoing objectives set forth in section 1-a of this act, or any recommendations and agreements as may be established pursuant to section 1-b of this act, shall not be deemed an unwarranted interference with commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

Sec. 3. Any compact entered into pursuant to the authorization of this act may be agreed upon by ratification or by the enactment of reciprocal legislation, and be terminated in such manner, and provide for the adherence or withdrawal of States in such manner, as the compacting States may designate; but unless a compact is consummated in accordance with the provisions of this act within three years from the date hereof, the consent of a compact is consummated in accordance with the provisions of this act within three years from the date hereof, the consent of the Congress, hereby given, may be withdrawn. The President is hereby authorized upon adoption by two or more such States, of a compact in accordance with the terms thereof, to so declare by proclamation and thereupon such compact shall become in force, as to such compact States, and thereafter in like manner the President is authorized to declare such compact effective as to other oil and gas producing States joining therein.

SEC. 4. The President is hereby authorized to appoint a representative of the United States who shall preside over any negotiation of the compact authorized by this act, and the appropriation of not to exceed $3,000 for the expenses of such representative is hereby authorized. Said representative shall promptly report to the President the execution and/or enactment of any compact authorized by this act.

SEC. 5. Because of the existing necessity, pending the effective date of the compact authorized by this act, but for a period not exceeding three years, the powers authorized by section 1-b of this act may be exercised by a temporary joint committee to con-sist of the Federal Oil Conservation Board (whose members may act through representatives) and the Oil States' Advisory Committee (whose members may act through representatives) as heretofore or hereafter appointed by such of the Governors of Arkansas, California, Colorado, Kansas, Louisiana, New Mexico, Ohio, Oklahoma, Texas, and Wyoming, and other oil-producing States as may notify the Federal Oil Conservation Board of such appointment: Provided, That in any action taken by the said joint committee or board which affects interstate commerce or Federal regulations the concurrence of a majority of the Federal Oil Conservation Board shall be required.

The newspaper statement relative to the bills introduced by Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

TWO BILLS INTRODUCED TO CONTROL IMPORTS AND OIL PRODUCTION ADVISORY COMMITTEE OFFERS PLAN TO MAKE UNITED STATES AND STATES PARTNERS IN RULING INDUSTRY

By George Sanford Holmes

Two bills to authorize the Government and the oil-producing States, under a Federal-interstate compact, to control importation and production of petroleum, have been laid before Congress.

They were drafted by the Oil State's Advisory Committee, representing 10 oil-bearing States, and introduced by Representative McKeown and Senator Thomas, both from Oklahoma.

The bills were brought to Washington by Lieut. Col. Cicero Murray, cousin of Governor Murray, of Oklahoma, and former chairman of the Oil States Committee. Murray has been succeeded as president of the advisory board by William H. Cooley, of California, but remains as executive director and counsel.

THREE NAMED AS AUTHORS

The actual authors of the acts, which, if adopted, will make Uncle Sam and the oil States partners in curbing the introduction of foreign oil and the production of domestic petroleum, were Murray, of Oklahoma; Warwick, of Denver, Colo.; and Kenner McConnell, of Columbus, Ohio.

The purpose is to bring within the limits of the law and the Constitution the present voluntary, incomplete agreement between the oil States to limit and prorate production, control refining, distribution, and operating methods, prohibit unreasonable waste, promote unit operation of pools, and conserve oil and gas resources.

CLAIM PACT INEFFECTIVE

Without the power to control imports, which are regarded by the independents as one of the chief sources of the depressed condition of the industry, it is claimed the interstate compact would be ineffective.

The oil States would solve this question in a separate bill by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to impose such duties, charges, or fees upon the introduction of foreign oil as might be recommended by the United States Tariff Commission. The commission is instructed to report, on April 1 and October 1 of each year, on the estimated needs of the country for the succeeding six months, and determine how much should be levied and collected on imported petroleum and its products to equalize the cost of production in the domestic fields.

SWEEPING POWERS PROVIDED

The compact bill would establish an interstate conservation board, consisting of representatives from the States and the Federal Oil Conservation Board. This board would have sweeping powers to recommend State laws and regulations for the economic production, refining, and distributing of oil and gas. The board also would be expected to forecast demand and allocate it among the producing areas; to recommend quotas of production and approve agreements entered into by the States to comply with its recommendations; to cooperate with Federal agencies for the coordination of imports and agreements with foreign producers; to recommend the allocation of production abroad and the amount thereof for importation in the United States for definite periods; and to recommend Federal and State legislation to protect the consumer. consumer.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930-AMENDMENTS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I submit two amendments intended to be proposed by me to House bill 6662, to amend the tariff act of 1930, one pertaining to a tariff on pulp and the other to a tariff on lumber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT-APPROVAL OF BILLS

Several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On March 25, 1932:

S. 3237. An act to legalize a bridge across the Mississippi River at Grand Rapids, Minn.

On March 26, 1932:

S. 3282. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco from the Rincon Hill district in San Francisco by way of Goat Island to Oakland.

On March 28, 1932:

S. 3409. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused Indian cemetery reserves on the Wichita Indian Reservation in Oklahoma to provide funds for purchase of other suitable burial sites for the Wichita Indians and affiliated bands.

RAILROAD LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I am speaking by courtesy of the Senator from Michigan, I shall invite attention but briefly to a matter in which, it seems to me, the Senate should be interested. In the newspapers of Saturday and Sunday is found an account of the Missouri Pacific-Morgan loan. read a few paragraphs from the report as found in the newspapers:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has caused the Inter-state Commerce Commission to approve "with some reluctance" an additional loan of $12,800,000 to the Missouri Pacific Railroad Co.

The approval will take care of, among other things, half of a loan of $11,700,000 held by the New York banks, which J. P. Morgan & Co. had notified the carrier must be paid on April 1. Later, however, the banks agreed to carry half the loan until October 1, and the board of directors of the Finance Corporation voted a loan of $5,850,000 for this purpose, subject to approval of the commission.

The commission's decision recited in full the resolution of the Finance Corporation.

Finance Corporation.

The newspaper report continues:

"We are taking the action here with some reluctance," said the mmission. "We are not convinced that the Reconstruction commission. Finance Corporation should be expected to take up banks' loans of this character.

"We yield our own views to those of that body, which, as we construe the law, is charged by Congress with responsibility for determining the question."

Mr. Eastman, one of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, passing upon this matter, said:

No good reason has been shown for approving a Government loan to enable the applicant to make a 50 per cent payment on the bank loans maturing April 1. I would have no difficulty in joining in such approval if there were any evidence that the loan is needed in the public interest. But no one has made or attempted to make such a showing. Applicant told us that the banks would not extend the loans. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation now tells us that they will extend 50 per cent. The theory is, apparently, that a Government loan to pay the other 50 per cent is necessary in order to prevent a Missouri Pacific receivership. No such necessity exists. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the Guaranty Trust Co. would not, so long as the interest on these bank loans is paid, force a receivership by refusing an extension. The repercussions would be much too dangerous in other quarters where the private interests of these financial institutions are involved. No good reason has been shown for approving a Government volved.

I realize that the majority are no more persuaded than I am that there is any need for using Government funds to "bail out" these banks. They place the responsibility on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It seems to me, however, that we have a responsibility which we can not thus escape.

Mr. President, I am informed that every form of pressure within reason and decency, perhaps decency, was used to bring about this decision upon the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think an effort to control the commission in this way is worthy of consideration.

As I say, I am speaking by courtesy of the Senator from Michigan. Later I shall discuss this question in my own time. I think it worthy of the attention of those who supposed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was created for a specific purpose and not for the purpose of enabling the banks that desire the use of money to have the advantage of the Public Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho if he is familiar with the loans that are being made to pay interest on bonds that are selling at an extremely low price? For instance, I am told that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is loaning money to pay at 4½ per cent interest on railroad bonds that are selling for 21.

Mr. BORAH. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. DILL. So that the interest paid is more than 20 per cent on the present price of the bonds.

Mr. COUZENS and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield first to my colleague, the senior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, as a result of the loan to which the Senator from Idaho has referred this morning I had the records looked up yesterday concerning the purposes of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and I will be prepared, if I can get the floor to-morrow morning, to discuss the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law as applied to the railroads, the loans the corporation has been making, and other matters dealing with the problem which the Senator from Idaho has raised.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I vield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would appreciate it immensely if the Senator from Michigan to-morrow, too, would discuss the question of a government of, for, and by international bankers.

Mr. COUZENS. What I have in mind is not so much the international bankers as it is the Van Sweringens and the treasurer of the Republican National Committee who have been more effective in this matter than have the international bankers.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator adds, then, to the peculiar situation others than the international bankers, and we might discuss all of them while we are about it.

Mr. COUZENS. I think that is correct.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask his colleague a question?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. KING. I hope the senior Senator from Michigan, in his address to-morrow, will find it pertinent to discuss the efforts which have been made to bring under the control of four railroad groups a large number of railroads east of the Mississippi River, and also the organization of one or more holding companies and the issuing of securities by the same, to secure the control of transportation lines for the purpose of allocating them to and bringing them under the control of the four railroad systems. I should be glad if he would give the Senate the benefit of his views concerning the propriety of the plan pursued of unloading upon the public hundreds of millions of dollars of securities for the purpose of obtaining funds to acquire control of numerous public carriers without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Senator's knowledge of railroad questions is great; and his views in regard to the matters just mentioned, as well as his views as to the propriety of seeking at the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission indirect if not direct approval of these stock issues and efforts to bring under the control of four railroad groups so many railroad lines and systems, the result of which might be the destruction of proper and legitimate

The question of merging competing lines or attempting to merge them and then appealing to the Interstate Commerce Commission, as is now being done, for validation of acts and procedure which it is believed by many contravene the law, I hope will be considered by the able Senator in the address which Senators, I am sure, will look forward to with interest.

Mr. COUZENS. That subject needs a great deal of discussion, but I hardly think it pertinent to the Reconstructions with the construction of the co tion Finance Corporation which I want to discuss tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield for a question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I merely wish to make a brief statement pertinent to the remarks of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] if the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] will yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield for that purpose?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is a phase of the subject that I think commends itself to the consideration of all Senators that has only been mentioned in a collateral way.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, by the statute known as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, is required to approve all loans made to railroads. That was not a perfunctory requirement. The object of the provision is manifest; it is self-evident. Now, it appears that in the case of the loan mentioned by the Senator from Idaho the commission actually disapproved the loan, but in some way was induced to give its legal indorsement. One is led to wonder how such a conclusion was brought about. The object of requiring approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission apparently will fail of accomplishment if the particular case referred to shall become a precedent.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to his colleague?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I may say that Senators probably observed that the press carried stories that some of the interstate commerce commissioners were, or at least one of them was, in conference with the railroad executives and the officers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation before these loans were agreed upon, so they can draw their own inference from that.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to address myself to the unfinished business before the Senate, if I may be permitted to do so, and I should like to proceed, at least until I can lay the groundwork of my argument, without interruption. Subsequently I shall be delighted to yield.

Thus far the discussion, particularly on the other side of the aisle, has dedicated itself largely to general tariff philosophies and to the so-called Smoot-Hawley bill without much direct attention to the issue that is raised by the legislation pending in the Senate. I shall substantially confine myself, Mr. President, to the pending proposal, because, I take it, that the most practical test of philosophy is by its concrete expression; in other words, "actions speak louder than words."

For example, we get the Republican tariff philosophy in the Smoot-Hawley bill itself. It is not only the Republican philosophy, Mr. President, but it is also the philosophy of many tariff Democrats who consistently and courageously and openly believe in protection. This means that it might be said to come the closer to being an all-round American tariff philosophy. It is even the occasional philosophy, Mr. President, of Democratic "hitch hikers" who attach themselves to these Republican tariff measures for the purpose of getting plenty of welcome protection for the home constituents while simultaneously thundering in the antitariff index.

I digress to observe, Mr. President, that "hitch hikers" always may be dangerous passengers. They are liable to assault one before the ride is over; they are calculated to sue one for damages if an accident occurs; they contribute nothing to the journey except their own dead weight; and tariff "hitch hikers" are no different from any other "hitch hikers" in that respect.

In so far as I am personally concerned, I always welcome these Democratic "hitch hikers," on the theory that they may learn to enjoy the ride, and in whatever degree the habit becomes a consistent one the people of the United States are calculated to be the beneficiaries. At any rate, we may say, for the sake of the argument, that the Smoot-Hawley bill is the Republican tariff philosophy. I proclaim it.

Similarly we get presumptively the latest revision of the volatile Democratic tariff philosophy as it exists to-day, at the other end of the Capitol, from the pending House bill as adversely reported by the Finance Committee and as already partillay disowned by the substitute Democratic measure submitted by the distinguished and versatile senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison]. Finally, in its terms we get the vocal Democratic tariff philosophy at this end of the Capitol from the Harrison substitute itself just mentioned. So I think it quite suffices, for philosophical purposes, to deal with the legislation actually in hand. This I shall largely do, ultimately offering, solely on my own responsibility, the same amendment upon which I was heard before the Finance Committee; but before pursuing this clinical method. Mr. President. I do wish to submit a general preliminary observation and exhibit.

I am one of those who profoundly believe that, despite all our travail and distress, the United States, relatively speaking, continues to be the most favored land on earth. I believe this would be impossible without tariff differentials that measure the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. It is not safe to be dogmatic upon any economic text in the midst of the world's perplexities to-day, but this is my considered view. I believe that our condition would be infinitely worse without these tariffs. I believe that in some of our situations we can not escape tragic disaster without additional tariffs.

This may well be true of oil to-day. I know it is true of copper. It is true of copper under either Republican or Democratic tariff philosophy. It is true of copper by both Republican and Democratic consent over large and seriously jeopardized areas of the United States. It is true of copper as an emergency warrant to protect not only the livelihood of thousands of our people but also the actual physical existence of great sectors of the United States.

The governors of at least 14 States have laid their petitions upon the bar of the Senate, praying for this vitally essential relief. It is just as much a relief proposition as it is to protect the victims of fire or flood or drought or famine. It is famine, and nothing less. It is a matter of life and death.

There can be no criticism of Democratic Senators who join in asking protection for copper under such circumstances, and there can be no defense for Republican Senators who join in denying the relief.

The victims of this copper tragedy confront a lethal menace entirely beyond their control, but entirely within our control. It is a menace which has developed since the Smoot-Hawley bill was passed, because it is only recently that the full exposure to ruinous African competition has become apparent—an exposure to fatal competition with unbelievably rich ore and with native labor which the United States Tariff Commission reports to run down as low as 5 and 6 cents a day in compensation. The commission joins in writing a warrant for copper tariff relief.

I assert that it would be nothing short of criminal negligence for this Congress to adjourn without equalizing this competition, and thus making it possible for numerous otherwise fine, sturdy, loyal, and useful American communities to survive.

I happen to be speaking for Michigan at the moment; but the Senators from Arizona, who honor me with their presence, can testify with equal finality respecting conditions in their State; and similar testimony is available from many other jeopardized sectors of America, which in this situation can be saved by nothing under God's sun except a tariff protective rate which will relieve them from their hazard, Here is a situation in which nothing but tariff protection can save thousands of American miners and millions of American capital. Here also is a situation in which the national defense itself is at stake. Domestic copper is indispensable to the national defense. This will not be denied. There will be no domestic copper in a short time unless copper is brought within adequate tariff protection.

This is not the moment to discuss the merits of the copper tariff in detail. I am touching it simply to verify the statement I have made that there are conditions to-day which almost by universal consent call for increased tariff protection, more rather than less. I am submitting it in passing simply to justify the fundamental thesis I am bringing to the bar of the Senate respecting my own faith in the Republican protective-tariff doctrine, as exemplified in the Smoot-Hawley bill.

Mr. President, we have heard a very great deal about the allegedly baneful effect of this legislation upon the industrial activity of America. It occurred to me that it might be wise, for a change, to consult key men in key industries themselves, instead of merely our political inclinations and our political dogma, to determine whether or not there is any truth in the oft-repeated charge that the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill is responsible in some degree for recent unemployment. So I went to the root source for my information. I addressed an inquiry to some 25 key men in 25 key protected industries in America, inquiring specifically this: "Would your unemployment have been more or less without the Smoot-Hawley bill?"

There is the straight question, addressed to those who are responsible for employment, and who, at first hand, have the right to testify from the facts. Let us see what the net result of the inquiry is.

First, in the chemical group of industries in the United States, Mr. President, the Newport Chemical Works at Passaic, N. J., Dr. E. H. Killheffer, president, answering. I quote:

Lower tariff would have made increased influx of foreign competitive goods, with resultant decreased domestic production and sales, and inevitably a substantial increase in unemployment. This has been more than indicated already, since results of depreciated foreign currencies have been tantamount to certain substantial reductions in Hawley-Smoot Act.

In other words, the first exhibit is a laboratory test bearing upon the precise inquiry which is agitating the Senate; a laboratory test which indicates that without these increased rates—rates which were not sufficiently increased to offset the differential brought against us by the fluctuating international exchange—without this saving differential, employment in this great industrial activity would have been less than it has been even under the distressing conditions of the past 18 months.

Now, we will go out into the Middle West, out into the State of Missouri, the city of St. Louis, the Monsanto Chemical Works, Dr. S. W. Allender, assistant to the president, speaking. I quote:

Our unemployment would have been greater with lower tariffs than in present law. Our unemployment would have been materially greater under a lower tariff, and our employment bears a direct ratio to the rates in the tariff.

Doctor Allender may not be a finished political economist or political propagandist, but he is an experienced industrialist who has met the burden of being responsible for American pay rolls, and his testimony is:

Our employment bears a direct ratio to the rates in the tariff bill.

Another example from the chemical group. We are now in Sandusky, Ohio, the American Crayon Co., Mr. Cary W. Hord testifying:

Our employment would have been decidedly less during the past year with lower tariff than in present law, although through some apparent evasion a flood of foreign goods at prices we can not meet continues to come in on certain lines; and this fact—

The mere competition produced by an evasion of the Smoot-Hawley rates—

This fact has greatly reduced employment in these departments here during the past year.

If evasion is disastrous, it goes without saying that the complete absence of this protection would be completely fatal.

Now, over in the chinaware division of the tariff law. I am quoting Mr. W. A. Bonitz, of the Crescent Brick Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa. His answer to my question is:

With lower tariff, unemployment would have been greatly increased and scale of wages infinitely lower.

He may not be much of a politician, Mr. President. He just happens to be an American employer who has to find the trade to get the ways and means to employ labor and pay it its wage. His testimony is that he could not have done it on any comparable scale without the protection which his industry has enjoyed.

Mr. D. W. Scammell, of the Scammell China Co., of Trenton, N. J.:

Our employment situation would have been improved with higher tariff.

Mr. R. H. Pass, of the Onondaga Pottery Co., at Syracuse, N. Y.:

Answering your question, employment would be lower. Direct labor very large part of pottery production cost. American potteries more efficient, but very low wage scales in foreign potteries necessitate high rate of duty if on basis foreign values.

Mr. H. B. Higgins, vice president of the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., of Pittsburgh:

Lower tariffs would have increased imports, which would have reduced our sales and consequently increased our unemployment.

It seems to be unemployment in which we are primarily concerned. Here, again, comes the testimony of the men out on the firing line upon whom we must ultimately depend to provide us with employment; and they are reporting upon the tools with which they must be provided through their Congress.

Mr. Herman K. Kimble, of the Kimble Glass Co., of Vineland, N. J.:

The industry of fabricating glass is solely dependent on tariff.

Now over in the metals schedule, Mr. President. I am quoting Mr. Roy C. McKenna, president of the Vanadium-Alloys Steel Co., at Latrobe, Pa.:

In reply to your telegram of March 8 I will state that without a protective tariff it would not be possible for the tool-steel industry to exist in the United States.

Without a protective tariff we would not be in business.

And if you can make more employment by driving great institutions of that character out of business, then black is white and right is wrong.

Now I quote from Mr. F. P. Gormley, vice president of the Electro-Metallurgical Co., of New York City:

With lower tariffs than provided in present law our output and employment would have been much less during last year. This applies to plants in Michigan, West Virginia, Virginia, Ohio, New York, California, New Jersey, and other States.

There is a cross-sectional national view of the menace wrapped up in any desertion of the fundamental protective philosophy upon which this country has been erected and upon which it must stand if it proposes to persevere.

Now I quote from Mr. S. L. Nicholson, of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., of New York City:

Answering your question, our unemployment would have been greater with lower tariff.

Is that what we want, more unemployment? No; what we want is the fruit of a sustained protection which in a normal market can restore American labor to its normal advantages.

Now I quote Mr. Taylor Strawn, vice president of the Elgin National Watch Co., at Chicago, Ill.:

Our unemployment during past year would have been far greater with lower tariffs than at present law.

Mr. F. C. Beckwith, president of the Hamilton Watch Co., at Lancaster, Pa., similarly testifying, said:

Our unemployment would have been much greater under lower tariff.

Now, Mr. President, I am over in the cotton section, and I quote Mr. Ward Thoron, of the Merrimac Manufacturing Co., of Boston, Mass.:

Replying to your telegram, unemployment would have been greater with lower tariffs.

Now, Mr. O. S. Stockman, of the Armstrong Cork Co., at Lancaster, Pa.:

Our unemployment during past year would have been greater with lower tariffs.

What becomes of the charge that this present tariff law is responsible for unemployment, in the face of direct exhibits of this character?

I quote Mr. S. A. Salvage, of the Viscose Co., in New York City, and this deals with the great product of rayon, in which the South is so vitally concerned:

Lower tariffs than in the present law would have greatly increased the unemployment during the past year in the six large plants which we operate.

I quote now Mr. George Backeland, vice president of the Bakelite Corporation, in New York City:

Without question our unemployment would have been greater with lower tariffs than in the present law.

I quote Mr. A. E. Payson, president of the American Thermos Bottle Co., at Norwich, Conn.:

Lower tariffs during past year would have precipitated serious situation in this industry. Could not have maintained anywhere near present activity or present wage scale. Thoroughly believe American public sadly unaware of significance of tariff importance in maintaining American living standard. Fully convinced that if tariff is lowered eventual political repercussion would be enormous.

Next I quote Mr. B. L. Babcock, of the Endicott-Johnson Corporation, at Endicott, N. Y.:

Had shoe tariff been lower, unquestionably our unemployment would have been greater during past year.

Now I go over into the hardwood-flooring section and quote a communication from the upper peninsula of Michigan, from the J. W. Wells Lumber Co.:

If we did not have present maple-flooring protection rates against Canada, unemployment would be at least 10 per cent greater than it is.

In the same industry and in the neighboring city of Oconto, Wis., the Holt Hardwood Co. testify as follows:

Flooring industry at very low point. Think would reduce it at least 10 per cent more should tariff be removed from Canadian flooring.

Mr. President, many such exhibits are available. I have touched only the rim of American industry. I have touched it at vital and significant and typical spots, however, and with universal response the answer is that unemployment, far from being traceable to the tariff, in the last 18 months would have been infinitely greater, infinitely more of a menace, infinitely more of a burden upon the American people and American labor if the tariff rates had been lower and if the Smoot-Hawley bill had not been passed. We confront a condition and not a theory.

One other general observation before going to the merits of the pending bill. Much is being said here not only about our tariffs, but also about the tariffs of other countries in other parts of the world. We are told that our recently enacted Smoot-Hawley law through its tariff rates has precipitated reprisal rates abroad, and that thus we have committed economic suicide, that thus we are forcing American capital to expatriate itself.

I intend to advert to this later, Mr. President, but I digress now on the question of reprisal and expatriation. Is it really reprisal? Our factories started to send their branches abroad as long ago as 1880. There is an element of abstract industrial logic in this process which would have followed in the natural sequence of events regardless of our tariff. I do not applaud the process, but I understand it.

For instance, our first motor branch went out of Detroit and into Canada in 1905 or 1906. That was 15 years before the Fordney-McCumber bill and a quarter of a century before the Smoot-Hawley bill. Certainly it went to overcome what was then a perfectly normal and natural Canadian tariff, but it went for other purposes; it went in order to get empire preference, among other important things. That is not an episode in a tariff war; it is a rational international trade process.

This expatriation unquestionably continued on a constantly increasing scale, but it was not always a tariff motive, Mr. President, which was responsible, as in the case of England, for example, where there were no tariffs; there it was primarily in the interest of facilitated distribution that our capital expatriated itself and went abroad.

Ultimately, it is quite true, foreign tariffs were generally tilted, with resulting impetus to the establishment of American branch factories abroad. But no one ever will be able to settle conclusively the question as to where the primary stimulation came from, who started it, which came first, the foreign tariff forcing us to build branches abroad, or our foreign branches teaching foreigners a way to force us to build abroad. It is as inscrutable as the argument as to which came first, the chicken or the egg.

At any rate, why call these foreign tariffs reprisals, if we want to deal in economic facts and not in mere political conversation? It is not reprisal when we raise our rates; it never occurs to anybody to charge that we are inflicting reprisals upon some one else when we raise our rates. It is self-defense. Why is it anything else abroad?

In his keynote election speech of 1930 the brilliant Canadian Premier said:

The United States learned a long time ago that to become a great nation it must look to itself—

This is the Canadian Premier speaking of the United

It developed its industries and its natural resources, encouraged and protected its agriculture, so that out of a slow beginning it has grown to those gigantic proportions where its strength will overflow its borders. That is the story of the United States. You must do as it did. You must fight for your own.

That is not reprisal, Mr. President; that is the mere acceptance of a leaf out of the book of experience.

There is a vast difference between self-defense and reprisal. But if this be reprisal, how, pray, could it have been avoided? Ah, that would have been easy. It could have been very easily avoided; but how? In the words of the Canadian Premier, by not becoming a great nation, by not developing our industries and resources, by avoiding the gigantic proportions to which he refers. That is how, very simply and easily, we could have avoided what are called reprisals.

If it be reprisal, how may it be changed? Equally easily; by sacrificing, perhaps, in a chummy international conference such as is invited by the pending Democratic bill, these things which have builded the base of our economic achievement.

My own view runs in the other direction. To be sure, this is a foreshortened world, and we must recognize new international necessities. To be sure, we want export trade, and we must be prepared to seek it by every rational means. But first of all, America must preserve the control and dominion of her own domestic markets, worth eighteen times as much as any export trade we ever had at its very peak. America must preserve and control her own domestic market not only against cheap foreign competition but against the products of her own expatriated capital, or we shall be trading our birthright for a mess of pottage.

Now, let me get to the immediate matter in hand. On the 7th of January I submitted an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, to the House bill now before the Senate. At this point I want to call from the table the amendment, which was printed on January 7, intended to be proposed by me to H. R. 6662. I now wish to offer this amendment in the nature of a substitute for the substitute submitted by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Does the Senator want it read?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it is unnecessary to read it at this particular moment, because I can summarize in a few sentences its precise objective, and I am anxious to save the time of the Senate.

The House proposal, which is the proposal before us with an adverse report from the Finance Committee, is to eliminate all executive flexibility and to substitute so-called legislative flexibility. The so-called Harrison substitute proposes approximately the same thing in slightly different terms. The substitute which I have offered is in the precise language of the so-called Norris-Simmons formula with which we were all familiar when the Smoot-Hawley bill was written and which I am offering confined exclusively to the free list not as a substitute but as an annex to the existing law.

Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that both of these Democratic formulæ respecting flexibility actually propose less flexibility rather than more in the net total. I respectfully submit that they mortgage one good idea, to wit, the extension of flexibility to the free list, with a score of thoroughly bad ideas. I respectfully submit that they suggest legislation which every man in both branches of Congress knows can not become a law, and therefore we are simply engaged in "shadow boxing" unless we are willing to divert the issue to a practical proposition which stands some show of becoming law and which, if it becomes law, will serve a useful supplemental purpose in respect of the existing tariff structure.

Now let me proceed with the actual factual analysis. It is true that the so-called Harrison substitute—if I may use that shortened term hereafter without intending any disrespect to my able friend from Mississippi-avoids some of the thoroughly ridiculous anomalies contained in the tariff formula sent to us from the House. The 60-day legislative recapture clause, if I may thus describe it, which was inserted in the House Democratic formula, it is perfectly obvious reduces the whole legislation to the basis of a paradox if its purpose is to recapture legislative authority, because anyone familiar with the legislative process knows that a mere negative right on the part of Congress to veto a rate over a period of 60 days could easily, yea, almost automatically, be manipulated to defeat any actual consideration on the floor of Congress. Therefore, the formula as it comes to us from the Democratic House is not a formula to transfer flexing authority from the President to the Congress, but it is a formula to transfer flexing authority from both the President and the Congress to the United States Tariff Commission.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not fair to state that the 60-day provision was adopted as an amendment offered upon the floor of the House?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is entirely correct.

Mr. HARRISON. And that it was not reported out of the committee?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is entirely correct. It was adopted in one of those unfortunate coalitions which then and now hazards the Senator's party in the other House. I do not expect the Senator from Mississippi to fall into any such trap in such an illogical situation as the House bill proposes. So we have his substitute. Let us see now in what point the so-called Harrison substitute and the so-called House formula have common interests and objectives.

First, they are calculated to kill all flexibility as a practical fact. Both of them are calculated to give the country less flexibility instead of more. In my judgment, what the country wants is more flexibility rather than less. Under either of these formulæ—either the one that comes to us from the House or the one submitted by my able friend from Mississippi—there is no flexibility at all when Congress is not in session. Congress is not in session on an average of nine months out of one year and six months out of another year. In other words, under either of the proposals we lose 15 months of flexibility out of every 24. I submit that that is a totally reactionary direction in which to turn our tariff philosophy. Indeed, under any such philosophy all of 39 advantageous Tariff Commission reports which we had during our recent recess would have failed.

I digress long enough to suggest, as indicative of the fact that the United States Tariff Commission deals judicially with the problem, that out of the 39 reports 17 reported decreases in rates and 12 reported increases. Out of the 39 cases those in which increases were specified were valued at $17,000,000, those in which decreases were specified were valued at $44,000,000, and those in which no changes were specified were valued at $137,000,000. So I submit that the first indictment against either the House formula or the so-called Harrison formula is that it lacks flexibility when Congress is not in session.

Even when Congress is in session I very seriously question whether either one of the formulæ guarantees any flexibility at all. Certainly it would be a simple proposition in a short session of Congress to avoid congressional action upon the recommendation of the Tariff Commission, in which event there would be no flexibility through that 12 months, none during the 3 months when Congress is meeting, and none during the 9 months when Congress is not meeting.

Furthermore, it is entirely possible that there could be not even a pretense of flexibility under any circumstances through those two formulæ if the Congress declines to change its own rules. The Constitution, in Article I, section 5, as all Senators know, permits the Senate to make its own rules. We can not bind our successors. We can not bind any future Congress. Therefore, if the pending formulæ, referring either to the House formula or the Harrison substitute, be adopted, it may be virtually the end of tariff flexibility. At any rate, it trades a certainty which we now have for an uncertainty. In net effect it contemplates a static tariff, it is not scientific, it is not progressive, it is not liberal, and it merely wears the name of "flexibility" without offering any of the actual advantages which the country has come to expect from the honest operation of a flexible provision in the law.

On the other hand, the substitute which I have submitted—and I am inviting it particularly to the attention of the able senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], who has just reentered the Chamber—is verbatim the so-called Norris-Simmons formula of two years ago now applied under my proposal exclusively to the free list, not as a substitute for existing flexibility but as an annex to the existing law, so as to provide flexibility for the free list as well as the balance of the tariff structure, and is definitely and distinctly an expansion of tariff flexibility upon a basis which is thoroughly and absolutely sound.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I make bold to ask the Senator from Michigan how he defines and what does he term a flexible tariff, to which he has just alluded?

Mr. VANDENBERG. My answer to the Senator would be that a flexible tariff is one in which practical power to change existing rates under changed economic conditions is granted in quarters where it can be exercised within limits defined by the Congress itself. In other words, I am entirely conscious of the danger of encroaching upon a constitutional expansion in the granting of flexible powers, but under none of these proposals, unless it be the House proposal, do I find that problem involved.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have not had opportunity of reading the proposed substitute submitted by the Senator nor did I quite catch its scope of meaning. Am I to understand it purposes giving power to take from the free list a given article and impose a tariff duty?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is proposed by my substitute, precisely as it was originally proposed under the so-called power, as I understood him.

Norris-Simmons formula, to permit the United States Tariff Commission to report to Congress in respect of articles upon the free list, whereupon those reports and those suggested rates shall have right of way through Congress without becoming an omnibus. The only difference is that the original Norris-Simmons formula was intended to apply to all rates and as a substitute for Executive flexibility. I use it only for the free list as an annex to the existing Executive flexibility which, as the Senator knows, does not reach the free list at all. There is no free-list flexibility to-day.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In other words, to take from the free list a given article and place it upon the protective list?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Gladly.

Mr. HEBERT. As I understand the Senator's proposal, it would not authorize those recommendations to be put into effect by the President in any event beyond the articles on the free list?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. HEBERT. But those recommendations which the Tariff Commission makes would have to come to Congress for action before they could be made effective?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct; in fact, Mr. President, I know of no possible way in which we can have flexibility for the free list transmitted into Executive hands, because there is no way by which Congress can write limits for raising or lowering rates upon commodities which either are on the free list or which are calculated to be put upon the free list. The Supreme Court has told us that we must fix metes and bounds when we give any power of flexibility to the Executive.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, does the Senator's substitute so change the law in respect to rates of duty as to require any congressional action?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct; there is no other way, in my judgment, Mr. President, that we can flex the free list constitutionally.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And does that hold in respect to the protected list?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; the substitute deals solely with the free list and is an annex to the existing flexibility.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Smoot in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator from Michigan if the ideal flexible tariff would not be one giving the President absolute power to fix different tariff rates, adjusting them from time to time according to the barometer of business?

Mr. VANDENBERG. We can never have it ideal, Mr. President, because we can not take the ultimate tariff control away from the legislative branch of the Government. I simply feel that the legislative branch must at times sublet certain of its responsibilities, as a practical proposition.

Mr. CONNALLY. But let me ask the Senator, suppose that the presidential adjustments ran counter to the theory of the Senator that Congress should hold that ultimate power, would not that present a very serious difficulty? Here is business in a jam, and Congress nine months in recess; would it not be an ideal system simply to give the Executive expert assistance and advice and delegate the proper power to adjust the rise and fall of tariff rates in harmony with the rise and fall of commerce and business? Would not that be the ideal system?

Mr. VANDENBERG. However ideal it might be, the Senator well knows that it is impracticable, and I have no interest in it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator favors that with reference to the free list. He says that the President should have that power, as I understood him. has evidently just entered the Chamber, totally misconstrues my proposition. The free-list proposal which I am submitting is exclusively within the control of Congress and unrelated to the Executive in any respect.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then the Senator believes that the Congress may properly delegate its authority to let the President fix the rates so far and no farther? Is that the idea?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In respect to commodities which are on the free list.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, why would it not be perfectly safe to let the President fix rates without limit? Why not give him the full power? Is the Senator not willing to trust the

Mr. VANDENBERG. We can not fix a limit in respect to free-list rates, because there is no basis to which to attach the limitation.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am speaking of articles now on the free list.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why is the Senator willing to trust the President to raise rates 50 per cent and not willing to trust him to raise them 51 per cent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I hope the Senator realizes that I am fully cognizant of the fact that he is trying to detour me into some political observation respecting the President, the tariff, and so forth, but I beg him to believe that I am submitting this proposition, as I intended to at the outset, in the very earnest hope that it may be considered exclusively as an economic problem and not a political one.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that the inquiry of the Senator from Texas is not political in the sense of being partisan. It is political, however, in the sense of trying to preserve the fundamental principles of this Government and in balancing the governmental power as between the three branches of the Government. I have no disposition to embarrass the Senator. I was simply trying to get his viewpoint as to the philosophy which he started to discuss early in his address and the basis of his views as to how far the power ought to be delegated and how far it ought to be restrained.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is not embarrassing me in the slightest, and if I have failed in any degree to indicate my theory, I should be delighted to have the Senator pursue his interrogation.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad the Senator accepts my statement as not being embarrassing or partisan. I should feel very guilty if I had suggested anything that was political in the course of the Senator's speech.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator, in the interest, I think, of a better understanding of the three propositions. As I understand, we have the House bill, we have substitute for the entire bill offered by the Senator from Mississippi, and we have another substitute to the entire bill by the Senator from Michigan. Is that correct?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. In a good many respects, at least, all of these bills are alike?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is particularly true of the first

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I wish to suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent, if he is willing to permit it to be done now, to have the original bill and the two proposed substitutes printed in parallel columns, so that we may very easily see the difference, where there is a difference, and recognize the similarity where there is a similarity.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will be very glad to yield to the Senator to make that request.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I ask unanimous consent that the bill as it passed the House, the substitute offered by the

Mr. VANDENBERG. On the contrary, the Senator, who offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] may be printed in parallel columns for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now, Mr. President, I want to hurry on, because I dislike to infringe upon the time of the Senate any longer than is absolutely necessary upon this question. I pass the second element which is involved in the House formula and in the so-called Harrison substitute, namely, the provision for a consumers' counsel. Regardless of what its implications may be—and I confess to a present feeling that the implications may be prejudicial-nevertheless, so far as I am concerned, it is a purely academic and minor matter in relation to the larger contemplations which I am undertaking to submit to the Senate's view.

So I come finally, Mr. President, to the third proposition, namely, the strange proposal for an international economic conference with a view "to lowering excessive tariff duties." Of course we are not told what the excessive tariff duties are; there is no bill of particulars; there is merely a magnificent and thoroughly safe general gesture that we are to assault "excessive tariff duties"; and we are to do it through the primary contact of an international conference.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this is one of the most amazing reversals in traditional American attitude that has ever been submitted in the Congress of the United States. We have proclaimed for 140 years, upon every conceivable occasion, that control of our tariff rates is our exclusive domestic prerogative, and whenever even a shadow has threatened that prerogative in connection with treaties and international engagements we have hastened to repeat and reiterate, by reservation and by resolution, that, so far as we are concerned, we retain for ourselves exclusive sovereignty over our own tariff structures. Yet, Mr. President, here is a proposed formula not for delegation of power to the President, oh, no; not for delegation of power to the United States Tariff Commission; no; but delegation of power to international bargain hunters; and we are to be supposed, for the first time in our lives, to come out of that sort of an engagement with some advantage to ourselves. The saving grace of requiring ultimate congressional approval does not change the basic challenge.

It is perfectly impossible to do this sort of thing, Mr. President, unless we first admit our willingness to lower ourselves to a world standard of living and of wage. Upon what basis can we meet our neighbors of the world in conference in respect to so-called "excessive tariff duties" until we have a common standard of living and wage as a basis upon which to deal? The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, in his testimony before the Finance Committee, called this thing a pious aspiration. I think the brutal truth is, Mr. President, that it is impracticable buncombe, and I think also that Col. Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, was everlastingly correct when he recently estimated that 921/2 per cent of the articles produced in this country are consumed in the domestic market, with only 71/2 per cent shipped abroad, and when he said:

If necessary we could toss this  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent out of the window and still lead the world back to prosperity. If once we restore confidence at home, 90 per cent of our troubles are over.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me quote to the Senator from Michigan what the President of the United States said at Boston in the campaign of 1928 upon that particular point:

There has never been such an increase in a similar period before in our history. Our total volume of exports translates itself into employment for 2,400,000 families, while its increase in the last even years has interpreted itself into livelihood for 500,000 additional families in the United States. And in addition to this, millions more families find employment in the manufacture of imported raw materials. The farmer has a better market for his produce by reason of their employment.

The present President, then Candidate Hoover, was speaking about the increase in our world trade and about the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison], and the substitute | relatively small amount of our products that went abroad.

Based upon his figures, the 714 or 8 per cent of exports | tion of our tariffs. I never saw but one bill of particulars, account for the employment of two and a half million families. If that is negligible, the Senator is quite welcome to the consolation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I hope before I conclude that I shall deal with sufficient candor with that arithmetic entirely to satisfy the Senator from Georgia respecting my estimate of it. I will say at the moment, interrupting the sequence which I am pursuing, that I care not from what source the appeal may come, I am unable, in simple fundamental logic, to understand why employment for a million and a half people, if that is the measure of our export trade, can ever be weighed against the employment of the other one hundred and eighteen and a half million people at home, where the primary emphasis and impetus must be given.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have heard that argument a great many times.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And the Senator is going to hear it again during the next 30 minutes, because I have some exhibits to offer relative to that proposition.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not willing the Senator should mis-quote his own President.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not quoting the President at all; the Senator from Georgia is quoting the President.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not willing that the Senator from Michigan should misinterpret him. The President said that our export trade accounted for 2,400,000 families.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well; 2,400,000 families-how many families are there in the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. I will take the floor when the Senator finishes, because I am utterly tired of hearing argument on his side as if the only friends of labor stood on the other

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am making no pretenses to monopoly of wisdom or of devotion to labor, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the habitual Republican attitude. Mr. VANDENBERG. And I can well understand why the Senator from Georgia has tired of hearing this story told.

Mr. GEORGE. I am tired of it, Mr. President, because it is the grossest hypocrisy, fraud, and sham. I am utterly tired of it. In the name of American labor, and to take care of the needs of American labor, we are constantly reminded, and the insinuation is direct, that on the other side of the aisle stand the only friends of those who labor in the United States. I am calling to the Senator's attention the statement made by President Hoover himself in 1928 that our export trade, small though it be as compared to our entire commerce, accounts for the employment of 2,400,000 American families.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his observation; and on the question of sham and hypocrisy I commend to him and his colleagues upon his side of the aisle the advice submitted to them by their own colleague, the present able junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], speaking on September 27, 1931, as follows:

To accept leadership, the Democratic Party must restate its fundamentals and face back to a clean-cut attitude toward its historic tariff and commercial policies, ridding itself of such equivocal utterances as the Houston platform.

Mr. President, no one can get me to say that export trade is not important. Export trade is desperately important. It is an essential responsibility upon government to foster export trade so far as it can be done within the economic limitations which we confront. Export trade is a factor in American prosperity which has a direct and absolute bearing upon the pay envelope. But the domestic market, Mr. President, which is worth $90,000,000,000 a year in its value, is worth just eighteen times as much as this export trade at its utter peak; and if the price of seeking to recapture some of this export trade is to submit all of this domestic trade to the hazard and exposure of foreign imports, then I submit it is a bad bargain for the American people, always was, and

Of course, we have no information as to precisely what is contemplated in this international conference for the regula-

Mr. President. Therefore, I shall have to depend upon that one bill of particulars; and it is a very interesting exhibit.

Last August I had certain correspondence with the distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] respecting this tariff matter. In the course of our correspondence, after the exchange of several letters, my able friend from Tennessee consented to become specific, and he wrote a formula for international control of trade; and what was it. Mr. President? Perhaps this is the formula which is contemplated by this veiled and vague language in the pending so-called Harrison substitute.

What was the magnificent international bargain that was thus submitted by the Senator from Tennessee, I assume speaking for his party? This is what it was:

First, he would put everything right back to the Fordney-McCumber rates. That would be the first act. Of course, agriculture would lose the most by that operation, because the Tariff Commission reported, after a year's operation, that 93.73 per cent of all increases are upon products of agricultural origin, measured in value, the average increase being 11 per cent. So the first thing my friend from Tennessee proposes to do is to wipe out all of that agricultural advantage. That is before he even starts to make a bargain in this international conference.

Then, what does he propose to do? I am quoting his letter of last August. Then he proposed horizontally to reduce everything 25 per cent. That is the next step. We have not yet begun to barter and trade in the international conference, but we are going to in just a minute.

After he has gotten this 25 per cent off the Fordney-McCumber rates, then he proposes to take off 25 per cent more. I quote him-as an evidence of good faith to our foreign customers.

That is the next step.

Now, we are down to 50 per cent of the Fordney-McCumber rates. We have not yet begun to barter and trade. We are just generous up to now; but now we are going to start to barter and trade, and what are we going to do?

First, any nation increasing its purchases from us by 25 per cent is to get another 25 per cent reduction on our tariffs.

That is not all. Then any nation increasing its purchases from us by 50 per cent is to get 50 per cent off those rates, which already are down 50 per cent. So we are zero and we have complete and total and absolute free trade to all intents and purposes.

Now, let us just analyze that a minute and see whether there is any percentage of advantage to our United States in this sort of pursuit of a nebulous and elusive international bargain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. At this point I may call the Senator's attention to the fact that last week, at a meeting of the Finance Committee, there appeared before the committee Mr. Chester H. Gray, representing the agricultural organizations of the country; Mr. Flynn, representing the labor organizations of the country; and other representatives of certain organizations; and they were not asking for any decreases. They called the attention of the committee to the fact that there had to be increases over existing law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Why, certainly; but here we have the one and only specification that I am able to find as to precisely what is contemplated after we enter this international conference to discuss our tariff rates with Europe, Asia, Africa, and the rest of the world.

Now, I want to analyze this proposal, this specification. This is how it works; it is very simple arithmetic:

Our normal domestic trade is worth $90,000,000,000. Let us conservatively call it $80,000,000,000.

Our foreign trade at its peak was worth between five and six billion dollars. It is now less than $3,000,000,000. Let us call it $4,000,000,000 for purposes of calculation.

All right. Now, the first step proposed by my able and distinguished friend the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] in this bill of particulars is to hazard $80,000,-000,000 against $4,000,000,000. He proposes to give the rest of the world a 25 per cent advantage out of the $80,000,-000,000 in return for increasing its purchases from us by 25 per cent out of the four billion. In other words, that is a 20 to 1 shot for the Old World.

That is not all. Then we give them a 50 per cent privilege in the eighty billion for a 50 per cent increase of purchases from us, which are four billion. That is a 40 to 1 shot in favor of the Old World.

I am totally unable to understand how anybody can argue for a passing second that there is any remote possibility of advantage to the United States, its labor, its agriculture, and everybody in it, from any such effort to chase bargains in an international conference. Certainly the formula to which I have just adverted would be a tragedy and a calamity, and could offer no remote hope of possibility of advantage to us in any possible respect. I believe the exhibit is typical of this whole theory of setting out upon the trail of reciprocal tariffs at the present time.

There is an organization up in New York which is entitled "The World Trade League of the United States." It is at the moment exceedingly active in propagandizing Congress and the country in behalf of this reciprocal tariff relationship which is contemplated by both the House formula and the so-called Harrison formula. Recently it circulated a statement which undertook to present "35 plain reasons for a reciprocal tariff policy."

Now I want to refer to just a few of them, Mr. President. Before I do so, I want to say this about the World Trade League of the United States: I do not speak in criticism of its membership in any way, shape, or manner. It is entitled to promote its own views. It is entitled to consult its own welfare. Few of us fail to do that, consciously or subconsciously, in connection with our attitude toward government. Precisely the same thing is true of spokesmen for protected industries when they testify in behalf of protection. I make no complaint and no criticism; but I do want, at the outset, to indicate that this at least is not a neutral battery which is leveling this latest barrage against reasonable and essential tariff protection in the United States.

I have been able to identify five of the distinguished gentlemen whose names are listed upon the World Trade League of the United States stationery. I again say that they are estimable gentlemen.

Mr. George F. Bauer is the head of the foreign trade committee of the National Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. R. F. Bausman is director of the export department of the Gold Medal Flour Co.

Mr. Ernest B. Filsinger operates a merchandising and sales service, particularly at foreign points, for American manufacturing concerns.

Mr. W. B. Blood is a manufacturing exporters' agent.

Mr. Peter Fletcher is president of the National Council of American Importers and Traders.

Now, I want to advert briefly to three or four or five of the so-called "plain reasons" for this international tariff bargain counter to which I have referred. I quote the league:

 President Hoover stated in 1928 that our total export trade provided livelihood at that time for 2,400,000 families.

This entirely verifies the quotation which was submitted to me a moment ago by the able and distinguished junior Senator from Georgia. Continuing to read:

The 50 per cent drop in our exports since then, largely due to excessive tariffs throughout the world, must therefore have brought suffering to 1,200,000 families, or probably some 3,000,000 individuals.

Mr. President, without checking, I am perfectly willing to assume that these figures are true, for the sake of the argument. If 3,000,000 families depend upon exports, at least 50,000,000 families depend upon domestic markets. We do not help America by jeopardizing 50,000,000 families in behalf of 3,000,000; and I do not admit that we jeopardize even the 3,000,000 in normal times, and under normal reactions, by our tariff laws.

Here is another proposition, one of these "plain reasons for a reciprocal tariff policy":

Other hundreds of thousands of American citizens earn their livelihood in normal times in the many agencies of distribution—such as steamship lines, railroads, etc., which handle the inward flow of goods imported from other countries. These, too, have felt the drop in our foreign trade most severely.

Again I ask Senators to note the words, "inward flow of goods imported from other countries." There is the key and the text of this propaganda which is submitted by the World Trade League of the United States, under great emphasis, all over the country at the present time, "inward flow of goods imported from other countries." Can we save America with an inward flow of goods from other countries? Can we employ American labor with an inward flow of goods produced by foreign labor to displace goods produced by American labor? I commend the league's candor. It is guilty of no sophistry or pretense. It wants reciprocal tariffs to produce an inward flow. But I submit that America needs something besides an inward flow of goods, and the products of foreign labor, at the present writing. It needs domestic jobs for domestic livelihoods.

Let me quote another of these 35 "plain reasons":

During the last few years American production facilities have been geared to a demand far exceeding that of our 120,000,000 people. We must cultivate our foreign market in order to keep American workmen employed.

Yes; we must cultivate the foreign market. I am not talking sarcastically. We must cultivate it as far as we can, but not at the expense of the domestic market, or, as I have indicated time and time again, and I think proven beyond controversy, we have made an utterly indefensible sacrifice of our best welfare.

Here is another of these 35 "plain reasons":

The fact that millions of our fellow citizens must answer this question—

Meaning the question of a job-

The fact that millions of our fellow citizens must answer this question negatively at the present time has been laid to overproduction. It is, however, not due so much to overproduction as to underconsumption. It is estimated that total world-wide trade between countries has dropped 40 per cent since 1929, chiefly due to rising tariff walls.

Could two sentences, Mr. President, more explicitly answer themselves? First we are told that the world problem is underconsumption, and then we are told in the same sentence that it is not underconsumption but tariff barriers. Of course, it is the former and not the latter, and the figures that are available to us from the Department of Commerce indicate that we still maintain our relative share of this market, which is serving an underconsuming world to-day, and it would be a miracle if, under any circumstances, we could get more than our share at the present time.

Here is another of these "plain reasons" for a reciprocal tariff policy:

Over seven-eighths of the world's population here and abroad lies in the low-income group and can buy, even in normal times, only those agricultural and manufactured products which are sold at a low price to consumers.

Right. Much more than seven-eighths of the world population is in low-income groups, normally speaking, compared with the United States. America, normally speaking, is the high-income group—yes—and, even abnormally speaking, it is still the high-income group even to-day. Reciprocal tariffs would trade our high-income market for the world's low-income market. The result inevitably would be to reduce us to the low-income level.

Here is another of these 35 reasons:

Ninety-two per cent of the world's population dwells outside of the United States and is poorly supplied with the things that we can produce. To show the tremendous potential importance of this to American industry, the case of the automobile might be cited; nine-tenths of the world's inhabitants, living outside our frontiers, enjoy the use of only 25 per cent of all motor vehicles.

Very well. Does that argue for low reciprocal tariffs? Not unless logic gets delirium tremens. Let us examine the contention. Eight per cent of the world's population is in the United States and owns 75 per cent of all the motor cars in the world. That is true. There are more motor cars in the United States than there are even telephones or electrical connections. Why is the United States in that favored attitude to-day? The chief reason is that we have had mass buying power. Again the term is relative, in view of the situation in which the whole world finds itself.

Why have we had mass buying power? Because we protect the American producer and the American laborer, who, in turn, are these consumers. In other words, the statement from this World Trade League is the most eloquent possible tribute to protection and the value of the home market. Yet what does it propose? It proposes to break down our buying power and to build up an alien buying power. I know of no salvation in that direction.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to ask the Senator whether he claims that the 30,000,000 people on the farms of the United States have mass buying power at the present time?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa is familiar with the fact that I supported the so-called equalization fee when I first entered the Senate. I think that is the best possible demonstration of the fact that from the very outset of my public service I have sympathized with the fundamental agricultural problem which he submits. I entirely agree with him that the agricultural situation to-day is desperate and difficult.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then the tariff did not give agriculture any mass buying power, did it?

Mr. VANDENBERG. On the contrary, if the testimony of Canadian Government officials, for example, is to be credited, practically all of the loss in Canadian export trade to the United States during the past decade has been largely due to the fact that our tariffs have permitted American farmers to raise and sell in the domestic market the commodities of an agricultural nature which previously came from Canada.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but they sold them at a price fixed by the sale of the surplus in the free-trade markets of the world.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not want to detour into a discussion of the surplus problem. What the Senator says is true in respect to surplus commodities. However, as the Senator knows far better than I do, there are many agricultural situations which do not involve a surplus, and where the tariff is effectual.

Mr. BROOKHART. All the staple products involve a surplus, every one of them.

One other question: Does the Senator claim that the tariff has given buying power to the seven or eight million men who are unemployed in the United States at this time?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has just entered the Chamber. I have been speaking about an hour. I have covered every possible phase of that question time and time again, and I am sure the Senator will permit me to refer him to the RECORD.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will be glad to read it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FESS. With reference to buying power, all of us know that it is very much broken. But the fact still remains that the per capita ownership of automobiles in the United States is highest in Kansas, next in California, and third in Iowa. That would indicate something about the buying power as to automobiles relative to other States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his observation, provided it does not expose me again to an indefinite rebuttal by my genial friend the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. In connection with that, Mr. President, I must call attention to the fact that the automobile manufacturers who made their money from selling these automobiles to Iowa and California and the other States are now building plants in foreign countries, where they will use cheap labor, causing unemployment in the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, we went all over that in the absence of the Senator also.

Mr. FESS. I condemn that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The process to which the Senator refers is condemned by the Senator from Ohio just as much as it is by me and by me just as much as it is by him.

Speaking of the automobile trade, here is another of these 35 "plain reasons for a reciprocal tariff policy":

Our export trade has been of vital importance to our domestic prosperity in the past, and can be again if facilities are provided. To return to the case of the automobile, the production of nearly a million cars which were sold abroad in 1929—more than were sold in 28 of our own States—required supplies of raw and manufactured materials from every State and employed 400,000 workmen in automobile factories for one of each six working days.

I have no doubt whatever that that calculation is reasonably accurate; at any rate, we may accept it as such for the purpose of this argument.

No argument is necessary, to begin with, to prove that export trade is important. No argument is necessary to indicate that we ought to foster it. But inevitable comparisons must be made if the question involved is whether we shall sacrifice any element of our domestic market and our domestic trade in order to go fishing for this foreign trade. It is true that there were 1,000,000 cars sold abroad in 1929, but it is equally true that the annual normal replacement of cars alone in the United States is 3,000,000 cars a year, and there can be no comparison whatever between the value of an economic policy which is built primarily to save the market in which 3,000,000 cars are sold as compared to fishing for the market in which 1,000,000 cars are sold. If possible we want both markets. I discuss the situation if we must choose one market or the other. So these so-called "reasons for a reciprocal tariff policy" go on.

Mr. President, I do not intend to pursue the question further. I have occupied more time than I had any right to occupy upon this subject. I refer, in conclusion, to the specific substitute which I have submitted. I contend that this substitute provides for more rather than less flexibility in the tariff, which is what the American people want and need

I submit that it brings the free list within the purview of flexibility for the first time, and does so on the only possible basis which is constitutional, and does so in a fashion which bids fair to give some relief from static tariff at this point. Certainly we have no flexibility worthy of the name when the free list is entirely outside its reach, because so much of our commodity structure is embraced within the free list. For instance, the free list percentage in the Smoot-Hawley law is 69.5 per cent; in the McKinley law, 52.4 per cent; in the Dingley law, 45.2 per cent; in the Fordney-McCumber law, 60.8 per cent; and in the Underwood law, 66.3 per cent.

Under any tariff law, whether Republican or Democratic, the free list is inevitably a major consideration, and we do not have flexibility which is complete and adequate so long as all these commodities upon the free list are absolutely and exclusively dependent upon general revisions of the tariff once every 5 or 10 or 15 years in order to get a fair hearing for their right to come within the protective doctrine.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand the Senator proposes to leave the present flexible provision as it is?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I further understand that he proposes that the Tariff Commission shall investigate and make recommendations in regard to rates relating to articles upon the free list and that those recommendations are to be transmitted to the Congress for action by the Congress?

Act. Members of the Senate also have taken occasion to discuss the fundamental principles underlying our tariff policy as enunciated by both political parties. I do not pro-

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator whether his amendment makes any provision as to whether the recommendation shall be operative in the event of Congress not acting within a period of time?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; it does not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that in that respect his proposal is like the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I discussed that particular point.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suppose the reason why the Senator has eliminated that provision, which was added in the House, is because if the provision were inserted establishing a limited period of time for action upon the part of Congress, it would be equivalent to preventing any review by anybody in the presence of Congress on the recommendation of the Tariff Commission?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has stated correctly that situation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That would be unfor-

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly. The primary effect would be that the 60-day privilege could be arbitrarily embraced by 1 or 2 or 3 Senators with a very effective veto upon any possible action.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It would be possible, under the rules in either branch of Congress, to prevent any recommendation ever being considered by the Congress.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is entirely correct. Nevertheless I repeat that we have no adequate flexibility so long as the free list is not within its reach. If there ever was a shining example of possible jeopardy and hazard, at least from my point of view, which can arise under that situation, we find it to-day in the fact that copper, struggling almost with its last breath for its life, can not even have a day in court anywhere under the Government of the United States to determine whether or not it, upon the basis of facts and justice and equity, is entitled to protection.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a further question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from Massachusetts? Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator care to state whether or not he would give the power to the President to approve or disapprove the recommendations of the Tariff Commission relating to articles upon the free list if it were not for the constitutional question?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Inasmuch as the constitutional question exists, I have never crossed the subsequent bridge. I am very sure the constitutional question does exist, so why go farther?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I can not understand why the Senator should not be willing to accept the proposal in so far as the practical tariff provision is concerned, as offered by the Senator from Mississippi, namely, permitting action by the Congress rather than by the President upon recommendation of the Tariff Commission in the case of dutiable articles when he is willing to do it in the case of articles upon the free list.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I pursued that subject for at least 30 minutes and I hesitate to intrench upon the good nature of the Senate any farther to repeat. The Senator will find his question completely answered in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall read the Record.
Mr. VANDENBERG. I submit my amendment to the attention and consideration of the Senate in due course, and I hope it may have favorable consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I will now give my views on the subject before the Senate. A good deal has been said during this debate about the Smoot-Hawley the dutiable list, the latter being Tariff Act and its predecessor, the Fordney-McCumber investigation by the commission.

Act. Members of the Senate also have taken occasion to discuss the fundamental principles underlying our tariff policy as enunciated by both political parties. I do not propose to enter into that domain of the discussion. I intend briefly and very directly to analyze the pending measure known as the Democratic proposal to amend the tariff law and to point out what I understand it seeks to accomplish. I wave aside all other discussion as irrelevant.

Briefly stated, it seeks to remove the well-known existing evils in tariff making and to inculcate, as far as possible with the human machinery with which we have to deal in government, principles of justice. In other words, the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] to the House bill seeks to apply principles that will tend to promote justice in the administration of our tariff policy. It is a measure to improve and perfect the machinery of government relative to tariff making.

The amendment really includes four bills in one. First, the amendment provides that instead of the President, as now, approving or disapproving of recommendations of the Tariff Commission under the flexible tariff provision, the Congress shall approve or disapprove of the recommendations of the Tariff Commission.

Secondly, it provides for the creation of an official to be known as "consumers' counsel," who would appear as a party in interest representing the general public before the Tariff Commission when it has under consideration petitions seeking to have changes made in tariff rates fixed by the Congress.

Third, it provides for the calling of an international economic conference.

Fourth, it provides for the negotiation of reciprocal tariff treaties or agreements between this country and foreign countries under a policy of mutual tariff concessions.

I repeat that there is no occasion for discussing whether the Smoot-Hawley bill is a success or a failure. Senators on each side of the Chamber will argue ad infinitum on that question without reaching a result. But it is important to know whether the proposals now under consideration are helpful and in the public interest in establishing an efficient and scientific way of tariff law making. It seems to me that if this test is applied to the proposal of the Senator from Mississippi there can be but one answer, and that answer must be in the affirmative.

Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi to section 336 of the tariff act of 1930, providing for investigating and ascertaining the difference in cost of production of any domestic article or any like or similar foreign article by the Tariff Commission, is of such outstanding importance and improvement over the present system that I have no hesitancy in voting for the substitute amendment.

It is possible under present law to have an investigation made by the Tariff Commission, but several important changes are made to the present law. The factors that the commission are to take into consideration in ascertaining the difference in cost of production of the domestic article and of any like or similar foreign article are clearly, explicitly, and definitely defined. Every element that should be reasonably taken into consideration in order to do justice to the domestic producer and the consumer is described. The best judgment of those who have studied the tariff problem for years has been coordinated in fixing the yard-stick for rate recommending by the Tariff Commission.

The most striking differences, however, between the present law and the new flexible tariff proposal are threefold:

1. Under present law the Tariff Commission can not investigate the difference in the cost of production of domestic articles upon the free list, and there is no authority through the flexible tariff provisions to impose duties upon articles that are on the free list. It is a step forward to open up the field of investigation to all domestic producers, whether the article produced by them be upon the free list or upon the dutiable list, the latter being now the only subject of investigation by the commission.

report from the commission has authority either to reject the recommendations contained in the report or to accept the same, or to take no action at all. The proposal under consideration takes all power away from the President and requires the President to promptly transmit the report of the commission to the Congress with his recommendations. if any, with respect to the increase or decrease in duty proposed by the commission.

3. When the President sends his report to Congress provision is made for a radical departure from the present procedure in the Congress in dealing with tariff measures, for both the House of Representatives and the Senate are prohibited from offering any amendment to the report, which is not germane to the items relating to the specific commodity included in the report.

Mr. President, it is this latter provision that appeals most strongly to me. In brief, it eliminates with one fell swoop most of the evils associated in the past with tariff legislation.

If there be any question connected with the tariff on which all men ought to be able to agree, it is that no tariff bill ever enacted by Congress has been other than a complicated series of compromises and trades, with protection granted or withheld, and with rates established not in accordance with any defined pattern but rather in accord with selfish self-interest. In a word, the experience of a century has amply demonstrated that when Congress undertakes general revision of the tariff the result is a hodgepodge of inequalities. It has never been possible to revise the tariff piecemeal, never possible for Congress to deal separately with a separate rate question, for a tariff bill, however it starts, becomes a general tariff bill before it gets far, through the open avenue of amendments dealing with any and every rate under the canopy.

It was in recognition of this fact that Congress was finally prevailed upon to establish a Tariff Commission of experts, who were to scientifically determine rates, and that the so-called flexible provision was originally written into the tariff law whereby the President, by Executive order, if and when the Tariff Commission so recommended and if he approved, was enabled to increase or decrease by not more than 50 per cent any specific tariff rate.

We heard a great deal about the Tariff Commission and the flexible clause when it was first established. The scheme never worked as its framers had claimed it would. We never secured under it any substantial revision of the tariff, nor any corrections of tariff inequalities and injustices. When Congress passed the last tariff act two years ago, the Tariff Commission and the Executive-order plan for rate change was given a new lease of life, under slightly changed terms and with a new set of tariff commissioners, and we were told that now at last we had a workable arrangement.

Events have demonstrated that this plan still fails to function. I believe that all fair-minded persons must now conclude that it is a demonstrated, complete failure. take it that it was that realization which was the genesis of the present bill drawn by the Democrats in the House and passed by the House and now before us.

This bill discards the machinery for tariff revision by Executive order, which has been proven to be futile, and provides that the Tariff Commission, instead of reporting to the President, shall report to Congress, and that Congress, with a report and a recommendation before it, may legislate on the precise tariff question there presented, and on that question singly, without opening the door to all sorts of tariff proposals.

Mr. President, we are proposing to substitute for the old plan of logrolling tariff bills and tariff laws by Executive order, both of which have proved an utter failure, a plan which holds much promise and which in fact seems to be the only alternative, under our system of government.

In my view, the plan for tariff revision by Congress, rate by rate one at a time, has one great merit. It prevents

2. Under present law the President upon receipt of the | bill we have ever had. It prevents trading votes, whereby I vote for your rate if you vote for my rate without respect to the justice or fairness of either rate.

> Mr. President, is the flexible provision of the tariff law a success? Has the departure from the old-established methods of congressional tariff making proved to be beneficial? I think I do not exaggerate when I say-and I ask the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. King], who honors me by listening to what I have to say, to approve or disapprove my statement-that I think that when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was before us the general sentiment of this body was that the flexible provisions of the tariff law had not succeeded. In scanning the speeches of the Members on the Republican side I find nearly all of them were apologetic for the operation of the flexible tariff provision during the period from 1922 to 1929. Indeed, the bill, which was passed on July 3, 1930, went so far as to create a new Tariff Commission, which was indicative of disapproval of the Tariff Commission as formerly constituted. I repeat, there was a general belief in this Chamber that the system of a flexible tariff which had been adopted had not been satisfactory.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In corroboration of what the Senator says, he will recall that a resolution was adopted by the Senate to investigate the Tariff Commission. There were charges here that it was wholly inefficient; that it had failed in the purpose for which it was organized. Bills were also offered for the purpose of abolishing the Tariff Commission. The Senator from Arkansas, the leader upon this side of the Chamber, conducted in connection with his associates and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette], Senator REED, and former Senator Bruce a very extensive examination into the activities, conduct, and failure or success of the Tariff Commission. Anyone who reads that testimony, as I have done, can not but be impressed with the fact that the Tariff Commission was a failure, largely, may I say, however, because of the character of some of the members of the commission. They went there with a partisan view; they were determined to use the flexible provision of the tariff and their position for the purpose of advancing rates rather than doing justice to importers, to American consumers, and to American manufacturers.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, Mr. President; and I think the Senator from Utah will also agree with me that any Tariff Commission appointed by any President is bound to be more or less partisan and to be controlled by the political philosophy of the dominant political party, if not its political leaders. During the course of the debate in 1930, speaking upon the general subject of the flexible tariff provision, I used the following language:

Mr. President, during this entire discussion no whole-hearted or sincere words of commendation have been expressed for the manner in which thus far the flexible tariff has functioned. Throughout the discussions there has been criticism and an expression of general lack of confidence. Even the proponents of the measure have been apologetic. But in the very breath that they allege that things have not been as they ought to have been and that the results have not been as expected, they urge us to continue the abandonment of our powers, because, forsooth, the future will resuscitate, remodel, and restore the particular example of bureaucracy that thus far has failed. The servant has been unfaithful in some things, so make him ruler over many.

Reform! Drive politics out of a department of government that deals with a question that is saturated with political philosophy fought over in every political conflict by every political party since the beginning of the Nation! Mr. President, during this entire discussion no whole-hearted or

Of course there is politics in the Tariff Commission, and there will be politics in the Tariff Commission whether the Tariff Commission be named by a Democratic President or by a Republican President.

Has there been any improvement in the operation of the flexible tariff provision since the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law? I think all impartial observers will agree logrolling, which has been the curse of every general tariff | that the same conditions which prevailed at the time the the same criticisms which then were made are applicable to the present situation.

Let us now turn to tariff making by the Congress. Mr. President, the curse of tariff making in the Congress has been logrolling. In the case of every tariff bill that has been passed since I have been a Member of this body-and the number has been three, including the emergency agricultural tariff bill following the war, the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, and the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill—there has been flagrant logrolling. Again and again during the discussions of various articles upon which tariff rates were levied in the Smoot-Hawley bill it was charged and proven that extensive logrolling was indulged in in this Chamber and, I assume, in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol. Indeed, Mr. President, the reason why we have not been able to apply principles of equitable, scientific, and honest tariff making is because of the notorious evil of logrolling.

The best feature of the pending measure—and it is one upon which we all could stand no matter how doubtful we may be of the other feature of the bill-is that which does away forever with logrolling. It puts up to the Members of Congress squarely the question, Is it right or is it wrong to increase or lower the rate upon a particular domestic product? I repeat that is, in my judgment, a tremendous benefit to tariff making that will prove to be of inestimable value. That is why I said at the outset that this measure seeks to render justice in tariff making. It provides that the Tariff Commission shall investigate and it defines the factors they shall take into consideration in determining whether a rate shall be raised or lowered. When the commission says, "Here is the result of our investigation," the President says, "I request the Congress to consider on its own merits this tariff item alone, and I recommend that the Congress vote for or against this recommendation of the commission." What could be fairer? What could be more in the public interest? What could be proposed that would be more calculated to destroy the abuse of logrolling than to limit the action of the Congress to action upon a specific item after recommendation and study by the Tariff Commission?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. In addition to the point the Senator has made, may I suggest, could there be a more intelligent procedure than for Congress to act, with all of the information obtained after an exhaustive scientific investigation by the Tariff Commission, on one specific item in a schedule at a time?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator from Texas for his observation. I stated when the flexible tariff provision was adopted at the time we had under consideration the Smoot-Hawley bill that, in my judgment, we would never again have before us for consideration a general revision of the tariff; that once we committed ourselves to the policy of referring items to the Tariff Commission for investigation and recommendation and giving the President the power to approve or disapprove such recommendation, that would end general revision of tariff duties by the Congress. I sincerely believe, from the experience of the last revision, that even a Democratic President would feel it his duty, in a very guarded and a very limited way, in his recommendations to restrict the Congress so far as he could in considering changes in the tariff law.

Mr. President, why not let the President continue to make the necessary change in tariff rates? I never can subscribe to any such doctrine. If there is any one fact that stands out in the political philosophy of the founders of this country more than any other, and one that has impressed me more than any other, it is their determination that the taxing power should never be placed in the Executive. The founders did not know but that disaster and destruction would come in due time to the form of government which they estab-

Smoot-Hawley bill was under consideration now prevail, and I lished. They did not know but that tyranny would some day find its place in the governmental structure which they built; but they were determined about one thing-it is in every sentence of the Constitution, not only the Federal Constitution but the State constitutions—that that tyranny should never come from important power bestowed upon one official; that the people should never be oppressed by too much law making in the hands of any one individual; and they were determined above everything else that the power to reach into the pockets of the people to levy taxes upon them should not be unsafeguarded. They knew too well the tyranny and oppression, the misery and the suffering, that had been experienced by the people of Europe because of the manner in which the power of taxation had been cruelly exercised by individual officials who sought to impose special taxes upon the people for favored classes.

Why, Mr. President, the very beginning of the protectivetariff principle can be traced back to the action of the Kings and Queens of England in allowing taxes to be collected upon imports brought into their country and given as gratuities to those at the royal court whom they especially favored.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President-

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know that the Senator has adverted to it; but I desire to remind him of the fact that one President, before making appointments to the Tariff Commission, compelled members of the Tariff Commission to submit in advance their resignations, thereby not only having the power to put their findings into effect but actually to dictate the findings as well.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, be it said to the credit of one of them, who is a Democrat, that he scorned and repudiated any such proposition. I refer to Mr. Lewis, now in the House.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I can not find words to express my condemnation of the policy and the action to which the Senator has alluded. I can not understand any man occupying the Presidency of the United States demanding resignation from an appointee before he commissions him to take the oath of office to perform a great public trust.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, that proves the Senator's contention that not only is the power dangerous in the hands of the Executive, but since the President has the power to make appointments it virtually gives him absolute control of all the machinery for raising and lowering taxation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I never could understand why public men in the Congress of the United States could claim that as soon as a man became President of the United States, in some miraculous way all thought of political advantage or political expediency fell by the wayside and he became immune to political influences. Of course the President is affected by political considerations and political expediency, just as every Member of this body

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President-

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If it will not interrupt the course of the Senator's argument, I should like to point out the fact that the flexible provision now in the law, which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] insists shall be retained, has been held to be unconstitutional by the United States Customs Court of New York in several cases.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. One very recently, I be-

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. One of the cases was decided, I think, on the 23d instant. I have procured a copy of the opinion. It is my understanding that the Senator from Texas [Mr. Connally] will discuss this phase of the subject at some length in the early future, and I do not intend at this time to go into the matter in further detail than to point out the fact that the Constitution does impose upon the Congress the duty and the exclusive power to levy taxes, imposts, and excises, and that the language of section 336 of the tariff act of 1930—to quote the Customs Court in the case referred to—which attempts to delegate to the President the power to classify imported articles for taxation by writing new provisions into the law—is in violation of the constitutional provision to which reference has already been made.

There is an interesting and I believe a convincing discussion of the subject in the opinion which has been mentioned. It argues to the conclusion that there is a distinct difference to be made between rates and phraseology; that while in the Hampton case, which I believe has been cited during the course of this debate, the Supreme Court of the United States did hold that it is competent for the President, confirming the finding of the Tariff Commission, to change an existing rate, neither that case nor any other case has gone to the extent of holding that the language used in section 336 of the act of 1930 which gives him the power to rewrite the paragraphs in the tariff law is by analogy constitutional.

This distinction, as I have already said, is brought out fully and forcefully; so that the Congress, under the provision which the Senator from Michigan would retain, has, to say the least, done a very questionable act. It has sought to divest itself of a responsibility which the Constitution imposes upon it, and to charge that responsibility and power on the President of the United States. As everyone knows. from the beginning of parliamentary government it has been a controlling principle that the taxing power should be retained in the hands of those Government officials who are chosen by the people themselves; and it may be maintained with force and conclusiveness that the effort to charge the Executive with the responsibility to fix tax rates and to write language into tariff laws is an evasion of responsibility upon the part of the legislative department of the Government. It is not a trivial matter. It can not be determined upon a mere declaration that an executive can do it more scientifically than a legislature can accomplish it; for underlying the whole proposal is the thought, the principle, that tax laws must be very carefully scrutinized by representatives of the people, must be enacted with due regard to the rights and the liberties of those who must pay the taxes, and that this end can be accomplished only by the exercise of the taxing power by officers whom the people themselves choose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I repeat, if there is any political philosophy that is outstanding in the philosophy of the founders, it is that the power of taxation must be exercised by the many and not by the few, and only by the direct representatives of the people, and, above all, never by the Executive. Indeed, the very reason why the Constitution provides for the confirmation of civic officials by the Senate is because of the fact that the founders were determined that that body, the Congress, which went into their pockets and levied taxes, should not escape responsibility for the expenditure of money by officials beyond their control. So they provided that even the officials named by the Executive to spend the money obtained by taxation should be submitted to the scrutiny of the Senate. so that the Senate could not say, "We are not responsible. The officers of the Executive Department squandered your money. They misspent it." On the contrary, the founders were determined that those who levied taxes should have a say as to the honesty and efficiency of the men who spent the money raised by taxation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson] a moment ago adverted to a decision, which he said he did not have, recently handed down by the Customs Court. I have the opinion here; and it holds the act of the President, or his proclamation, unconstitutional. He lifted out of the basket clause an article and transferred it by changing the phraseology to another provision of the law, thus increasing the tariff rates; and the judge—Mr. Justice Fischer, one of the ablest men on the bench, and a Republican, by the way—decides that that act of the President was clearly unconstitutional. He changed the phraseology, and by implication Mr. Justice Fischer indicates that it is not very safe to commit this power to the Executive—a power which he holds, as the court unanimously holds, to be exclusively a legislative power.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the attempt to embrace this power within constitutional limits is very, very far-fetched and has been apologized for by many of the constitutional lawyers of the country. It is not creditable to the courts that they strain the Constitution to the limits in seeking to bestow on the President a power such as is now granted in the flexible provisions of the tariff law.

I desire to quote from what I said about the attitude of the founders toward taxation when I discussed the flexible tariff while it was under consideration in 1929 and 1930:

I dislike to prophesy, but a statesman must do it. The founders did it; they looked back and saw the awful story that history revealed, and that they had personally experienced, of the usurpation of the power of taxation. And then they prophesied that history would repeat itself here in America unless the control of the people's pocketbook and the control of commerce through the imposing of taxes was separated clearly and absolutely from the Executive and kept on the broadest basis possible. They were not so guileless as we, or shall I say such trucklers to expediency? They were students of the science of government. They were sagacious. Well they knew that lodging power in the hands of one man makes for celerity and efficiency; but they also knew that something else was of vastly more consequence. They were willing to make certain sacrifices of efficiency for greater ends. They preferred less efficiency and the retention of liberty, rather than the maximum of efficiency with the possibility of despotic abuse.

Mr. President, I repeat that the outstanding feature of this amendment, in the nature of a substitute for the House bill, offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] is that it provides the means of ending logrolling in the construction and making of tariff bills.

I can not conceive of anything we can do here more in the public interest, when we seek to establish the best method of tariff making, than to provide for investigation and study by the commission, report by the commission transmitted to the President, Democrat or Republican, and then have placed upon him the responsibility before all the people of the country of taking his position and recommending to the Congress action pro or con upon the commission's recommendation.

Why are not the American people entitled to have the President go on record and be responsible for increased or decreased tariff duties, and his party placed in a responsible attitude upon each tariff question? What have we now? The President sends a message to the Congress in very general terms, saying, "I call for revision of the tariff," with not a single, solitary specific suggestion. Then commences the pulling and hauling, the pressure upon Members of the Congress, the inefficient, as well as the efficient producer, pleading to us, telling us of their distress, asking to save them by granting increased duties. Then a series of swapping and exchanging of votes in the Congress, which has resulted in every tariff bill that has been enacted in recent years being filled with injustices and proving unsatisfactory to everybody, even to the responsible political party in power.

I can not conceive of a greater public service that could be rendered, if we did nothing else during the session, than to provide that hereafter tariffs shall be enacted in this fashion: First, a petition and an investigation by the Tariff Commission and a report to the President; next, a report to the Congress by the President, with his recommendations, placing his party on record for or against an increased rate, by requesting the Congress to pass upon his specific recommendation. If we can not get justice and if we can not get efficient tariff making from that procedure, then I fail to know how to reach a direct and just verdict on these involved tariff rate issues.

Taxation questions should be discussed on the floor of this body and in the House, where all Americans may know what is going on, and where there can be a roll call. What happens now? Study and investigation in semisecret; action transmitted to the President in semisecret; decision made by the President in secret; no general, open discussion.

Mr. President, I repeat, to me the best feature of this legislation is the fact that we will have at last a way of appealing directly to the consciences of the Members of Congress on single, separate tariff questions and tariff items without any outside consideration. "Is it fair?" "Is it just?" "Is it right?" "Where does the Democratic Party stand on this specific tariff recommendation?" "Where does the Republican Party stand?" "Where does the President stand?" "Where does the Tariff Commission stand?" It is all in the open and, it seems to me, tending not only to improve the method of making tariff laws but of giving the public the full benefit of the widest possible discussion.

There is a good deal I would like to say about the abuses which have resulted from the logrolling methods of the past. Perhaps I can sum up all I need to say upon that evil by quoting again from a speech made by me on March 24, 1930:

It has been well said that the United States tariff—the control of the lifeblood of industry and commerce, the control of the most important element of our foreign relations—is regulated by log-rolling. Surely the record with respect to the pending tariff bill in the Senate justifies this assertion. The fact that logrolling methods have not been apparently disastrous in the past does not prove that such methods may not ultimately be ruinous.

Again:

All through this bill is the same shameful story—give and take; the swapping of votes; an exchange of rates. "You give me this rate and I will give you a rate upon some product that is produced in your particular State or your particular locality." During the last days this logrolling reached the high-water mark. To my mind exchanging votes for tariff duties that burden our people is as reprehensible as it would be for a judge to exchange legal decisions with other judges on the Supreme Court Bench.

So, when the roll is called on this issue let it be understood that one of the primary questions—the outstanding question—is, Shall we make an effort to end logrolling? Shall we apply this most fair, most liberal, and most just method of settling tariff rates?

The second feature of the bill is a provision for a consumer's' counsel. So much has been said upon that question that little needs to be added. Who appears before the Tariff Commission when tariff investigations are undertaken? Some petitioner, some litigant, some party in interest, who presents his case. Unless the members of the Tariff Commission take upon themselves the responsibility of investigating and examining and inquiring from the consumers' standpoint, there is no representative of the consumers before the commission.

The appointment of a consumers' counsel insures the public interest being represented, with the same power the petitioner has for examination, for investigation, and for inquiry.

Why should not the consumers' counsel have the right, for illustration, to find out the financial condition of the petitioners who are asking for increased rates, find out whether their distressed economic condition is due to inefficiency or to mismanagement, or due to the only justification for increased tariff duties, importations of foreign articles in such quantities as to destroy the domestic market to the domestic producer?

I consider it a great step forward to have a consumers' counsel help bring about the thing I started out to demonstrate when I stated that I intended to support this bill, namely, the obtaining and exacting, as far as humanly possible, of justice in tariff making.

What harm can come to an honest petitioner for increased tariff duties from having before that tribunal which is conducting an examination and making a report an official who represents the great consuming millions of American people? It seems to me that extensive argument upon that question is unnecessary.

I come to the third feature of the bill, the provision for an international tariff conference. What harm could come from that? Assume that little good would come, what harm to have representatives of the various governments of the world consider these questions of trade barriers and trade rivalries, and of recriminations against each other, consider the unwisdom of the actions of the various governments in building tariff walls about their boundaries which tend to shut out all foreign commerce, and bring further distress to their respective countries?

It seems to me that the idea ought to be welcomed, especially at this particular time, when the world is passing through very serious economic depression. The President ought to be glad to have Congress suggest to him a great international trade or tariff conference, where the misunderstandings of the past would be brought out into the open, where trade jealousies and rivalries would be reduced, if possible, to a minimum, where helpful cooperation toward the building up of commerce and trade in a friendly way between the nations of the world would be established.

Lastly, this bill provides for reciprocal tariff treaties between the various countries. On the two last features of the bill I want to quote what I said when the tariff bill was before the Senate in 1929:

Whenever a nation, particularly a financially strong nation, contemplates changing its tariff, foreign countries naturally become vitally interested. Every country is to some extent more or less interdependent on some other country or countries for some of its essential commodities, for no country produces everything it needs. Each country depends on other countries to some extent for its markets. Thus, all countries are constantly striving to hold and to extend their trade.

A tariff program which considers only the interests of its own nation is shortsighted, especially if it is concerned about maintaining or developing foreign trade. Neither can a "dog-eat-dog" policy endure. In that direction war and chaos abideth. Such policies breed misunderstandings and hatreds and create unfriendly feelings which find their way into the international press and international gatherings. Joint reprisals, import and export restrictions, and other more or less drastic attempts to fight the offending nation with newly invented economic weapons are the immediate and direct result. If any nation goes too far, the result may be a solidarity of nations in tariff matters which would be disastrous to the export business of that nation.

How true those words, uttered on April 27, 1929, were, has been proved by what has happened. Let me read further:

The movement in the United States at the present time to revise tariff rates and the assumption that they are to be revised upward has stirred up a tide of foreign fear and suspicion. Telegraphic warnings from American consuls and commercial attachés throughout the world furnish evidence of the necessity of proceeding sanely and prudently unless a world tariff war may become imminent. Already campaigns for discriminatory duties—

This was when the bill was before the Congress in April, 1929, and the bill did not become operative until July 3, 1930.

Already campaigns for discriminatory duties against American exports have appeared in various parts of Europe and South America. Our threatened tariff revision frequently has been referred to as "the hostile economic policy of America."

I quote the reference made to us in Europe at the time:

Our threatened tariff revision frequently has been referred to as "the hostile economic policy of America."

The principle of reciprocity which has been called the handmaid of protection, and which should govern the relations between nations, also justifies a consideration of the effect of a nation's tariff policy upon foreign countries.

No one can deny the United States the right to consider the figures as to what we gain and what we lose by a contemplated change in tariff policy, but this can be done without engaging in a bitter economic rivalry across national boundaries that will create international misunderstandings. It is wise statesmanship, therefore, in drafting laws which particularly relate to international commerce not to demand from others what we are not willing to give them. Neither should a nation be expected to give to others what they are unwilling to give it.

In readjusting tariff rates certain general principles should be recalled and followed. Foremost among these principles is that national wealth is increased by foreign trade. Selling of goods abroad must not be a temporary refuge sought only in times of storm. Foreign trade is not and never can be established on any permanent basis for any nation until it becomes a policy of exchanging of goods in which both the buyer and seller profit.

There are three ways in which export trade can be carried on: First, selling for cash; second, selling on credit; and, third, exchanging other goods—imports. But for all the exporters to receive cash from a foreign country over a long period of time is manifestly impossible. Credit does not pay for goods; it only puts off the settlement. The only way in which foreign buyers can pay for their goods over a long period of time is through imports. It is possible for a nation to satisfy all its needs by specializing in many products and sending abroad quantities not needed at home and by importing those goods which it can not produce successfully or sell when produced at a reasonable price.

Mr. President, I close as I began. The bill ought to be entitled "A measure to help inculcate the principles of justice in tariff making." As a Democrat, I am not for increased tariff duties or for decreased tariff duties. I am for obtaining exact justice, obtaining first the facts-is the domestic producer in distress because of the flood of importations from abroad underselling him and robbing him of his domestic market? If these facts present a case for protection. I am willing to give it to him, but a reasonable and just protection only. I am not willing to vote to provide high-tariff duties for the great monopolies of the country to control prices after they have freed themselves of domestic competition. Neither am I in favor of increased tariff duties as repayment for campaign contributions or as favors to be politically bestowed upon those who are the beneficiaries of the election of men to public office.

I repeat, the sound and sane way of settling these tariff questions is by application of principles as to what is right, what is just, and leave it to the Congress which the Constitution provided should be the instrumentality in our Government to place their hands in the pockets of the people and extract dollars in the way of taxation. From every angle, from every viewpoint, this measure is a measure looking forward and not backward, looking toward elevating and improving tariff making and promising the American people that, freeing ourselves as much as possible of political and local environments, we will face these issues separately and settle them upon the highest possible principles of exact justice to all-the American producer, the importer, and the American consumer.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the end of my remarks speeches delivered by me on the floor of the Senate during the consideration of the flexible provisions and other features of the Smoot-Hawley bill.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FLEXIBLE TARIFF (Tuesday, October 1, 1929)

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I shall detain the Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I shar detail the Senate only for a few minutes. I fully realize that the time for general debate for and against the amendment providing for a flexible tariff, with power granted to the President amounting to lawmaking with respect to the tariff, has passed. I shall content myself, therefore, with a final appeal to my colleagues upon an aspect of this question that, in my opinion, transcends all others; namely, the position that patriotic considerations and historic traditions should dictate.

There has been a vast deal of propaganda in this country of recent years tending to belittle, ridicule, and destroy the prestige of the Congress. A colleague a few days ago made the statement that he did not believe that any Senator realized the deep and undeserved discredit into which the Congress of the United States had been brought by these attacks and misrepresentations. The had been brought by these attacks and matericsentations. The powerful searchlight of the modern methods of publicity is to-day, as never before, turned wide open and has accentuated to an alarming degree the shortcomings and even delinquencies that have probably always existed in parliamentary bodies. Many apparently fail to realize that, whereas the Members of the Congress, have probably always existed in parliamentary bodies. Many apparently fall to realize that, whereas the Members of the Congress, being human, err—yet the institution called the Congress should not in consequence be discredited and undermined. Has public indifference reached the point where forgetfulness exists that the Congress of the United States stands for the voice and control of the people in their affairs; that it is now, as always, the final hope and the best method yet devised for the preservation of liberty and justice among a free people?

If the Congress falls, representative government falls, and with it a social organ of immense value. In spite of irrelevant discussion and some incidental unduly prolonged debate, this very procedure in the Senate now in connection with this tariff bill is a great and mighty reexamination and review before the country of the whole tariff situation. Notwithstanding the certain measure of truth in the denunciations of those who expect the same speed and efficiency in a free legislative body that exists in the board of directors of a private corporation, yet who will deny that an informative, illuminating, and safeguarding study and consideration of an important and difficult question is not being here and now secured and is really of service?

Undoubtedly much of the unfavorable sentiment that has been voiced against the Congress, perhaps particularly against the Sen-voiced against the Congress, perhaps particularly against the Senate, and especially in connection with the tariff, has arisen from a growing feeling of our incompetency. We have created conditions with respect to tariff complexities that make congressional control of the tariff necessarily difficult; and then we turn with zest for refuge to bureaucracy, and sink still farther into a mire. Such in general is the present state of the public mind that we turn to meet every evil with boards to regulate, direct, control, and even imprison the private citizen for breaches even of by-laws of these subordinate arms of the Government. And then comes a fresh crop of evils and more boards. Edmund Burke hit off this state of mind and this practice by saying that there is inherent degredation and oppression in the acts of a central government always "as it descends from a parish to a private house."

The growing tendency, upon the basis of the theory of time-saving and securing efficiency, of abandoning direct and complete control of lawmaking by the elected representatives of the people is the great menace of our times. We have gone too far in that direction already; and, furthermore, we have discredited ourselves when we have created commissions and boards innumerable and given them carte blanche power to direct and control the interests of our people, subject only to the limitations of the courts in cases where they obviously and flagrantly exceed their authority. Another challenge is here, and we must meet it. Just now it is the shunting and dismissing of tariff discussion, tariff consideration, and tariff control from the Congress to a bureau—to an agency of the Government other than that provided for lawmaking by the Constitution.

Constitution.

Let me remind you that whatever excuse and justification you have had in the past in delegating the power and responsibility of the Congress to indirect agencies, that excuse has passed; and especially with respect as to this subject of taxation above all others. If you recall to mind the story of the struggles and the sacrifices of your forefathers and their imperishable words, your eyes should be open now. Here and now you are dealing with a subject that no human being can say was outside and beyond the domain of the deliberations and plans of the founders of this country. And for 140 years the exclusive right of exercising the taxing power has been preserved in the form that the Constitution prescribed. However else we may have abridged or compromised the basic principles of the Constitution, we at least have not abandoned this one.

Gentlemen, you are engaged in an assault upon parliamentary

Gentlemen, you are engaged in an assault upon parliamentary government. No one can foresee where this movement will lead or end. One thing is certain: It risks the beginning of the end of or end. One thing is certain: It risks the beginning of the end of that fundamental principle upon which our institutions were built, our happiness secured, and our prosperity maintained up to the present hour. This proposed change would not even be thought of except it is the fashion of the time to belittle and discredit parliamentary government. But the tragedy of it all is that we ourselves are joining in the movement to undermine parliamentary government, which means to put ourselves in the limbo of rejected things.

I repeat, in order that there be no misunderstanding and scuttling behind fogs or imaginary issues, that the primary, the crucial, and the final question here is: Shall we abdicate and re-crucial, and the final question here is: Shall we abdicate and relinquish the taxing power and place it where the Constitution expressly forbids it to be placed? Do not plead that it is only partial; that it is confined and limited by a rule; that it is only temporary. It is the step that counts and in all probability one that counts finally. The first proposal in 1922 was only for two years; and then that limitation was abandoned. At first it was to be greatly safeguarded and restricted; now it is proposed to expand it, extend it, and make it permanent.

You say the need is to provide a means of meeting an emergency! What would you think of a proposal giving the President the authority to increase the Army or the Navy upon investigation and advice by boards of Army or Navy officers, whenever he deemed an emergency existed? If increase of power and responsibility in the field of taxation when emergencies exist can safely and advantageously be lodged in the President, why not let him be the judge of the extent of preparations that are necessary to provide for public defense without the concurrence of the Congress? Why stop at the mere protection or safeguarding of property? Is not the protection of life and the defense of the country of greater moment?

the protection of life and the defense of the country of greater moment?

Mr. President, during this entire discussion no wholehearted or sincere words of commendation have ben expressed for the manner in which thus far the flexible tariff has functioned. Throughout the discussions there has been criticism and an expression of general lack of confidence. Even the proponents of the measure have been apologetic. But in the very breath that they allege that things have not been as they ought to have been and that the results must have not been as expected, they urge us to continue the abandonment of our powers, because, forsooth, the future will resuscitate, remodel, and restore the particular example of bureaucracy that thus far has failed. The servant has been unfaithful in some things, so make him ruler over many!

Reform! Drive politics out of a department of government that deals with a question that is saturated with political philosophy fought over in every political conflict by every political party since the beginning of the Nation! Do you think that by delegating this power that a candidate for the Senate can be elected to office in Louisiana by stating that the sugar question has been removed from politics and is in the custody of a mere fact-finding commission, and that the people of Louisiana must appeal not to their Senators for relief but hereafter to a fact-finding board that has already decreed their sugar protection excessive? Do you think any Senator, be he Democrat or Republican, elected in Massachusetts, can escape declaring to distressed industries that the tariff is now taken care of by officials outside the Halls of Congress and that he is powerless? What of the Senators from other States? What will you say to a constituent after a fact-finding commission has refused an application for tariff revision? Are Senators from the woolgrowing and from the lumber States going to sit down and fold their hands now that you have passed a law taking this au-fold their hands now that you have passed a law taking this authority in large part from yourselves?

I dislike to prophesy, but a statesman must do it. The founders did it, they looked back and saw the awful story that history revealed and that they had personally experienced, of the usurpation of the power of taxation. And then they prohesied that history would repeat itself here in America unless the control of the tory would repeat itself here in America unless the control of the people's pocketbook and the control of commerce through the imposing of taxes was separated clearly and absolutely from the Executive and kept on the broadest basis possible. They were not so guileless as we, or shall I say such trucklers to expediency? They were students of the science of government. They were sagacious. Well they knew that lodging power in the hands of one man makes for celerity and efficiency; but they also knew that something else was of vastly more consequence. They were willing to make certain sacrifices of efficiency for greater ends. They preferred less efficiency and the retention of liberty, rather than the maximum of efficiency with the possibility of despotic abuse.

After all is said and done, is not the answer to the impression that visitors to these galleries receive, and frequently express, of our apparent inefficiency and other shortcomings summed up succintly in the words of the French leader when criticism was made of the delay and disorderly conduct of the French Assembly: "These are the manners of liberty."

made of the delay and disorderly conduct of the French Assembly: "These are the manners of liberty."

If there is one idea more than any other that I have been impressed with as I read the stirring story of the deliberations and struggles for the founding of this Republic, and studied the political philosophy of its creators, it has been this—that they were not unmindful of the possibility that the form of government which they outlined might in time bring to their descendants tyranny; but they were convinced, first that if that tyranny came, it was more likely to come through abuse of the taxing power than any other, and, secondly, that it was better to have that abuse come through the failure of many rather than of one. In a word, they believed that since abuses could not be foreseen or surely prevented, they were in the long run less likely to come through their parliament than through some of the other agencies of government which they necessarily provided for; and consequently they lodged, first of all, the taxing power, permanently, as they thought, in the charge of our parliament—the American Congress.

I said I would venture to prophesy, and here is what I do not hesitate to say, weighing the responsibility of my words, that this decision to make the flexible provisions of this tariff a permanent policy of our Government—for that is what it amounts to—means the end of a scientific, judicially minded commission, and it likewise means the end of tariff reviews in the open before the country by the Congress.

The personnel of the United States Tariff Commission, and I say this without any desire to enter into the realm of discussion, and I say this without any desire to enter into the realm of discussion, and the country by the Congress.

The personnel of the United States Tariff Commission, and I say this without any desire to enter into the realm of discussion of personality, since the commission began the administration of the flexible tariff, has become more political. Previous to 1922 it may not have done much, for it was only starting, but what it did was scientific and commanded respect. Men of scientific integrity and purpose were sought and obtained both for commissioners and for leading positions on the staff. With the coming of the flexible tariff, the whole complexion of the commission changed, a new type of commissioner was appointed, and the better members of the staff resigned and were replaced by inferior and more subservient assistants. It could not be otherwise. The change in the work was from investigation and research removed from politics to research, investigation, and decision controlled by politics. What has happened is inherent in an institution dealing with such a highly political subject, which is possessed with the power to loosen or bind men's wages and profits through governmental action.

What we did then and what we are doing now, if this proposal succeeds, is to transfer political conniving, scheming, improper suggestions of every kind from this open public forum to a commission that necessarily does its work away from the public eye. Is there any Senator on this floor who seriously doubts that pressure of tremendous proportions will not be exerted with success in naming in the future to this law-altering body textile commissioners, wool commissioners, sugar commissioners, lumber commissioners, and that men will also be appointed as members of the staff for the purpose of protecting and insuring the supposed rights of particular industries and interests?

You say that intrigue, scheming, and conniving is here in the Congress. True; but it is brought to bear on 600 men and not on 6 men who are the appointees and advisers of 1 man! You say that politics in tariff making is here. Yes; but here it is in the open; it is a recognized and expected part, unfortunate and, I fear, unavoidable of the surroundings and functioning of parliamentary government. What an exalted opinion of the immunity from political pressure and subtle suggestions and possession of infallibility you place in bureaus and in the presidential office! How you do look guilelessly for a miracle!

Why are these things here? It is because we are engaged in the business of handing over favors and benefits through the possession of the opportunity and power to grant, in the exercise of our discretion, the demands of selfish and greedy interests.

Our necessarily plenary power with respect to taxation gives us the power to abuse it; but there are limits to abuse in our hands. There is none when it is concentrated and out of sight.

Mr. President, there have been some momentous debates and decisions of the Senate of the United States, but none that were fraught with more serious consequences for the future of our country and for the welfare of the people than the decision we are making now. It is more than a fight between old-fashioned constitutionalism and modern constitutionalism, as it has been called. It is a fight to esfectively are larger than a result of the second of the people than the decision we are making now.

constitutionalism and modern constitutionalism, as it has been called. It is a fight to safeguard parliamentary government against the usurpation of the taxing power.

I see in vision a future day when men sitting in our places here will turn back the pages of the record of this body to scan the names and the motives of those who changed the settled policy of 140 years and turned this most sacred, precious, and dangerous power—that even to destroy property and freedom of action—into an uncharted political course that every liberty seeker familiar with the science and experience of government has hitherto renounced and avoided.

AGAINST THE TARIFF BILL

(Monday, March 24, 1930)

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to state some of the reasons why I shall vote against the pending tariff bill. Necessarily they will have to be somewhat rambling in statement Accessarily they will have to be somewhat ramoling in statement and imperfect in form, because no opportunity has been given Senators to make a complete and accurate analysis of all the changes that have been made in the bill. It would take many days to make a detailed analysis of all the amendments made to the present law. I must at this time of necessity generalize in my observations

All tax legislation is concerned with the fundamental questions:

What will be the benefit and who will get it? What will be the burden and who will bear it?

What will be the burden and who will bear it?

The tariff is tax legislation, and no tariff tax should be established without a satisfactory answer to these questions.

In most countries the tariff bill is prepared by fiscal experts of the responsible administrative branch of the government after careful study and correlation of all the interests involved. In the United States the tariff is prepared by the Members of the Congress, few, if any, of whom have made a thorough study of the whole field of the tariff from the point of view of scientific public finance and international commerce.

gress, few, if any, of whom have made a thorough study of the whole field of the tariff from the point of view of scientific public finance and international commerce.

The average Member of the Congress has not had time to make a systematic study of public finances. He has had forced upon his attention the demands of his more powerful constituents, usually demanding higher duties. Otherwise he has had little time or interest for the many details involved. He does not know what will be the effects of duties. About all he knows is that the effect of his failure to secure higher rates for his constituents will be his retirement. He, therefore, is willing in many cases to agree to higher rates for others if they will grant the like favor to him. It has been well said that the United States tariff—the control of the lifeblood of industry and commerce, the control of the most important element of our foreign relations—is regulated by log-rolling. Surely the record with respect to the pending tariff bill in the Senate justifies this assertion. The fact that logrolling methods have not been apparently disastrous in the past does not prove that such methods may not ultimately be ruinous.

First, I put to the Senators who do me the honor of listening this question: Who is benefited by this bill? What class or group of our people is really benefited by this bill? A protective traiff bill is assumed to bring benefits to certain large groups or elements of our population, who receiving the benefits of increased protective duties, enabling them to increase prices of their products, will radiate and distribute benefits to the entire population by increasing production, lessening unemployment, and increasing the purchasing power of millions.

ing production, lessening unemployment, and increasing the purchasing power of millions.

In my opinion the only groups in America that even appear to be benefited by this bill are the small producers who are passing through a period of economic depression, and who believe that in some mysterious, unaccountable, unexplainable way the levying of increased tariff duties upon their products will bring prosperity. No one could have sat through the hearings upon this bill and listened to the pleas that have rung in our ears from the first day this bill came here until this hour without being impressed with this bill came here until this hour without being impressed with the fact that every individual business unit in this country which was being pushed up against the wall by economic forces beyond its control, such as consolidations of capital and rapid changes of styles, hearing that a revision of the tariff was to take place at Washington, has rushed down here, thinking in some magic way that the levying of an increased duty on its product in this bill would bring restored prosperity to it.

Another class of tariff applicants have advocated a new protec-tion idea. They have haunted the lobbies and found ardent spokesmen in the Senate. I refer to those who have sought to spokesmen in the Senate. I refer to those who have sought to levy duties not upon difference in cost of production here and abroad but to increase duties to offset transportation cost and disadvantage of location inside this country. These groups have sought, and with some success, to take from the seaboard communities the natural advantage of proximity to the sea and compel them to pay enormously increased prices for food and raw materials produced thousands of miles inland. The pressure that has been brought to bear upon us has been largely from this group and from the marginal producer, the little business man who, unfor-tunately, is being destroyed by the great commercial and financial combines of the hour and who has not the financial resources to readjust himself to new and changing conditions. He has been here wringing his hands and saying, "For God's sake, help me or I perish. Put some increased protection in this bill for me, and it may save me.

Scattered through this bill are some increased duties really for the benefit of the members of this unfortunate class, but, in my opinion, their troubles can not be remedied as a rule by the application of the protective system. Indeed, indirectly their trouble is the result of a protective policy that has favored trusts and combines. I do not pretend to say that there are not in this bill some rates which possibly will be beneficial to some limited groups in this country, but, if so, they will be obtained at a terrible price for the public in general. In short, it is inconceivable that we could revise our entire tariff system without there being some duties levied which would result in bringing some accidental benefits to certain classes accidental benefits to certain classes.

Before I point out the groups in the bill which, in my opinion, will not be benefited, I want to call attention to the economic conditions which exist in the Nation at the present time. One is tempted to exaggerate when he begins to discuss unemployment and the general and immediate business depression. I think it will be generally conceded, however, that there is serious industrial depression throughout the country at the present time, that there is much and extensive unemployment, that not only agriculture that we hear so much about but every line of business. culture that we hear so much about but every line of business is suffering—the manufacturer, the wholesaler, and the retailer.

If that is conceded—and I do not see how it could be seriously denied—it is very important for us to ascertain in what particulars this bill has a bearing upon the industries of this country which employ large groups of citizens. And the first proposition I put to the Senate is, which, if any, of the large manufacturing industries of the country is likely to be benefited by this bill?

Mr. Borah, Mr. President—

The Vice President. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. Borah. May I ask the Senator whether he has any information as to the lines of industry in which unemployment prevails?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. In practically every line, without exception, in my judgment. I have received one letter recently which was an exception to all the others I have received, and that happened to be from the Gillette Safety Razor Co., of Boston. They inform me that within the last few months they increased their working force by about 700, and they wrote the letter with a good deal of pride in the fact that their company seemed to stand alone.

Mr. Borah. They are putting out a new razor blade.

Mr. Wagnes, Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. Wagner. The question propounded by the Senator from Idaho becomes very interesting, because we are now having hearings before the Committee on Commerce on legislation proposed by me in which we are attempting to so organize a bureau in the Department of Labor that we may have accurate statistics on unemployment. Then, easily enough, the question propounded by the Senator could be answered, but at the present time the best we can have is a guess. We are in no position to judge just where the unemployment exists, and I think that has been a serious neglect on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am trying to find out seriously and honestly just who would be benefited by this bill, and I am going to begin first with the manufacturing industries of the country, asking that question again, without further digression upon the pressing and important question of unemployment.

Mr. Borah. Mr. President, I was of the opinion, as intimated by the Senator from New York, that we did not know in what particular line the great unemployment prevails.

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Mr. President, why prolong the discussion as to just how much unemployment there is and where it is? There are distressed industries in this country. Those cussion as to just how much unemployment there is and where it is? There are distressed industries in this country. Those that can be helped by the tariff are limited. Some could be benefited by an honest scientific readjustment of certain tariff rates. No industry can be benefited by increasing the costs of producing its finished product, but the large groups that have brought pressure to have tariff duties here and tariff duties there and tariff duties elsewhere compose the unfortunate elements which are being swamped and destroyed by economic forces that no tariff duties, no matter how highly levied, can control. Is not the honest conclusion that any disinterested observer must reach, who reads the evidence presented before the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee and who reads this bill, this: That an attempt has been made here to so expand the protective theory and principle as to make it possible, or at least to this: That an attempt has been made here to so expand the pro-tective theory and principle as to make it possible, or at least to pretend to make it possible, by tariff protective duties, to change inefficient business management into efficient business manage-ment; to make the wasteful, impoverished producer economical; to substitute some new commodity for that which the public to-day is demanding; and, further, to extend the principle of pro-tection to include the freight rates from one part of the country to another?

Mr. President, let us be specific. Who are the beneficiaries of this bill? Would the automobile industry be benefited by this bill? Everybody will concede that that is one of the gigantic industries of this country, and that it is one of the gigantic industries of this country, and that it is now passing through some depression through overproduction or other causes.

Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that this bill provides a reduction of from 25 per cent to 10 per cent upon the importations of automobiles?

tions of automobiles?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. It does.

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. It does.

Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma. Would the Senator contend that the reduction in the tariff would be in the interest of the big automobile manufacturers of the United States?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Certainly not. And it would not be contrary to their interests, either, because any depression the automobile industry is experiencing is not occasioned by imports. But if this industry is depressed from other causes, how does it help toward prosperity to increase its costs of production? I have information, furnished me by automobile manufacturers, to the effect that there are more than eight hundred and odd materials used in the manufacture of automobiles which carry increased duties in this bill. The increased cost of manganese ore alone will be $500,000 annually to the automobile industry. Butyl acetate, a constituent of all paints, will increase the costs $125,000 per year.

Who can argue that the great automobile business will be benefited if these duties are effective, with the cost of over 800 of its raw materials increased, and this at a time when the administration is seeking to spur up business and to bring prosperity to our industries?

What I have related about the automobile industry is, to some what I have related about the automobile industry is, to some degree, true of every other large industry in this country. Mr. President, we have here a bill laden down with increased duties upon the materials which the large manufacturing units of this country must use, adding to the cost of production of the products of these great industries, and thereby adding to the cost to the consumers, without any substantial and effective increased protection to these industries. And yet we are pretending to restore tion to these industries. And yet we are pretending to restore prosperity in this country.

A kindred business to the automobile industry is the tire business. What have you done for that industry? You have produced a universal protest by your duty on long-staple cotton and other increased duties on their raw materials.

The paper industry—paper is an important material used in enormous amounts for packing and commercial purposes by all industries—what have you done for it, except to increase the duties on casein, china clay, starches, and many other of its necessary materials?

materials?

Mr. President, I put this question again to Senators: Is the automobile industry, with its millions of employees, with its tremendous invested capital, with no increased protection, in favor of this bill—in fact, increased protection could not help the industry anyway—with increased cost on more than 800 of the materials used in the making of automobiles? That list of important materials I shall have inserted in the Record at a later time. It is not yet fully prepared.

Now, let us refer to some of the other larger industries.

Mr. Wheeler. Mr. President, will the Senator yield. Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. I yield. Mr. Wheeler. Would the fact that the costs have been increased to the automobile manufacturers make it more difficult for them to send out their products in competition with foreign manufac-

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Certainly. The Senator has brought to my mind exactly the additional point I wanted. The bill will also injure our foreign commerce generally. The trouble with this bill is that it is filled with impediments to industry and to commerce. It is overprotection. It is protection run mad. Impediments to all the great units of production in this country—impediments, impediments!

is no increased prosperity possible through increasing impediments.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it not a fact that what the manufacturing interests of this country need is the finding of more world markets interests of this country need is the finding of more world markets rather than the building of a tariff wall around the United States?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Exactly. The Senator has very well anticipated what I was going to say. We are, by increasing the cost of production of automobiles and steel and other exportable articles, helping to destroy our foreign business that is so necessary in order to maintain prosperity here. Moreover, we are stirring up the foreign countries to retaliation against our automobile and other exports. We are legislating in reckless disregard of the protests of other countries and against our own advantageous trade relations with them.

Now Mr. President, let us turn to the steel industry. One of geous trade relations with them.

Now, Mr. President, let us turn to the steel industry. One of the most pathetic sights in this Chamber during this debate was the Senator from Pennsylvania voting for rate after rate that would increase the cost of living and increase the cost of raw products to the manufacturers and people of his State, never missing an opportunity to do it, and not getting one single rate in this bill of substantial consequence in favor of Pennsylvania. I ask him what single rate there is in this bill to which he can point as really beneficial to the leading industries of Pennsylvania? Is it the rate on pig iron, the last product in which Pennsylvania is concerned, upon which a proposal for an increased duty was rejected? How he expects to defend his course, with a record of voting for everything in this bill that increases the cost of living and the cost of production to the manufacturers of Pennsylvania and getting nothing in return, is beyond my comprehension

Although I can not condone a Senator trading his vote, I can conceive some political though not ethical justification for trading votes when some one gets something in return, but I have not been able to see what the Senator from Pennsylvania received in return for his votes.

Mr. Vandenserg. Mr. President, the Senator does not share the view, then, that this is a "Grundy bill"?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. I share the view that he helped to shape and fashion this bill and influenced Senators to vote rates into it, but when it came to his own rates those whom he got together and whom he supported in their rates were ashamed to go through with his rates. I say that with all candor. The pig-iron vote showed it, and plenty of other votes here support it. ennsylvania has nothing in this bill but burdens and obstacles to its industries and its people.

Now, I inquire, how does the steel industry feel about this bill? I am trying to find out who would be benefited by the bill. How do these powerful and mighty steel companies feel about it?

Senators know what happened to manganese; they know how the steel industry protested that increased rate. It will cost the steel industry a million dollars per month because of this increased duty alone. I have not a statement of the exact number of materials used in the steel industry, but all through this bill are articles which the steel industry buys with increased duties, and the steel industry is to-day depressed and faced with the situation of paying increased prices for various and innumerable materials, prominently among them manganese, graphite, and many others which it uses in the making of its various steel products.

I am not now discussing the merits or the demerits of the various increases, but I am asking again and again the question, Who are the beneficiaries of the bill? Are the public utilities? The duty on lumber, while tremendously increasing the cost of

The duty on lumber, while tremendously increasing the cost of all buildings, operates to increase also the cost of every cedar pole used by public utilities about 75 cents per pole.

Let us turn to the woolen industry, which is one of the largest industries of the country. Scarcely a single duty on woolen fabrics, aside from compensatory duties, has been increased in the bill, and yet the raw material of the woolen industry, virgin wool, has its rate of duty increased from 31 to 34 cents a pound and the rate on woolen rags, the basic raw material of the carded-wool end of the woolen business, is increased from 7 to 18 cents per pound. Is the woolen industry by reason of benefits received in this bill enthusiastic about increased duties on its chief raw materials—virgin wool and wool rags?

Not only that, but I have before me a list of some 86 other materials used by the textile industry that have been given increased rates in the bill. So we have the woolen industry, depressed perhaps more than any other of the industries of the country, particularly one branch of that industry, and in the face of depression it has been handed a bill which adds impediment after impediment and increases the cost of its products by increasing the duty upon its raw materials. Of all the industries the defeat of this bill, I venture to predict that would welcome that the woolen mills that make popular-priced clothing from wool rags would be foremost.

Turning to the cotton-textile industry, I observe that scarcely a Turning to the cotton-textile industry, I observe that scarcely a cotton-textile product in the bill has been given an increased duty. I can recall only two now—cotton cloth and cotton blankets—which have been given a slightly increased rate. Yet one of the basic raw materials of that industry—namely, long-staple cotton—has been given a heavy duty, for the first time. I am sure that industry will not welcome having a duty levied upon its principal raw material. There is no need of spending time discussing the extent to which the cotton-textile business is depressed at the present time. Neither shall I take the time to enumerate the long list of impediments in the form of increased duties upon the chemicals, machinery, and dyes used by creased duties upon the chemicals, machinery, and dyes used by this industry. I find that of the various raw materials, outside those already referred to, used by the textile industries of the country the rates of duty have been increased in 68 particulars. In one instance there was a decrease and in several other in-

In one instance there was a decrease and in several other instances there was no change made in the rate.

Let us now consider the rayon industry. Rayon is one of the growing industries of the country, increasing in its production very rapidly. Yet during the last hours of the debate in this Chamber there was a unanimity of protest from the rayon-yarn manufacturers and the rayon-fabric manufacturers of all kinds against the increased duties upon the basic raw material—the filaments of rayon—from which rayon yarn is spun and rayon fabrics woven.

fabrics woven.

Not only filaments of rayon, but rayon waste, wool and wool waste, long-staple cotton, and flax, the raw material of the linen industry—all these crude products have been given increased duties with no corresponding increases except compensatory duties for the benefit of the finished fabrics. Even the foundry industry, as well as the stove-polish, pencil, and crucible-steel industry, has been given a heavy duty on its raw material—graphite. The foundry-facing industry stated very emphatically that if the increased duty on graphite was enacted into law that industry would be "put out of business."

Mr. President, I turn now to the candy, cake, and biscuit industry, one of the large industries of the country. The duties upon more than 50 materials that go into the making of candy have been increased in this bill, and with no increased duty upon nave been increased in this bill, and with no increased duty upon candy or for the benefit of the candy industry—as there ought not to be, because an increased duty would not be of any benefit. This industry finds, in the midst of the present depression, a law about to be enacted by the Congress of the United States adding about to be enacted by the Congress of the United States adding new impediments to it, increasing the cost of more than 50 of the materials used in the making of candy, the chief of them being sugar, nuts of various kinds, extracts of various kinds, jelly, fruits, many of them produced in southern California. Is the candy industry for this bill? Is any industry in the country in favor of a bill which is increasing its costs of production and giving it nothing in return?

Is the boot and shoe industry in favor of this bill? In the law of 1922 increased duties were levied upon 79 of the various materials used in the making of shoes. I have not been able to gather together the exact statistics showing the number of increased duties levied in this bill upon these materials, but they number well over 50. Here is a depressed industry, at least one number well over 50. Here is a depressed industry, at least one part of it—women's shoes—yet in the midst of depression, when they are here pleading for relief in the way of some slight protection, their raw materials are given increased duties, though shoes are compelled to remain on the free list. Instead of a protective duty upon their finished product, they are presented with increased costs upon more than 50 of the raw materials, so-called, increased costs upon more than 50 of the raw materials, so-called, used in that industry.

What do we find when we consider the tanning industry? I have had enumerated for me the number of items used by the tanners which are affected by this bill. The tanning industry is one of those industries which Mr. Hoover especially mentioned by name as "lagging behind." The items which the tanning industry uses, now on the free list, but made dutiable in this bill, are 3 in number; items now dutiable upon which the rate is decreased, 14; items now dutiable upon which the rate is decreased, 1. Here is a very gravely depressed industry, its depression un-1. Here is a very gravely depressed industry, its depression unquestionably due in part to heavy imports, confronted with a bill which proposes to put increased duties upon 14 of the materials used, and at the same time refused any protection on its own

Mr. President, I shall not take the time to discuss the other leading industries of the country, but the story is exactly the same; no real benefit is given them in the bill. It is doubtful if any benefit could be given positively by increased duties, because many of them are already receiving the maximum of protection that can be effective; but burden after burden is heaped upon them with respect to increased duties upon materials which thos industries must import and use. Increased cost of production and other additional impediments are given in an hour of general has been offset again and again by increased duties upon the materials used in their manufacture.

For the purpose of showing how there may be an appearance that some of the smaller producers have benefited in the bill, let that some of the smaller producers have benefited in the bill, let me call attention to straw hats and fur-felt hats, both of these classes of hats having been given increased duties. The list of the commodities used in the manufacture of straw and fur-felt hats shows that on eight of those commodities the duty rates have been increased. Here are two depressed industries asking for relief, and yet upon eight of the commodities used by those industries increased duties have been levied. The commodities used in the manufacture of straw hats have had the rates of duty increased in at least five instances. While in some instances there may appear to be a benefit in the giving of increased duties on the various finished products of certain industries, such benefit has been offset again and again by increased duties upon the materials used in their manufacture.

Let us study a small industry like bottled carbonated beverages. Flavoring substances, fruits, coloring substances, chemicals, and sundries are some of the commodities used in this industry. The dutiable items on which the rate has been increased are 6 in number; items on the free list made dutiable, 1; items dutiable on which the rate is decreased, 1. In every instance, for whatever benefit that has been given—and no benefit was given to this particular industry because it did not ask for any—there have been increased duties levied upon the various materials used by the producers of the finished products. So of the brush and have been increased duties levied upon the various materials used by the producers of the finished products. So of the brush and broom industry and hundreds of other small industries.

If to the raw materials proper used by all industries were added mill supplies, office supplies, electrical supplies, I am informed they would swell considerably the total number of articles used in manufacturing, the cost of which has been increased by the duties in this bill.

duties in this bill.

Turning now to another aspect of this subject, Mr. President, I asked a leading supplier of the dry-goods trade to give me some idea of the increased duties that have been levied upon dry goods carried by the department stores. I said I did not want to know the increased duties upon all items, but the increased duties on the principal classes of merchandise in a typical dry-goods store. I was informed that upon at least 50 out of 53 major groups of the almost innumerable articles furnished the dry-goods stores of the country increased duties had been levied in the bill.

The 5-and-10-cent stores report that the increased duties on innumerable articles sold in those stores vary from 28 to 200 innumerable articles sold in those stores vary from 28 to 200 per cent. Certainly the wholesale and retail merchant can find no advantage to business in this bill.

Mr. President, I am still pressing the question, Who will be benefited by this tariff bill if it becomes a law? I think this

do not desire this bill.

I had read at the desk this morning an editorial from the Boston Transcript, calling upon Mr. Hoover to veto this bill. I do not hesitate to say that if Mr. Hoover has the courage to use his power of veto he will receive a tremendous response commending him from every quarter and every section of this country, regardless of party. No man in public life has such an opportunity to ingratiate himself in the hearts of all the people, regardless of party, and of all groups and classes in American life, as Mr. Hoover has through the opportunity presented to him to veto this bill. He would have behind him, not only all the larger manufacturing interests and all the farming interests, but all the consumers; and on the other side would be only the few marginal producers, who have been pulling at our coats for weeks, and to consumers, and on the other side would be only the few marginal producers, who have been pulling at our coats for weeks, and to whose pleas we have been listening, without thinking of the awful consequences to the larger units of industry, to agriculture, and to the army of American consumers who pay the bills for protection.

Mr. President, let us next consider the average citizen, the too often forgotten consumer, and see wherein he benefits by this proposed legislation. What does the average citizen require in order to live? Food, clothing, a house in which to live, and furniture.

furniture.

Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

The President Officer (Mr. Goff in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that this bill proposes to afford a very large degree of protection on rags?

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Many kinds of rags.

Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma. And that is about the only thing the people will be able to produce in the future.

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma has supplemented my speech very aptly by declaring Oklahoma has supplemented my speech very aptly by declaring that one result of this bill, should it become a law, will be a decree to the general public to use rags for their wearing apparel.

to the general public to use rags for their wearing apparel.

However, I want seriously to discuss the question of how this bill affects the prices of clothing, shelter, food, and furniture. Let us first take shelter. Lumber, brick, cement, wall board, wall paper, window glass, paint, hardwood flooring, tiles—in fact, almost every item necessary in the construction of the homes of the people—has had increased duties levied upon it in the pending bill. That is one of the flagrant and indefensible features of the measure. This proposed legislation can mean only an increased cost not only of homes but an increased cost of rented tenements, because the tenant's rent is measured by the cost of building. On nearly every commodity which is used in the building of shelter for the American people increased duties have been imposed. Not only will that be a burden to the individual, to the home builder, and to the man who pays rent but it will be an injury to every manufacturer, every real-estate investor in the country; and this at a time and period when we want to expand our industries and restore prosperity. Surely the home owner, surely the man who pays rent for a tenement, can not find in this bill any satisfaction or any inducement to thrift. or any inducement to thrift.

I repeat, one of the most outrageous burdens in the measure is the increased duty upon building material of every kind and class. They are too numerous to mention.

They are too numerous to mention.

Now, Mr. President, let us consider clothing. I observe that I have the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. George], who, representing the minority, had charge of the wool schedule, the cotton schedule, the rayon schedule, and the silk schedule. I know he, at least, will confirm my declaration that the result of the increased duties levied in the bill on the raw materials from which our clothing is made means, if any of these rates shall be effective, that the clothing bill of the American public will be increased by hundreds of millions of dollars. Not a single fabric used in clothing our people has escaped increased tariff burdens, because of the compensatory duties necessarily levied upon every fabric used in clothing on account of the increased duties on all raw materials. On furniture—on the basic raw material of furniture, various types of imported tropical woods and lumber—increased duties have been levied. Even the glue that puts together the parts of the furniture, the paint on the furniture, plywood, veneers—all have had imposed on them increased taxes by this bill.

Mr. President, let us turn to food, where shameful increases

Mr. President, let us turn to food, where shameful increases have been levied. The duties on fresh vegetables have been increased as follows:

Green beans—the amount of increase levied in this bill is 83 per cent. On mushrooms there is an increase of 25 per cent; on per cent. On mushrooms there is an increase of 25 per cent; on peas an increase of 40 per cent; on onions a 70 per cent increase; on potatoes a 17 per cent increase, amounting to about 52 cents per bushel. On tomatoes, an increase of 79 per cent has been levied; on turnips an increase of 14 per cent; on cabbages an increase of 116 per cent; on fresh vegetables, not specially provided for, an increase of 115 per cent. These increases have been levied on the food of the poor, of the working classes, of the masses, of those at present unemployed. There has been, I repeat, a 115 per cent average increase in the duties upon the common every-day vegetables.

Meats: The duty on beef has been increased 26 per cent by this bill; on veal 17 per cent; on mutton 29 per cent; on lamb 16 per cent; on pork 19 per cent. On meats, fresh, not specially provided for, the duty has been increased 32 per cent. The duty on canned meats other than ham and bacon was increased 26 per cent; on prepared or preserved meats, not specially provided for, it was increased 30 per cent. It is apparent that the packers, not the cattle raisers, will be the chief beneficiaries of these increases.

As to dairy products, the increased duty proposed on milk is 23 per cent; and I am informed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Blaine] that a new definition of milk has been provided in this bill, so that what heretofore was not milk is now going to be milk in order to receive the heaft of an increased projection on

Ar. Blaine; that a new definition of milk has been provided in this bill, so that what heretofore was not milk is now going to be milk, in order to receive the benefit of an increased protection on milk. No wonder the consumption of milk by the poor has decreased. I was reading only yesterday some very interesting information to the effect that the larger the family the less the consumption of milk per capita in recent years, due to the fact that milk has increased so greatly in price that where there are several children it has become a luxury and it is impossible for the head of the family to supply the children with milk; and yet, in face of that fact, it is proposed to increase the duty upon milk and cream very substantially.

Mr. Blaine. Just for the purpose of accuracy, since the Senator referred to the definition of milk, I desire to state that the provision is that milk containing so much butterfat shall be classified as cream. So it is a new definition of cream, and not of milk.

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. It is putting under the head of cream what heretofore has been treated as milk.

Mr. Blaine. By lowering the butterfat content.

Mr. Walsh of Massachusetts. Exactly. Previously that content would be treated as milk, but now it is to be treated as cream.

Sour milk and buttermilk, increased duty 3 per cent.

Cream, increased duty 12 per cent.

Cheese increased duty 14 per cent.

duty 16 per cent.

duty 16 per cent.

Cheese, increased duty 14 per cent.
All kinds of eggs, increased duty 40 per cent.
Miscellaneous agricultural products:
Corn, increased duty 10 per cent.
Rice and rice flour, increased duty 10 per cent.
Cherries, prepared, increased duty 29 per cent.
Figs, prepared and preserved, increased duty 39 per cent.
Lemons, increased duty 16 per cent. The duty on lemons in the bill is 79 per cent; so all together there is approaching 100 per cent duty on lemons for the benefit of a few lemon growers in southern California.

Limes, increased duty 49 per cent.
Grapefruit, increased duty 16 per cent.

Limes, increased duty 49 per cent.
Grapefruit, increased duty 16 per cent.
Plums and prunes, increased duty 22 per cent.
Blueberries, increased duty 20 per cent.
Edible nuts, shelled and unshelled, increased duty 23 per cent.
Dried beans, increased duty 27 per cent.
Dried peas, increased duty 19 per cent.
I think one of the most interesting items is blueberries. I can not let the occasion go by without telling something about blueberries, for it illustrates how this bill has been framed and the small but burdensome increases levied at the expense of the plain people of the country.

small but burdensome increases levied at the expense of the plain people of the country.

The picking of blueberries in the eastern section of our country is begun in June. As the weeks pass the blueberry crops begin to ripen up the Atlantic seacoast into New England. The last of the blueberries in the State of Maine are picked during the last weeks of August. On the island of Newfoundland, out beyond Nova Scotia, there is raised a fine crop of some of the best blueberries in the world. These berries ripen after all the American fresh-picked blueberries are exhausted, during the month of September. Because they have a few blueberry-canning factories in Maine, a duty upon fresh blueberries was requested. They demanded that the public substitute canned for fresh blueberry pie.

Senators who live along the Atlantic seacoast from Washington to Portland, Me., have wondered why they are able to get fresh blueberry pie—one of the most delicious of the pies and one of the most delectable of all our foods—not only during the summer months but late in September and even in October. It is because of the blueberries that come from that island off the coast of Nova Scotia, frozen and sent to various parts of the country aven to Chicago. Now a high tentif is put in this bill to coast of Nova Scotia, frozen and sent to various parts of the country, even to Chicago. Now a high tariff is put in this bill to force us to use canned blueberries and to do away with fresh blueberries in the months of September and October. Here is another new idea invoked in tariff making, namely, using tariff duties to force our people to use substitutes.

Mustard seeds, proverbial for their insignificance, present an interesting tariff story. The mustard seed is the raw material from which dry mustard, known variously as ground mustard, mustard flour, and mustard; and also the raw material for wet mustard, known as prepared mustard for condiment and table use. Yellow mustard seeds are principally used for the manufacture of these various types of prepared mustard. It is reliably estimated that the domestic production of yellow mustard seeds does not exceed 50,000 pounds a year, whereas the domestic demand is nearly 15,000,000 pounds a year. The total domestic production of black and yellow mustard seeds last year was 1,900,000 pounds.

Dounds.

Under the act of 1922 the rate of duty on mustard seeds is 1 cent per pound, while the Senate bill seeks to impose a duty of 2 cents per pound. The change in duty from 1 cent to 2 cents per pound would mean that the numerous manufacturers of prepared mustards and spices will pay $300,000 each year; the 115,000,000 people of the United States would be taxed nearly $640,000 on finished mustard in order to set up a bonus of $38,000 a year for the few growers on the Pacific coast who do not produce even for the few growers on the Pacific coast who do not produce even enough mustard seed to supply the State of California.

Take a small item like beeswax upon which a substantially increased duty has been levied. The domestic production has steadily decreased because the bee industry in this country is a honey-producing industry rather than a beeswax-producing industry, the former being more profitable. It is absolutely necessary to import about 85 per cent of our large consumption of over 6,000,000 pounds. Thus, with no prospect whatever of the bee industry being benefited, the industries engaged in producing candles, cosmetics, shoe polish, floor and other polishes, insulating material, compounds, dental supplies, pharmaccuticals, paints, cutlery, thread, etc., all of whom must import beeswax, will be penalized by increased costs due to the increased tariff duties levied apparently for the benefit of the few farmers who produce beeswax only to the amount of 15 per cent of our large industrial needs. industrial needs.

Mr. President, the duties levied and attempted to be levied upon food products in this bill is a crime that should cry to heaven for vengeance. It is a cruel and shameless record.

All through this bill is the same shameful story—give and take; the swapping of votes; an exchange of rates. "You give me this rate, and I will give you a rate upon some product that is produced in your particular State or your particular locality." During the last days this logrolling reached the high-water mark. To my mind, exchanging votes for tariff duties that burden our people is as reprehensible as it would be for a judge to exchange legal decision with other judges on the Supreme Court bench.

Now, let us inquire further. Has the farmer benefited by this bill?

No farmer produces all these agricultural products enumer-No farmer produces all these agricultural products enumerated above, but most farmers do use a large number of feeds. I am sure the farmers of the South particularly, and the farmers of the Northeast, and many of the farmers of the far West, will be interested to see what has happened in this bill to feeds which the farmers must buy for their cattle and for their poultry. Among the feeds which millions of farmers use and do not produce that have been given increased duties are bran and shorts, corn, oats, middlings, hay, and straw.

The American Feed Manufacturers' Association informs me that there has been an increase in the duty on articles used as feed in the case of 10 of these products, and there is just one dutiable feed article on which the duty was decreased. So on 10 of the feed products used by the millions of small farmers of this country to feed their poultry and livestock the duty is increased. Even try to feed their poultry and livestock the duty is increased. Even the farmer's seed have been given generous increases. Surely everything he buys for his home and children and farm have the farmer's seed have been given generous increases. Surely everything he buys for his home and children and farm have added burdens placed upon them.

Mr. President, I must not prolong the discussion of this sad and disappointing experience in tariff making. I have already talked longer than I intended; but in view of this record, in view of the increased duties that have been levied in this bill, according to the necessarily hasty analysis I have made of it, I again inquire who is to be benefited by the enactment into law of this legislation—what group? Is it the farmers for whom the bill is supposed to be specially constructed?

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Blaine] again and again, in the most frank and candid manner, has said that these agricultural duties in most instances will not be effective; and if they are effective, will only tend to benefit a small group of farmers at the expense of larger groups of farmers. I am convinced that his position in that matter is absolutely sound; that the farmers in general will get no benefit from this bill. Whatever little benefit comes to the average farmer from the increased duties that may be effective, will be offset tremendously by the increased duties on his clothing, the increased duties on his furniture; the increased duties on all his tools and implements and machines, and the materials for the buildings that shelter himself and his family and his livestock. The farmers in general will be taxed under this bill many dollars for the few cents a few particular farmers may gather in here and there from the increased duty on wool, on casein, on sugar, citrus fruits, long-staple cotton, and other like agricultural products.

Mr. President, sectional interests, political influence, fanaticism.

Mr. President, sectional interests, political influence, fanaticism, propaganda to the effect that protection was a panacea to agricultural relief, unsound economic theories, and many other factors, have resulted in the drafting of a bill that is filled with inequalities and economic monstrosities.

Where are those who benefit by this bill? They can not be found. This bill is without friends. It is unsung and unhonored. Here and there are some real net benefit to marginal producers, possibly. Undoubtedly hidden here and there some benefit for individuals; but all the rest of the American people must pay dearly for the benefits to the few.

I wish to make one final commentary on this bill as a whole; I wish to make one final commentary on this bill as a whole; that is, to call attention to the slipshodness and the thoughtlessness of its construction. By slipshodness of construction I mean especially the great number of specific duties used for the first time, or unwisely continued, which apply in a given paragraph to a considerable variety of commodities or grades of a commodity like wool and many others in this bill, having a wide range of values. Everybody knows that such commodities should have an ad valorem rate of duty; that they do not lend themselves to a common specific rate. A common specific rate applied under such circumstances means equivalent ad valorem rates all the way from almost nothing to several hundred and even thousands per cent. Such rates represent regressive taxation bearing most heavily upon the incomes of the poor. The object sought, in many instances, is wholly to exclude the cheaper varieties of imports of the commodity and to do it in such a way that the press and public can not see it at the time the legislation is passed. It takes expert knowledge of import prices to figure equivalent ad valorem rates; the layman does not and can not know anything about it. In the layman does not and can not know anything about it. In three special instances during the debate did I point out how harmful specific duties are. In the debates on wool, lumber, hides, in particular, attention was called by me to the injustices of this method of levying tariff duties. In each of the above instances the specific duty attempted to be levied, and which was in fact levied in the case of wool and lumber, in actual practice would operate to levying on wool an equivalent ad valorem rate varying from 20 per cent to over 100 per cent. Cheap wool used in the clothing of the masses and the cheap lumber used in the homes of the working classes and the pioneer farmers would bear, under these specific duties, rates amounting to nearly 100 per cent, in comparison with greatly reduced rates on the clothing and the homes of the well-to-do and of expensive office buildings.

This same outrageous, despicable method of levying tariff duties has been applied even to food products. This is not, however, a new wrong but an old wrong. It is hidden protection purposely planned and designed to deceive the public and keep them in ignorance of the harm and injury as well as the increased hardships that such duties inflict upon the less prosperous of our citizens.

By the thoughtlessness of the framing of this bill I mean that in the main each separate paragraph has been dealt with by itself, in disregard of the effect of the action taken upon other dependent industries. I have especially in mind materials and supplies used in manufacturing in contrast to articles of final consumption. used in manufacturing in contrast to articles of final consumption. The consumer of finished goods has always received little enough consideration at the hands of high protectionists; this time it is industry itself that has received scant consideration. It seems to have been overlooked that in the case of raw materials and manufacturing supplies the imports do not represent foreigners invading our markets (a point of view quite justly to be taken with respect to finished goods), but rather they represent our own industrialists going abroad to get the things they need—qualities and kinds of materials, machinery with special attachments, and so forth, often not produced in this country and which they require to carry on their industries efficiently and profitably. It is nothing short of amazing the way in which throughout the debate and the public hearings upon this bill, it has evidently been absent from almost everybody's thought, the shifting of these duties and the impediment and burden and disorganizing force they constitute for industry, especially for the major industries like the textile industry, the steel industry, and many others, basic to the prosperity of this country. The question of the tariff benefit to be conferred upon the manufacturers of textile machinery, or upon the miners of manganese ore, to illustrate, has been dealt with in an air-tight compartment, so to speak, by tiself and without consideration of the question of how many barnacles of this sort the textile industry (far from prosperous), and the steel industry, and others, can stand.

There are several reasons for this strange blind spot and the consequent light-hearted and careless bestowing of disorganizing and disruptive burdens upon the major industries through the bestowal of tariff benefits upon the lesser industries. The chief reason is, perhaps, a general oversight of the factor of the profit per unit of output of the larger industries; all the talk and questioning has been about prices. It is asked, for example, what will be The consumer of finished goods has always received little enough consideration at the hands of high protectionists; this time it is cents per pair. Therefore an increase in the cost of sole leather brought about by a duty on imported hides, if one be imposed, and other increased costs brought about by little nibbling duties on this and that, may result in wholly wiping out the profit on manufacturing an average pair of shoes. It could have this effect in the first instance and that effect would be continued except which that the shoe manufacturer will contrive and maneuver and stint and spare, and so get by with slightly reduced quality.

I predict that when and if this tariff bill goes into effect the immediate result will be that the managers of the leading industries of this country will be at their wits' end how to meet its disorganizing influences and how to offset its profit-destroying influences. They can not find a ready solution in all instances by merely advancing their sale prices, as they did during the World War, when a great monetary inflation was in progress. That is out of the question now. The people can not be compelled to pay generally much more for their clothing and other requirements; they have not the more money to pay with. But they can and will be forced to put up with inferior clothing and other articles. That is what your increased duties on virgin wool and on wool rags in the main will come to. And so on in like manner all along the line.

Mr. President, another deplorable feature of this bill is the effect that the increased duties upon imports, that must be brought into the country and that are the raw materials extensively used by our manufacturers, will have in increasing the cost of production of American manufacturers and consequently result in retarding our export business. To find another February (1930) in which the value of our exports has been so small we must go back to 1923. The decline in our exports for the eight months of the current fiscal year was approximately $300,000,000, while the decline in our imports has been only $39,000,000.

With the increased cost of production levied upon our American producers, how can we expect anything but further pronounced shrinkage in our exports, which means, of course, a glut in the home markets, curtailed production, unemployment, and all the undesirable consequences which nominally follow?

Mr. President, this bill has the condemnation of and is repudiated by all serious-minded people. There is not a Republican, either of the Old Guard or of the farm bloc, on this floor who has any enthusiasm for it. There is not a citizen in America, except some selfish producer, who has any confidence in this bill. Democrats and Republicans alike are against it. No newspaper in the country defends it. Consumers, manufacturers, and agriculturists denounce it. Other nations are getting ready to retaliate. Here and there only some producer in desperate financial circumstances, hoping that a miracle may happen to his business by the passage of this tariff bill, is the exceptional supporter of it. This bill is founded upon no principle or policy. It means injury to American industries of every class and kind; and the last circumstance under which such a bill ought to be passed is the present time of depression, when industries need real help, not impediments. Only partisan pride sustains hope in its being kept alive.

Mr. President, this country is undoubtedly committed to the protection policy, but it wants reasonable not ruinous protection. The pending bill is not in any sense reasonable protection or defendable upon any of the old principl

RELIEF OF STORM-STRICKEN AREAS IN THE SOUTH

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in my hand I have a joint resolution which was prepared with reference to relief for the storm-stricken areas of the South. I offer it on behalf of myself and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. George]. It has been prepared in cooperation with him and with the other members of the Alabama delegation. It is very short, and I ask that it may be read at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 130) to provide assistance in the rehabilitation of certain storm-stricken areas in the United States and in relieving unemployment in such areas, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, South Carolina, and Kentucky are suffering from the effects of recent storms which rendered thousands of people homeless, devastated farms, destroyed houses, barns, and other equipment, and increased unemployment in the storm-stricken areas in such States; and

Whereas the damage caused by the storm was so great as to make it impossible for the governments of those States to give adequate relief in the emergency: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed immediately to assist in the rehabilitation of the storm-stricken areas in such States. For such purposes the corporation shall have power to make logue to persons in the the corporation shall have power to make loans to persons in the storm-stricken areas in such States upon such terms and conditions as the corporation shall by regulation prescribe, including an agreement by the borrowers to use the loans for the purposes specified by the corporation; except that no such loan shall be specified by the corporation; except that no such loan shall be made for a period of more than 10 years or in an amount in excess of $15,000 to any one individual. The rate of interest upon each such loan beginning with the fourth year shall be 5 per cent per annum, but the corporation, in its discretion, may defer the payment of interest upon any such loan for such period of time as the corporation shall deem necessary. All such loans shall be made by the corporation itself or through such agencies as the corporation shall designate. All money received during a period of two years from the date of approval of this joint resolution as repayment of principal or interest of any loan made pursuant to this joint resolution shall be held by the corporation as a revolving fund, which may be loaned on applications for the purposes and upon the terms and conditions herein provided, and all moneys received thereafter as repayment of principal or interest of any such loan shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

of any such loan shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC 2. Not to exceed $5,000,000 of the sum appropriated in Public Resolution No. 7, Seventy-second Congress, approved January 27, 1932, is hereby reappropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution.

SEC. 3. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall make an annual report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session and give a complete account of its activities in carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution. provisions of this joint resolution.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it is my intention to ask that immediate consideration be given this resolution, but I have discussed it with the leader on the other side of the Chamber, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary], and he has requested I do not ask for action to-day. Therefore, I am going to request that the resolution be printed and lie on the table. It is my intention to-morrow to ask for its consideration.

With the consent of the Senator from Vermont, I should like to make just a brief statement with reference to the measure, and then I am through. It is copied almost verbatim from the resolution adopted for the relief of the Porto Ricans. It authorizes no new appropriation, but proposes to utilize $5,000,000 of the funds which have been appropriated already for the relief of banks and railroads and business enterprises in order to relieve people who have been stricken by the storm. I thank the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I want to suggest to the Senator that he | will make time by having the resolution referred to a committee. It ought to go to a committee; it ought to be acted upon by a committee; and I suggest that it be referred to a committee right away.

Mr. BLACK. With the consent of the Senator from Vermont, I will say I was a little at loss to know to what committee it would be proper to refer it if it should go to a committee. Personally, I had hoped that on account of the necessity for immediate action there would be no request that it go to a committee.

Mr. JONES. I think an authorization of that kind should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BLACK. I might state that the appropriation has already been made. Of course, if it is insisted upon, it may become necessary to send the resolution to a committee. Will the Appropriations Committee meet to-morrow?

Mr. JONES. It is not for the Appropriations Committee to act on a measure of the kind proposed. It proposes legislation, and should go to a legislative committee, and it should go there right away.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. WALCOTT addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I read the resolution very hurriedly, but discussed the subject matter with the Senator from Alabama. My opinion is that the resolution properly should go to the Committee on Banking and Currency, which had jurisdiction over the original act.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. I merely desire to ask a question. strongly as the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Washington do, and I was going to make the same suggestion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. However, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. Is it proposed to do what is contemplated by making a loan or otherwise? The Reconstruction Finance Corporation are only empowered to lend money. I did not catch in the resolution its significance in that respect, and I should like to ask the Senator for an explanation of that point.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that the measure provides for loans to aid in rehabilitation work, and for that reason we believed that it would be better to have it handled by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Porto Rican loan was handled by a commission consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of Agriculture. Those of us who have considered this question prefer to have the matter handled by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Senator from Alabama, perhaps, did not understand the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut. His question was whether the resolution provided gratuities or merely authorized loans.

Mr. BLACK. The resolution provides for loans for rehabilitation work.

Mr. WALCOTT. But the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law provides that the money must be loaned either to financial institutions of the various categories enumerated in the bill or to railroads. I did not catch anything in the resolution that would so provide. Are the loans to be made to financial institutions for the purpose of rehabilitation work?

Mr. BLACK. No. The idea we have is that in a stormstricken area of this kind it would certainly be appropriate to lend to those individuals who have been injured. That to lend to those individuals who have been injured. That is exactly what was done after the storm in Porto Rico; that is what we are requesting here; and we believe that the into a world-wide economic war. Every nation is to-day engaged Reconstruction Finance Corporation has the proper equipment and can handle this matter better than can the three members of the Porto Rican commission. It seems to be the opinion of those who are here that the resolution should be referred to a committee; and if I knew that the Banking and Currency Committee would meet to-morrow, or if there is some other committee that will meet to-morrow, I would be glad to have the measure referred to it. Personally I would think that in a case of a resolution of this kind perhaps the Senate could act upon it without referring it to a committee. For the present, Mr. President, I will ask that the resolution lie on the table, and later I may submit a different request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table.

THE PATHWAYS OF RECOVERY-ADDRESS BY SENATOR WAGNER

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered by my colleague [Mr. Wagner] on Saturday last. It is entitled "The Pathways to Recovery." Certainly we are seeking those paths, and I commend the address to the careful reading of Members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the address was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER, OF NEW YORK, AT THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC FORUM, NEW YORK CITY, MARCH 26, 1932

Mr. Chairman and friends, I have not come here to criticize the administration for acts done or undone. I have not come to make a political speech. Our country is faced with dangers so grave that partisan considerations become unwelcome intrusions.

purposes are to consider with you a problem of government, to state my views on the matters in controversy in connection with that problem, and to secure from you the benefit of your judgment. That, I take it, is the function of this forum and that is essentially the process of democratic and representative

The problem is: What are the pathways of recovery? The United States is economically sick. The world is financially ailing.

How can they get well?

The controversial issues involved in this problem are very numerous, but those most significant to our own country at this moment revolve about the question: How far shall the Government go in promoting recovery? It is that question which I especially desire consider.

Before we can intelligently appraise the various methods pro-posed for recovery we must have some idea of the goal we are attempting to reach. We must formulate some conception of the condition we should like to create.

I have head many men, in both public and private life, express the hope that we return to the prosperous days of 1929. That is a ridiculous folly. It reminds me of a patient praying for the return of the very disorders which preceded and precipitated his breakdown. It is the unavoidable truth that the conditions of 1928 and 1929 produced the misery of 1932.

We need not be expert statisticians to understand these simple figures. For every $100 worth of merchandise which the factories of the United States produced in 1919, they produced $135 worth in 1929. But they turned out this larger production with 500,000 fewer workers. This tendency was already noticeable in 1927 and 1928; and the condition I have described held true not only in the factories, but equally in the mines on the reduceds and in the factories, but equally in the mines, on the railroads, and in every line of industrial activity. It was the realization of that supremely important fact which persuaded me during the very first session that I went to the Senate that unemployment was the most serious catastrophe against which the United States must Business was already then seriously out of balance. The collapse would have come much sooner than it did but for two factors. By means of large-scale installment buying we maintained the purchasing power of the domestic market. By lending heavily to foreign customers we sustained our export trade. Both of these methods, however, had their obvious limits and when these were reached business crashed into the depression from which we have not yet begun to emerge.

There were only two possible avenues of escape from the impending disaster. The one was a substantial increase in the real purchasing power of the domestic market—the other an increase in the effective, self-sustained demand of the foreign market. pursued neither course. In the domestic market the country looked on lazily and without concern while the mechanization of industry was releasing thousands and then hundreds of thousands of men and women from their working places without hope of securing other jobs. Their purchasing power dwindled and vanished.

in artificially throtting the now of international trade by higher tariffs, quota systems, and embargoes.

Meanwhile a surplus of capital funds which found no outlet in useful production or useful consumption was shunted into the whirlpool of speculation and stock inflation and aggravated the whiripool of speculation and stock inflation and aggravated the intensity of business disorganization.

Only those who are willing to go back to a condition in which business is almost continuously out of balance—in which the country is always either emerging from one depression or entering another, in which employment is always uncertain and insacure—only those who can look with satisfaction upon such chaos regard the predepression period as the model to which we should regard the predepression period as the model to which we should return.

On the other hand there is a large and increasing number of people in the United States who are inspired by a brighter vision—who look forward to a degree of orderliness and stability in business, to a measure of security in earning a livelihood, to a standard of living which is high enough not only to satisfy physical wants but also to permit spiritual development and growth. We hope, out of these conditions, to build a nation physically sturdy and morally strong and free of the stifling anxieties which now beset us alike in times of depression and prosperity.

What roads will lead us to that objective?

Our starting point is, of course, our present position: It is a comparatively simple matter to describe that position in terms of business and social statistics; a 38 per cent decline in production since 1929; more than eight-millions looking for jobs and unable to find them; a 550 per cent increase over 1929 in the amount of charitable relief distributed to the unemployed. Startling as these figures are, they do not reveal the intensity of the individual tragedies which have visited hundreds of thousands of proud families; they do not disclose the insidious reduction of living standards; they do not measure the extent of physical impairment and moral deterioriation. We have no way of enumerating these heart-stirring facts—but we know, nevertheless, of their prevalence. We know that they are vital; that they will condition and check the progress of America.

It seems to me clear as daylight that the first advance in the direction of recovery must be in this area of tragic want and un-

It seems to me clear as daylight that the first advance in the direction of recovery must be in this area of tragic want and unemployment. That is the sore spot which requires our first aid and the most persistent attention. In other words, it is not the top the most persistent attention. In other words, it is not the top of the upper structure of business which should first be repaired but the foundation which requires to be buttressed—and that foundation consists of the standard of living of the great masses of our people and the jobs which enable them to maintain that

We can not even begin to move along any pathway of recovery as long as a substantial number of our people are in destitution. We shall never be able to consolidate any victory in the war against depression as long as increasing numbers barely manage to subsist. We can not accomplish measurable results as long as millions of families are by reason of unemployment unable to buy the products of the farm and factory. No one who is aware of these conditions at first hand can resist their human call. It is not only humanity, however, but sound economics as well which dictates that our very first step in the direction of recovery must be to provide amply and generously for the relief of those who have suffered most severely from the depression.

There is no reason or excuse why anyone in the United States should suffer hunger, undernourishment, or lack of shelter. The important need is that relief should be made available. Whether it be the cities or States or the Federal Government that provides relief is, under the unprecedented circumstances, of secondary We can not even begin to move along any pathway of recovery it be the cities or States or the Federal Government that provides relief is, under the unprecedented circumstances, of secondary concern. My own judgment is that every agency, public and private, local and national should undertake to do its maximum. The situation is so desperate that only by mustering the combined strength of all our people can we hope to win. It is for that reason that I have introduced and advocated a bill in the Senate calling upon the Federal Government to advance to the States $375,000,000 for the relief of the hungry and the destitute upon certification of the governor of the State that there is need of Federal relief. need of Federal relief.

That is a matter of immediate and irrepressible emergency, made necessary because the other steps which I shall mention have not necessary because the other steps which I shall mention have not yet been undertaken.

The second pathway of recovery leads straight to the pivotal need of the present emergency—the provision of jobs for those who are ready, willing, and able to work. Here we are in very controversial territory. It is the view of the administration, expressed by two members of the Cabinet, that the Government has done all that it can do when it unlimbered the banking machinery by means of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the by means of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Glass-Steagall Banking Act. Having strengthened the banks and created a condition of more liberal credit it is, according to the administration, the responsibility of business to initiate the

I have no quarrel at all with those who urge business to begin.

My controversy is only with those who believe it is time for the Government to stop. Business does not act in response to speeches. Business will resume only in response to a demand for commodities by purchasers who have the price to pay.

Such an increase in demand has not yet originated and, indeed, can not originate except with inhuman sluggishness as long as millions of families are without pay envelopes and millions more are anxiously dreading the arrival of the desolate day when their breadwinners too will be drafted into the army of unemployed.

The administration's view seems to be based on the assumption that men are out of work because banks curtailed the supply of in artificially throttling the flow of international trade by higher | credit. The reverse is the fact. Banks curtailed their credit betariffs, quota systems, and embargoes.

Meanwhile a surplus of capital funds which found no outlet in stantial number of these to their jobs merely by liberalizing credit.

Consequently it seems to me that the Government can and must go further than it has. It must start the process of reemployment. Once that begins we know that employment creates more employment. The earnings of one industry become the purchases which set going the other industries, and the recovery is on.

How can the Government initiate such a movement? How can it provide jobs? Far be it from me to suggest that the Government in the context of the cont ment embark on a program of unnecessary and uneconomic under-takings simply for the sake of putting men to work. Such a course is wasteful, and waste has never yet promoted recovery. As a matter of fact, there is no need for such a course. The Government does not need to contrive jobs merely for the sake of providing work.

The truth is that the Federal Government has been hoarding.

It has been withof providing work.

The truth is that the Federal Government has been hoarding employment opportunities for the past year. It has been withholding from the market necessary and useful projects which Congress has long ago investigated and approved. These fully authorized projects for which no money has been voted amount to over a billion dollars. They are ready and available. The blue prints are prepared. If released now, it would mean that a million men would in a short time actually be working and earning their wages. Such a program means orders for steel, stone, brass, wood, tile, radiation supplies, electrical supplies, furniture, and a thousand other commodities. It would open jobs in hundreds of thousands of places having no connection with construction. There is not a branch of the national economy—whether it be agriculture, transportation, banking, or trade—but would directly feel the life-giving impulse generated by such an undertaking.

Look specifically at the situation in New York State. Under the so-called public-building program which Congress adopted in 1926 there are to be built in New York State 163 new Federal buildings consisting of post offices, customhouses, courthouses, border stations. The places have all been designated. In all but a few of these places the Federal Government is to-day paying rent. It needs these new buildings, and it can secure them to-day at bargain prices. Out of these 163 buildings only 9 are finished, and 16 are under contract. On some 106 buildings nothing whatever has yet been done. A similar situation obtains in almost every State of the Union.

The facts ought to be faced squarely. We can not expect private industry, which is suffering from overextension to do any substantial amount of construction.

We can not expect the working man to buy and build a home when he does not know how long his job will last.

But we do know that the Federal Government needs new buildings, needs flood-control works, needs harbor improvements, and a myriad of other public works. If it does not construct them this year, it will have to do so within the next few years in any event. Is it not good business sense to release this large program of construction now when it will do most good?

During the session of Congress which began in December, 1927, I proposed that public works be planned in advance so as to have them ready to take up slack in private employment during periods them ready to take up slack in private employment during periods of depression. After a long struggle, that proposal finally became law in February, 1931. Now is the time to use that law to greatest advantage.

Last September, in the course of a Labor Day speech in Syracuse, I pointed out the benefits of such a public-works program. Had the Federal Government followed that suggestion, there would have been no cry for relief during the present winter, and many a family would have been spared the pain of living at the hands of Ever since I have been advocating public construction as one of the pathways of recovery, I have met with but one argument in opposition. It is an argument which is usually stated in the form of a question: Where is the money coming from? As a matter of fact, every business man knows the answer to that question. Almost every large business in the country does its large-scale construction with borrowed money. In this State the people have more than once approved large bond issues for permanent improvements. There is no reason why the Federal Government can not follow the same course and thus spread the cost of permanent improvements over a period of years and prevent the imposition of further tax burdens upon present taxpayers.

For a time we heard the amazing comment that a Federal bond issue necessary to finance public construction could not be sold; it was rumored that the credit of the country was impaired. I pointed out in the Senate the utter imbecility of such a statement. I showed that in 1931 the Government sold $2,215,000,000,000, an oversubscription of 4 to 1.

Speaking in the Senate on the 15th of January, I ventured to make this prophecy:

Speaking in the Senate on the 15th of January, I ventured to make this prophecy:

"In my judgment the one and only fact that has weakened confidence in the Federal Government was the apathetic helplessness of the administration in the face of the greatest economic upheaval of modern times. The prevailing feeling that the administration would just sit on the rocks and let the waves overwhelm it was sapping American confidence. Faith and confidence both will revive and flourish when America realizes that the Government will bestir itself and will not let its mighty arm lie idle in this upprecedented emergency." in this unprecedented emergency."

The events have demonstrated the complete accuracy of that statement. Only two weeks ago it was announced by the Treasury that its offering of an issue of $900,000,000 of Treasury certificates was oversubscribed three and a half times.

There is not a single reason of merit why the Federal Government should withhold the million jobs now available from the people of the United States.

have therefore introduced a bill calling for a bonded construction program to embrace all projects heretofore authorized by Congress. Nothing the Government can do at this time would more substantially contribute to national recovery.

The restoration of a balanced Budget for the Federal Government is without question one of the steps on the pathway of recovery.

The construction proposal does not hinder the attainment of that objective. By means of a bond issue we can spread the cost of the construction over a reasonable number of years in the future. It imposes no burden upon current business. On the contrary, it provides the much-needed stimulus to business recovery.

We must try to see the question of a balanced Budget in its true perspective—namely, that it is an aspect of the present condition of business depression. This fact seems obvious, but it deserves to be emphasized. Many of our people tend to overlook it, and in the zeal for retrachment they would cripple even the very machinery erected to fight the depression. Such a course is far from constructive. It has the appearance of economy but actually the the try most illegoneaized extravagement.

is far from constructive. It has the appearance of economy but actually it is the most ill-conceived extravagance.

We ought to remember this fact: The problem of balancing the Federal Budget will be very much simplified, may indeed cease to be a problem, if we succeed in balancing the individual budget of the American family by restoring the breadwinner to a job.

There is one other thought on the Budget question which should not be left unexpressed. Only one new source of revenue is at not be left unexpressed. Only one new source of revenue is at hand which will impose no burdens whatever upon any existing business. I refer, of course, to a tax on wine and beer. There is business. I refer, of course, to a tax on wine and beer. There is now pending in the United States Senate a resolution I submitted now pending in the United States Senate a resolution I submitted addressed to that subject. The resolution uses these few and simple words: "The eighteenth amendment is hereby repealed." No strings are attached to these words and no ifs and buts to the meaning which they express. When these words are written into the Constitution, as sooner or leter they must be, they will not only simplify the tax problem but at the same time spur business activity more sharply than any other single piece of legislation we have passed in a generation.

activity more snarply than any other single piece of legislation we have passed in a generation.

On the most conservative basis I estimate that a minimum of $300,000,000 in Federal revenue and 300,000 new jobs would be made available by the repeal of prohibition, or, as a temporary measure until repeal could be accomplished, by the modification of the Volstead Act. Such a course would help balance the Budget. It would help restore business activity, restore the Government to a position where it would no longer brook defiance by the gangster and the racketeer, restore our people to the road of temperance, and it would restore the respect of the citizen for democratic government.

Thus far I have spoken of the situation at home. We would seriously blunder, however, if we thought that only the domestic scene requires attention. The world is to-day far too small for such an attitude.

Let me refer you to the dollar-and-cents record of our present policy. In 1931 our purchases abroad were $2,000,000,000 less than in 1928 and our sales to foreign customers declined $2,700,000,000.

The consequence was, of course, unemployment both here and abroad. There were losses on both sides and gains on neither.

It ought to be clear by this time that neither the United States nor any other people can prosper as a nation apart; that it is the function of statecraft to widen the channels of trade, not to restrict them. Some regard the economic interdepend-not to restrict them. Some regard the economic interdependence of all nations an element of danger. I regard it as the most valuable element of security. The world has not yet learned to derive the full benefit of that necessary interdependence. We are bound soon to recognize it as a force which makes for cohesion and cooperation among nations. It is a power which is driving forward the frontier of explication.

forward the frontier of civilization.

The day has come for an armistice in the mutually destructive economic war in which almost all nations are now belligerently engaged.

These measures, both domestic and international, represent, in my judgment, the principal presently available openings through which we can emerge from the darkness into the light.

There is, of course, a sharp difference of opinion concerning most of these proposals. It is a difference which reflects a conflict as old as the American Government itself. The division is between those who believe that governmental beneficence should be applied at the top in the hope that it would percolate to those below and those who hold the faith that only by lifting the standbelow and those who hold the faith that only by litting the standards of the humblest can the entire nation grow and prosper.

The proposals which I advocate have not only a common aim but a common origin. Their single root lies deep in the soil of democratic principles; in that philosophy of government which measures the well-being of a nation not by the height to which a few fortunes may rise but the level at which live the many millions of its citizens. Such a conception of government necessarily imposes upon it an affirmative responsibility to bring the sarily imposes upon it an affirmative responsibility to bring to sarily imposes upon it an airmative responsibility to dring to realization the aspiration of the average farmer, the average wage earner, the average business man to a modest place in the sun.

When our Nation learns to live by the light of that principle we shall cease to witness the modern paradox of want and misery in the midst of abounding plenty. It shall then come to pass that men will truly enjoy the right to life and happiness, for they will possess the right to work and the right to participate in the leisure which their skill makes possible.

CHARLES A. JONAS

Mr. HASTINGS. As in executive session, I desire to move that the Senate reconsider its action in refusing to confirm the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be United States district attorney for the western district of North Carolina.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I make the point of order that the motion is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the point of order is raised, the Chair will have to sustain it.

Mr. HASTINGS. My understanding was that I might enter the motion at any time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no. I make the point of order against it. This is the first information I have

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that the motion would be in order in executive session. If the Senator desires to move that the Senate resolve itself into executive session, and that is agreed to, he may then make the motion.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not care to do that. If the motion can not be made except as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the motion may be entered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have stated that I raise the point of order, and I object.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

WORLD TARIFF BARRIERS

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, yesterday in the New York Times there appeared an instructive article on world tariff barriers by an able writer, Mr. Charles Merz. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD if practicable with the illustrations used by Mr.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know what the illustrations are. Illustrations can not be printed in the RECORD, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I send the article to the Senator from Utah for his inspection.

Mr. SMOOT (after examining the article). The charts in this article may properly be put in the RECORD, and I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

TARIFF WALLS RISE AS WORLD TRADE FALLS-PILED-UP RESTRICTIONS ON INTERNATIONAL TRADE PRESENT SPECTACLE NEVER SEEN BEFORE— RAPID GROWTH OF THE SYSTEM IN TWO YEARS OF DEPRESSION— DEBT PAYMENTS INTERWOVEN WITH OTHER PROBLEMS

By Charles Merz

While business marks time in the third year of an international depression, the nations of the world are rapidly involving themselves in a system of tariffs and trade controls for which there is selves in a system of tarilis and trade controls for which there is no parallel in their experience.

Within the last few weeks, on top of a long series of earlier developments, there have come new "quotas" imposed by France on radio equipment, machine tools, and electrical apparatus; reaffirmation by Italy of a quota on wheat; higher tariffs in Spain; the complete breakdown of an effort to persuade the nations of central Europe to absolute restrictions which have all but here the complete breakdown of an effort to persuade the nations of central Europe to abandon restrictions which have all but paralyzed their commerce; a decision by Holland, long an exponent of free trade, to restrict imports of footwear and woolen goods; a presidential decree in Cuba increasing existing rates on passenger cars and motor trucks; announcement in Washington by the Department of Commerce that the new British tariff will affect American goods valued in 1930 at more than $300,000,000; and a president by the core Bederal expense. prediction by the same Federal agency that measures now in progress will still further restrict "many markets of primary importance to American exports."

Events are moving with great speed to alter the conditions which have hitherto governed international trade. The following summary considers (1) the growth of world trade before 1930 and its course during the depression; (2) the development within the last two years of new tariffs and trade controls; and (3) the possible effects of this development, particularly from the point of view of the United States.

I World trade

For some years before 1930 the total value of commodities exchanged by the nations of the world averaged about $32,000,000,000 annually. This was a comparatively small part of their total production in agriculture, mining, and manufacture but an important factor in the prosperity of many of them.

How important can be seen if the foreign trade of each country is considered on a per capita basis. The following table does this for the 10 chief exporting and importing nations, whose turnover accounted for approximately two-thirds of the world's international trade in 1929. In this list the nations are ranked in the importance of their total exports and imports. The first column gives the per capita value of their trade in the year before the war and the second the figure for 1929:

The Mark Company of the Company of t	1913	1929
1. United Kingdom 2. United States 3. Germany 4. France 5. Canada 6. British India 7. Japan 8. Holland 9. Belgium 10. Argentina	$125. 15 43. 05 70. 08 70. 93 127. 31 4. 40 12. 80 432. 93 223. 48 121. 75	$223. 80 79. 41 102. 84 103. 76 252. 39 5. 95 31. 22 240. 08 231. 73 158. 49

From this table it is evident that while foreign trade is of little significance to the individual resident of British India, it is a factor of considerably more importance to the other nations and of very large importance to the United Kingdom, Canada, Holland, Belgium, and Argentina.

It is also evident from the table that the postwar years witnessed a remarkable expansion of foreign trade. Holland is the one exception on the list in this respect. In France and Germany foreign trade increased in value by approximately 50 per cent between 1913 and 1929. It doubled or nearly doubled in Japan, Canada, the United Kingdom, and the United States.

OUR GAIN UP TO 1929

In our own case, this gain becomes still more impressive when the rate of increase during the postwar period is compared with that before the war. On a per capita basis, the value of the foreign trade of the United States increased by 28.2 per cent between 1900 and 1913. It increased by 84.5 per cent during the slightly longer period from 1913 to 1929.

The importance of this gain was widely recognized during the postwar years in which it was in progress. "There has never been such an increase in a similar period before in our history," said Mr. Hoover in an address at Boston, as a candidate for President in 1928. "Our total volume of exports translates itself into employment for 2,400,000 families, while its increase in the last seven years has interpreted itself into livelihood for 500,000 additional families in the United States. And in addition to this, millions more families find employment in the manufacture of imported raw materials. The farmer has a better market for his produce by reason of their employment."

The fortunate condition thus described by Mr. Hoover in 1928 continued into 1929. But in 1930 came a sharp loss of foreign trade, shared by every country in the world except Russia (at this time beginning to market the proceeds of its 5-year plan), Honduras, Lithuania, and Palestine.

THE DECREASE IN 1930

THE DECREASE IN 1930

The effect of this widespread loss on the fortunes of the more important nations engaged in foreign trade is shown in the following table. The first column gives the total value of the exports and imports for 1929; the second, the figure for 1930; and the third, the percentage of loss:

	1929	1930	Per cent loss
1. United Kingdom 2. United States. 3. Germany 4. France. 5. Canada. 6. British India 7. Japan 8. Holland 9. Belgium 10. Argentina	Millions $10,024,1 9,640,4 6,411,9 4,247,7 2,507,3 2,090,6 2,012,2 1,906,2 1,965,8 1,727,4	Millions $8, 284. 6 6, 903. 9 5, 349. 3 3, 730. 8 1, 913. 9 1, 503. 6 1, 489. 6 1, 663. 1 1, 589. 3 1, 130. 1	17. 3 28. 4 16. 6 12. 2 23. 6 23. 7 26. 0 12. 7 14. 9 34. 5

It will be noted that, without exception, the loss taken by the European nations was proportionately less severe than that of the nations in Asia and the Western Hemisphere. Our own percentage of loss was one of the largest, being exceeded only in the case of Argentina.

FURTHER LOSSES IN 1931

For the following year—1931—complete figures for all 10 countries on this list are not yet available. But in the case of the four most important nations, controlling among themselves nearly half of the world's foreign trade, the comparison with 1929 stands as

	1929	1931	Per cent,
1. United Kingdom 2. United States 3. Germany 4. France	Millions $10,024.1 9,640.4 6,411.9 4,247.7	Millions $6,399.4 4,514.2 3,855.3 2,846.6	36, 2 53, 2 39, 9 33, 0
Total	30, 324. 1	17, 615. 5	41.9

These figures show that in the short period of two years' time the total foreign commerce of the four chief trading nations declined by 41.9 per cent. France, which suffered least, has lost about one-third. Our own loss is far and away the largest, both in percentage third. Our own loss is far and away the largest, both in percentage and in dollars.

It is true, of course, that a substantial part of our loss and that of other nations is due to a falling price level, rather than to an actual decline in shipments. While the value of American foreign trade was being cut by 34 per cent between 1930 and 1931, the Department of Commerce estimates that the volume of exports was reduced by only 20 per cent and the volume of imports by only 10. These percentages of volume loss are in themselves impressive, however, when it is remembered that they occurred within a single year. It is the dollar loss that counts, however, in the economy of the Nation. And there is no evidence, thus far in the new year. however, when it is remembered that they occurred within a single year. It is the dollar loss that counts, however, in the economy of the Nation. And there is no evidence, thus far in the new year, that we are beginning to retrieve the losses of 1930 and 1931, either in dollars or in volume. On the contrary, foreign trade during January and February, 1932, dropped more than a third below the low figure for last year and two-thirds below the figure for 1929.

At this point the gains of the last 20 years have been wiped out and our trade is at the lowest level it has reached since 1910.

II. Tariffs and controls

While American exports and imports have been declining, in company with those of other important countries, but more rapidly, the nations of the world have been erecting a formidable system of new tariffs and controls.

new tariffs and controls.

Whether the United States initiated this process, by enacting in June, 1930, a law which increased existing rates on 655 articles in international commerce, is a question which has been debated at great length. Opinions differ. It is clear, in any case, that many drastic changes have been made by other nations since midsummer of 1930 and that in certain instances a direct connection apparently exists between this action and the adoption of the Hawley-Smoot exists between this action and the adoption of the Hawley-Smoot Act in the United States.

Thus, the Canadian Parliament adopted a new set of countervailing duties as soon as the intentions of Congress were made clear. The purpose of these duties, as described by the Canadian Premier, was to show this country that Canada desired to trade on even terms and to divert to the United Kingdom purchases of many goods which were previously bought in the United States.

This action was taken in May, 1930. Two months later the Government of Mexico enacted a law increasing its duties on wheat and flour, two products imported from the United States. In September, following an effort on the part of various groups in Argentina to boycott American goods, the Government of that country entered into an agreement with England for the reciprocal purchase of raw materials and manufactures. During the first six months of 1931 while Argentina's total imports declined 24 per cent her imports from the United States declined by 57.

RISE OF BARRIERS

Whatever the responsibility of the United States in the matter, the process of raising tariff barriers once started made rapid progress. For the effect of the depression was deepening noticeably in the summer of 1930, and to the motives which had ordinarily inspired an increase in tariff rates, such as a desire to protect home industries or to retallate against the action of a neighbor, new influences were now added.

Chief among these influences were a decline in governmental

Chief among these influences were a decline in governmental revenues, a loss of gold, and in many nations a rapidly depreciating currency. As long as the world was enjoying comparative prosperity, countries which traditionally favored low tariffs were able to meet their governmental costs largely through income taxes and internal revenue. An abrupt decline in receipts from these sources forced many of them to turn to higher customs duties.

Meantime loss of gold and depreciating currencies had become a formidable problem, particularly in South America and in central Europe. In order to meet payments on debts owed abroad and to compensate for an adverse balance of trade many nations were forced to export gold. The Central Bank of Brazil, for example, lost 83 per cent of its gold in the last three months of 1930, and in 1931 the rest. Vigorous action to restrict imports was a natural consequence of an attempt to correct an unfavorable trade balance and to restore a reserve of precious metal. metal.

It was in such factors as these, supplementing older arguments in favor of protective duties, and probably deriving some additional force from the example set by the United States, that the present contest in competitive tariffs had its origin.

REVISIONS WIDESPREAD

During 1930 the Department of Commerce reported that there were 6 general tariff revisions upward in Europe, 19 limited revisions upward, and 5 general revisions upward in Latin America.

Further progress was made in this direction during 1931. The most striking example was England's abandonment of free trade and her decision to impose a duty of 10 per cent on a long list of imports valued in 1930 at approximately $1,500,000,000. The Department of Commerce in Washington also reported that "in many countries of Latin America, certain countries of continental Europe, and a few oriental areas, duty advances, often horizontal in character, were widely resorted to during 1931."

This second year of the depression was chiefly notable, however, for reviving three war-time devices to check still further the steadily diminishing flow of international trade. These devices were "quotas," "licenses," and "exchange controls."

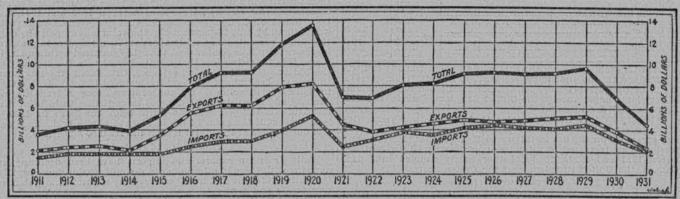

(1) "Quotas": This method of restriction, limiting either by volume or by value the importation of certain specified commodities, came into prominence in the latter months of 1931. France introduced a series of quotas, not only on many manufactured articles but also on lumber, meats, dairy products, fish, and sugar.

purpose of preventing the flight of capital. An inevitable by-product of this control is to hamper the normal processes of international buying and selling of goods, and thereby to curtail imports. In addition, 19 nations suspended the gold standard between July and December, 1931, an act which in itself automatically checks purchases of goods from countries still on a gold basis.

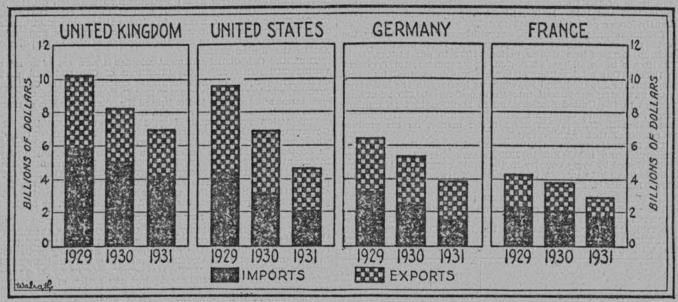

Many of these drastic measures of exchange control, licenses, quotas, and emergency tariffs, adopted during 1930 and 1931, are presumably temporary devices, limited in point of time to the depression. But many others, as our own Department of Commerce points out, "are of an indefinite term and by their nature are not readily withdrawable."

BRITISH RESTRICTIONS FLEXIBLE

In these circumstances it seems evident that American commerce an these circumstances it seems evident that American commerce has still to experience the full effect of such restrictions as have been imposed. Some of the most punitive measures are of recent origin. Others are capable of large expansion. Under the new tariff law in England, for example, duties may be raised from the present 10 per cent to the prohibitive level of 100 per cent as a means of retaliating against countries which maintain a high tariff on British exports. It is frankly stated that this provision will be

The Spanish Minister of Commerce was authorized by his Government to fix quotas and to distribute them among exporting countries "according to the necessities of Spanish economy." The British Parliament received notice from the cabinet that a plan for a quota on wheat would be submitted in 1932.

Meantime, Turkey established quotas on more than a thousand commodities. The Government of Holland was authorized to impose quotas whenever such action was deemed necessary to keep imports within normal bounds. Other plans for quotas were devised and enforced by Switzerland, Poland, Latvia, and various South American nations.

devised and enforced by Switzerland, Poland, Latvia, and various South American nations.

(2) "Licenses": Under this system no definite quota is established, but the exporter is required to apply in advance for a license for each transaction in various commodities, particularly in wheat, coal, and nitrogenous products. Ten European nations resorted in 1931 to this method of restricting imports. In Argentina, Colombia, Ecuador, and Uruguay measures were adopted vesting large discretionary powers over imports in the hands of ministerial boards or councils.

(3) "Exchange controls": Eighteen nations in Europe and four in South America have undertaken by one means or another to used for bargaining purposes, in an attempt to develop a system of preference within the British Empire and an informal trade alliance among nations which have suspended the gold standard.

Moreover, it seems all too likely that the whole vast system of tariffs and controls created in the last two years will prompt certain nations to enact new measures of restriction. On this point, whatever the views of Congress when it adopted the Hawley-Smoot law and of the President when he signed it, the experts in the foreign tariffs division of the Department of Commerce have definite onlyings. nite opinions.

"Under the highly interdependent world economic system of to-day," they say in their latest report, "the repercussions of the trade-control measures or financial dislocations of any important country are so widespread as to lead to similar or defensive reactions on the part of other countries."

III. Present alternatives

Any discussion of the effects of the intricate and many-sided Any discussion of the enects of the intricate and many-sided tariff war in which the nations of the world have enlisted in the last two years is certain to raise controversial questions. This is particularly true of the debate over the importance of foreign trade in the economic recovery of the United States. It is less true of two other questions now discussed with increasing interest: The effect of rapidly multiplying tariffs on the migration of industry and their relation to the payment of international debts, par-ticularly with respect to what is described as the "transfer prob-The following paragraphs deal briefly with these points:

(A) TRADE AND PROSPERITY

While estimates vary, depending upon the method of measurement employed, the foreign trade of the United States in times more normal than the present is usually computed at about 8 per cent of the total of our foreign and domestic commerce.

Citing this low figure, one school of opinion argues that the importance of foreign trade has been vastly overrated and insists that recovery in this country can take place without regard to foreign markets for our goods or to the tariffs and controls devised to restrict our exports. In support of this contention figures are cited to prove that less than 5 per cent of many of our most important manufactures are sold abroad. Other figures are cited to show that the residents of a city of the size of Chicago purchase more American goods through the retail trade than are normally shipped to the United Kingdom.

Those who differ with this argument do not dispute the arithmetic on which it rests but raise these points in reply:

(1) While the export volume of many of our manufactures is a small part of the total output, it is pointed out that we normally export more than half of our cotton, more than a third of our copper and tobacco leaf, and nearly a fifth of our wheat and flour.

(2) It is admitted that 8 per cent is a small fraction of our total volume of foreign and domestic commerce, but it is argued that a difference of 8 per cent in the operating ratio of some lines of business may constitute in itself the difference between reasonable profits and large losses.

(3) It is also argued that the same margin of 8 per cent is sufficient to account for a substantial difference in conditions of em-

(3) It is also argued that the same margin of 8 per cent is sufficient to account for a substantial difference in conditions of employment; that if President Hoover was right in 1928 in attributing the livelihood of 2,400,000 families to a thriving export trade, the present status of this trade explains why wage earners in 1,500,000 families now lack work.

(B) MIGRATION OF INDUSTRY

There is less material for controversy with regard to the part played by tariffs in fostering the movement of American factories played by tariffs in fostering the movement of American factories from this country to foreign nations.

The Department of Commerce estimates that the large sum of $1,534,351,000$ had been invested by Americans in manufacturing establishments abroad by 1929, and cites as the chief reason for this exodus of domestic capital "the tariff policies of foreign countries." In order to avoid payment of duties imposed on goods manufactured in the United States, branch factories are established behind various tariff walls abroad.

The report to Congress by the Department of Commerce concerning this migration of industry does not include figures for 1930 and 1931, the two years during which the nations of the world have expanded their traditional protectionist policies into an open tariff war. It is probable that the development of branch factories has been halted by the unprofitable state of American business itself. But it is evident that it may be resumed later on at a still more rapid pace, in view of the fact that tariffs abroad are now far higher than they were in 1929.

Meantime, this method of meeting the handicap of foreign du-

Meantime, this method of meeting the handicap of foreign duties has been vigorously criticized by such organizations as the American Federation of Labor. These critics insist that the process amounts essentially to an export of opportunities for work.

(C) THE TRANSFER PROBLEM

Finally, among those questions on which the recent outburst of tariff legislation has focused fresh attention, there is the "transfer problem," intrinsic in many instances in the settlement of international debts.

The character of this problem may be illustrated by reference to the present position of Germany vis-à-vis her creditors. Wholly aside from reparations, Germany is due to pay $413,000,000 this year in principal and interest on her public and private debts abroad. To help meet this payment she has an income from her own foreign investments estimated at $83,000,000 by the committee of experts of the Bank for International Settlements. This leaves $330,000,000 to be provided from other sources. From what other $330,000,000 to be provided from other sources. From what other sources can it come?

Plainly not from a gold reserve, for there is now a visible supply of less than $230,000,000 in gold in Germany, and the creditors of that nation agree that it is impossible as well as undesirable to strip Germany of her last reserves. The only other source of any importance is provided by the revenue accruing from a surplus of Germany's exports over imports. But this surplus has averaged only $22,000,000 a month for the first two months of 1932. At this rate it will amount to $264,000,000 for the full year, falling more than $60,000,000 short of what is needed to meet payment on debts alone, regardless of reparations.

CONTRADICTORY POLICIES

It would, of course, be possible for Germany to increase her exports, provided other nations were willing to accept her goods. But at this point she encounters the whole intricate machinery of tariffs, quotas, licensing systems, and exchange controls whose development we have traced. In the words of the committee of the Bank for International Settlements, it is evident that during the last two years "the world has been endeavoring to pursue two contradictory policies simultaneously, in permitting the development of an international system which involves the annual payment of large sums by debtor to creditor countries, while at the same time putting obstacles in the way of the free movement of goods."

Because of the size of her lebts and the insecurity of her position, the "transfer problem" is most frequently identified with the situation confronting Germany. The same problem arises, however, in the case of many other nations, particularly those Latin American countries which now find themselves saddled with heavy foreign obligations contracted on a wholly different scale of prices. It is evident in 1932 that the creditor nations of the world are being forced more and more to choose between two courses. One is a system of high tariffs and the other full payment on their loans loans.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. AUSTIN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for an hour, before concluding, he yielded the floor for the day. His Speech is published entire in the RECORD of March 29.

FARM-HOME HOUR RADIO ADDRESSES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record copies of addresses, made over a nation-wide radio hook-up in connection with the farm-home hour, on Saturday, March 26, 1932, by John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers Union, and by three United States Senators.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF JOHN A. SIMPSON CONDITIONS MOST SERIOUS

I approach this hour with a heavy heart and with a deep sense of my responsibility in the position I occupy at this moment.

Since coming to Washington the 1st of January, I have received more than 30,000 letters from people scattered over the United States, thanks to the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co. Two-thirds of these letters have brought tears to my eyes as I read them. read them.

A nation grieves and sympathizes with Mr. and Mrs. Lindbergh over the loss of their baby. I yield to no one in that regard. But, sadder to me is the fact that a million babies are sick to-day But, sadder to me is the fact that a million bables are sick to-day for lack of food, are sick to-day for the lack of clothes and fuel to keep them warm. To-night, in the blackness of the midnight hour, a million men and women will be hunting food in garbage cans in the alleys of thousands of cities in our country. Three million farmers grope in financial darkness as they face delinquent taxes and unpaid interest. They suffer mentally as they realize they will soon be dispossessed of their farms.

Recently a newspaper in one of the best counties in the good State of Iowa carried 60 pages of tax sales of real estate. With such conditions, all hope has fled. Shocked and dazed, millions of farm families stand at the doors of what used to be their homes.

I read from a letter just received. This letter is from a business man in Des Moines, Iowa:

I read from a letter just received. This letter is from a business man in Des Moines, Iowa:

"My own mother lives on a farm in southwestern Iowa. On Saturday, March 5, I drove down to spend Saturday evening and Sunday with her. My brother had just returned from the near-by town after taking in the produce and buying a few groceries. He had taken a 12-dozen case of eggs to town. He had received just 72 cents, or 6 cents a dozen, for that case of beautiful, big country eggs, and that 72 cents had been credited in exchange for groceries. My mother looked at the bill showing a credit of 72 cents and then showed me an 11-ounce bottle of vanilla extract which had cost 95 cents. In other words, it would have taken 1 cent less than the selling price of 16 dozen eggs to have purchased that one lousy bottle of vanilla extract. (I presume the big boys would say a farmer has no business with vanilla extract.) There is an illustration that every woman and girl can understand, and I know the bitter truth of the whole thing. Is it any wonder that our 'farmer's holiday' meetings are being attended by Farm Bureau members and unorganized farmers?"

This business man is telling me, and has written me before, that mass meetings are being held in courthouses in county-seat towns. Not only farmers but business men are attending these meetings. Without exception they end up in unanimously voting to organize for the purpose of declaring a holiday on the farm. A holiday is a nice name for a strike. These farmers in their desperation are ready to refuse to sell anything, from milk up to wheat, until Congress and the President of the United States pass and sign the bills that will be discussed in this program this afternoon.

afternoon.

OUR SPEAKERS TO-DAY

To all of you listening in, let me tell you what the program is to-day. After a few minutes I shall introduce Senator Lynn J. Frazier, a progressive Republican of North Dakota, who will discuss for 10 minutes his farm refinancing bill, S. 1197. After Senator Frazier has finished then you will hear Senator Elmer Thomas, a progressive Democrat of Oklahoma, discuss the Thomas-Swank bill, which provides for the cost of production for that part of farm products used in this country, numbered in the Senate S. 3133 and in the House H. R. 7797. The last speaker will be Senator Burron K. Wheeler, a progressive Democrat of Montana, who will discuss the remonetization of silver bill S. 2487. I am sure this is going to make an exceedingly interesting and instructive program.

AGAINST US

To those of you who believe in one or more of these bills, let me give you the names of some of your supposed friends in Gov-ernment positions who are fighting these bills. First. In the hearings on the Frazier bill before a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture in the United States Senate, on page 36, Mr. Paul Bestor, chairman of the Federal Farm Loan Board, testified before the committee against the bill.

On page 37 of that hearing Andrew W. Mellon, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, sent in a written statement against the

On page 4 of the hearing is a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture addressed to Senator Frazier. It is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 30, 1932.
MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of January 22 relative to S. 1197 has been received.

It is my judgment that the bill which you inclose is not conducive to the best interest of American farmers.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR M. HYDE, Secretary.

Secretary Hyde is a member of the Farm Board. The Farm Secretary Hyde is a member of the Farm Board. The Farm Board through its president, James Stone, has repeatedly stated in public that they are against the debenture, the equalization fee, and the cost of production plan to assist agriculture. Likewise, the President of the United States has given utterance to the same sentiment.

You are entitled to this information, and I consider it my job while in Washington to let you know who are your friends and who are your enemies. If you feel uncertain about this, I suggest you write to any or all of these gentlemen and ask them if they are supporting the Frazier bill, Wheeler bill, and Thomas-Swank bill.

THINGS THAT WOULD HELP

It is the contention of the Farmers' Union that these three bills

It is the contention of the Farmers' Union that these three bills would bring immediate and permanent prosperity to our country, but for a moment I want to call your attention to some other things that could be done to help.

A dollar a barrel tariff on crude oil and the equivalent on refined products would set 400,000 men to work the next day.

Just the other day Arthur Brisbane, in describing a cargo of sugar he saw coming into New York Harbor, said, "This country has the facilities for refining every pound of sugar used by our people. A proper tariff would add $17,000,000 a year to the wages in our own refineries."

people. A proper tariff would add $17,000,000 a year to the wages in our own refineries."

Wood pulp comes in from Russia that labor in this country could produce if the industry were properly protected.

Oriental oils come in, in an ever-increasing volume, to destroy the market for our own dairy products besides driving the price of cottonseed to the lowest level in a quarter of a century.

Instead of helping you with tariff as they could do, in most instances they use the tariff to punish you.

About 90 years ago a down-east manufacturer said to Daniel Webster concerning the tariff of 1842, then before Congress, "If this tariff is enacted, we will have a mortgage on the South and West for 100 years." That tariff raised the duties on imports to an average of nearly 34 per cent. It was 70 per cent higher than the former tariff. That mortgage has now run 90 years but the terms have changed. Last year the duties on imports averaged more than 51 per cent, being a further increase of 50 per cent, or two and one-half times higher than in 1840, for which agriculture has paid and paid until it has not a dollar left. This is not protection in which we all believe. It is protection exploited and gone mad.

Take the case of cement. This trust has been a subject of complaint and investigations for 20 years. Cement prices have regularly been far higher than the average of commodity prices. Profits were enormous under free trade. An investment of $5,000 in 1899 in the Portland Cement Co. had yielded in 1929, a short period of 30 years, $256,236 in cash dividends, and had become 5,134 shares of common and preferred stock of a market value, in 1930, of $390,168. This made a total return in 1929 of $646,404 on an investment of $5,000 made in 1899. Other companies did about as well.

Woven-wire fencing is another case of tariff robbery. Woven-wire Woven-wire fencing is another case of tariff robbery. Woven-wire fencing was protected 40 per cent under the last tariff. It was increased to 45 per cent in the present tariff, and recently increased by the Tariff Commission to 60 per cent on woven wire for farmers' fences.

for farmers' fences.

Under the duty of 40 per cent, the Keystone Steel & Wire Co. made a profit in 1927 (the year investigated by the Tariff Commission), of $25.92 per share of stock. Then, in 1928, it issued six new shares of stock for each old share, and on the 202,284 new shares it made the apparently modest profit of only $6.16 per share. This equaled, however, $37 on each share of the year before. Was it honest, or what, for the supposedly semijudicial Tariff Commission to increase this tariff on chicken fences, with eggs selling at 8 cents a dozen? Did the wire makers need more profit at the expense of these farmers?

In 1930, Congress discharged all of the then commissioners. It should discharge these for the same reason, and instantly.

For each pound of tobacco used in the manufacture of cigarettes the farmer, on his 1931 crop, received 20 cents per pound; the Government has collected in tax on this same tobacco $1.0634 per pound. On chewing tobacco farmers have received, for their 1931 Government has collected in tax on this same tobacco $1.0634 per pound. On chewing tobacco farmers have received, for their 1931 crop, about 8 cents per pound; the Government has collected in tax on this same tobacco 2234 cents per pound. The Government is collecting about $500,000,000 per year in taxes on tobacco. They could help the tobacco farmers mightily by giving to them one-half of the taxes collected. Here is a way the Government could help farmers with all agricultural products. They could levy heavy taxes on agricultural products and divide the moneys raised by such taxation with the farmers.

These are a few of many things that could be done to set men.

These are a few of many things that could be done to set men to work without expense to the Government. They are not done because Andy Mellon and family own the Gulf Oil Co., a concern that gets its supply from South America; Henry Ford and the International Harvester Co. are dealing with Russia to the detriment of the laborers of this country; the big packers want cheap oriental oils and defeat every effort of ours to get protection for dairy and cottonseed products.

Congress is so busy protecting these giants of industry that they can not hear the cries of hunger in a million homes where the father has no work.

GIFTS AND BURDENS

It seems that when there are gifts to bestow Congress can not see anyone except a few international bankers of Wall Street. When there are burdens to bear they can see everybody else except Wall Street. The gifts to bolster a tottering banking and monetary system have been extravagantly generous. Likewise these gifts have been swiftly bestowed. Immediately after bestowal, with one voice, these friends of the big boys began to shout, "We must balance the Budget." The gifts were appropriations. The balances will be taxes. balances will be taxe harmony prevails.

Like pirates of old, the big boys have repeatedly raided the Treasury in this session of Congress. Like pirates of old, they fell out over their loot. Big banker boys and big railroad boys came to Washington last week with their quarrel. General Dawes and Eugene Meyer failed in their attempt to settle the dispute. The President was called in, and, after a 2-day conference, the spoils were divided between these two big boys in a way that bearmony pressure. harmony prevails.

In the proposed tax bill was a general sales tax. It placed a burden of $600,000,000 on the common people of the United States. This is an average of $25 per family. The leaders in both political parties in the House of Representatives, with the backing of the President, attempted to railroad this unrighteous thing through the House. The first notice of warning arrived from Farmers' Union members in the mid-West. Next the labor organizations of the East, followed by protests from Grange and Farm Bureau members. When it came to a vote day before yesterday it was defeated by a vote of 223 to 153.

OUR FRIENDS

Thanks to a few brave progressive leaders in the House, the rebellion was on. In this fight the common people owe a lot to Congressmen Doughton, of North Carolina; LaGuardia, of New York; Rankin, of Mississippi; Johnson, of Oklahoma; Lambertson, of Kansas; Simmons, Nebraska; and a score of others who leaped into the fray and stopped the first assault. For their opposition to the sales tax they are charged with treason to the administration, which means defying the Mellon-Morgan group. Congressman Rainey, of Illinois, on the floor of the House called them communists. Evidently Rainey defines a communist as one who believes in taxing wealth instead of poverty.

In spite of the wails of the waifs of Wall Street an amendment by those opposed to the sales tax restored war-time income-tax rates on the higher brackets and trebled the rates on inheritance rates on the higher brackets and trebled the rates on inheritance taxes.

It seems to be the universal opinion that there is not sufficient money to do the business of the country. Everybody now realizes that defiation was carried too far, Every money proposal at this time is for inflation. Economists, statesmen, politicians, and everybody now agree that price levels of commodities must be raised, all of which makes necessary an increased volume of money and credits.

and credits.

The Farmers' Union is in hearty accord with these views. But, we are against a money system based on liabilities. We are for a money system based on assets. We are against a money system that contemplates perpetual debt. We are against a money system that involves the payment of interest.

The total interest debt of the United States, per annum, is more than $10,000,000,000. The total tax debt is more than $13,000,000,000. This makes a fixed charge for the taxpayers of the Nation of more than $23,000,000,000 each year.

Staggaring under this level the best window of Congress and Staggering under this load, the best wisdom of Congress and Staggering under this load, the best wisdom of Congress and the administration produces more interest-bearing bonds every time they need money. Evidently the philosophy of Congress is to put out the fire by pouring oil on it. Evidently it is the philosophy of Congress, that a drowning man needs more water and they pour it on. The patient that came to them with sore feet they have anointed his head with oil.

ORGANIZE

There are some splendid men in the House and Senate, men whose hearts are right and who know and understand what is needed, but the machine is against them. We, the common people of the country, must organize and help them in the brave fight they are making for us and for the Nation.

This afternoon I appeal to you farmers listening in to get into your class organization where you can take part in the running of both your State and National Governments.

I warn you, there is a real struggle ahead. We do not want timid souls. We want intelligent, courageous, unselfish men and women willing to enlist in a cause as just, as worthy, as patriotic as ever challenged the people of any nation. We want men and women willing to sacrifice of their time and money in this cause.

To all of you listening in, whether you be farmers, laborers, professional, or business men, let me urge you to study public questions like you have never done before. Let me urge you to keep in touch, through correspondence and otherwise, with your Congress want to do what their people want them to do. It is up to you to let them know what you are thinking on every vital public issue. public issue.

Remember the Farmers' Union hour is the fourth Saturday of each month from 12:30 to 1.30, eastern standard time. Our next program will be Saturday, April 23. At that time I shall discuss cooperative business, in which I shall tell you what I saw in Denmark last April.

It is now my great pleasure to introduce to you one of our staunch friends in the United States Senate, who will talk to you about a bill he has introduced that will be of great help to farmers if it becomes a law. You will now hear Senator Lynn J. Frazier, of North Dakota.

Address of Senator Lynn J. Frazier, Explaining Farm Refinanc-ing Bill, S. 1197

The national president of the Farmers' Union has requested me to discuss the pending farm refinancing bill, S. 1197. Hearings on this measure have been held before a subcommittee of the Senate this measure have been held before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and thanks to Mr. Simpson and the Farners' Union, over 60 farmers from the 10 leading agricultural States were in attendance, and much valuable testimony was introduced. I want to say right here that if the farmers of this Nation were organized anything like 100 per cent in a good live organization for their own interests, there would be no question about getting legislation, both State and National, for their benefit and welfare. Every other business in the Nation is organized—why not the farmers? the farmers?

S. 1197 is now pending before the Agricultural Committee of the Senate. Much interest has been manifested in the bill, and numerous letters and requests have come to my office. A few days ago in calling over the telephone, when the operator said "number, please," I automatically replied "S. 1197."

The bill provides for the liquidating and refinancing of existing farm indebtedness through real-estate loans on the amortization plan at 11 per cent and the principal.

ing farm indebtedness through real-estate loans on the amortization plan at 1½ per cent interest and 1½ per cent on the principal per annum, the loans to be secured by first mortgage on real estate based upon existing indebtedness and fair value of such farms and 50 per cent of the insurable buildings and improvements. It must be remembered that the existing indebtedness was based on not to exceed 40 or 50 per cent of the market value when the loan was made. The full period of amortization would

The bill also provides for loans to liquidate and refinance existing farm-chattel mortgages to be secured by first mortgage on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes to the amount of 65 per cent of the fair market value at 3 per cent interest, to run for a period of one year with the right of renewal from year to year for a term of 10 years, provided that depreciation of livestock be replaced by additional livestock and that the amount of the loan be reduced 10 per cent each year.

The funds with which to liquidate and refinance existing farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness shall be provided by the mortgages and other farm indebtedness shall be provided by the issuing of farm-loan bonds by the Federal farm-loan system through the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal land banks; the bonds to be soid at par or delivered to the Federal Reserve Board, for which Federal reserve notes shall be issued to the Federal Farm Loan Board to the amount of par value of farm bonds so delivered, and the bonds shall be security in lieu of any other security or reserve for the Federal reserve notes so issued. The interest on these bonds, 1½ per cent on real estate and 3 per cent on chattels, will pay all necessary expenses in connection with the issuance of the Federal reserve notes and the making of the loans.

These loans will save hundreds of thousands of farmers from losing their homes and all their property by foreclosure and will enable thousands of other farmers to repurchase farms they have lost, or other farms, and again become farm and home owners.

These loans will put new money into circulation, and the bill provides that when the money in actual circulation shall exceed $75 per capita Federal reserve notes may be retired in an amount equal to the principal paid on the farm-loan bonds for which Federal reserve notes were issued, but not to exceed 2 per cent in any one year of the amount of Federal reserve notes so issued.

This increase would provide about $4,000,000,000 of new money, and the limitations just cited would prevent undue inflation and also prevent another occurrence like the deflation which began in 1920 and which resulted in the financial ruin of hundreds of thousands of farmers and also of thousands of bankers and business interests all over the Nation. It would thaw out millions of dollars of so-called frozen assets and put new life into all industries throughout the Nation.

The bill also provides for the election by the farmers themselve The bill also provides for the election by the farmers themselves of a board of agriculture and that this board of agriculture shall elect an executive committee of three, whose duty it shall be to counsel with and supervise the work of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness through the Federal farm loan and the Federal reserve systems. Provision is also made for the removal of any member of these boards who neglects, hinders, or delays the carrying out of the provisions of this act.

There shall be a liberal construction of the act, and all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this measure are for the nursoes of parts of laws in conflict with this measure are, for the purpose of this act, repealed.

There is no question about the desperate conditions of the American farmers—by far the worst they have ever known. They are facing a calamity. More than a million farm families have been closed out of farms and homes during the past 10 years with thousands of others facing foreclosure or tax sales at the present moment.

S. 1197, when put into operation, will give the farmers who feed S. 1197, when put into operation, will give the farmers who feed and clothe the Nation a chance to retain ownership of their farms and homes, and where they have already lost out, a chance to repurchase and again become home owners. Under the present system the farmer has no chance of paying existing indebtedness. A number of administration emergency measures have been passed by this session of Congress. There is no other emergency facing our people that begins to compare with the farm situation.

Upon the welfare of agriculture depends the welfare of the Nation.

Let me urge every listener to do his or her part to create public sentiment favoring the passage of these measures advocated during this farm hour, which will not only help the farmers but will likewise help all other people of our beloved land.

MR. SIMPSON SPEAKING

I am sure you all enjoyed the splendid talk of Senator Frazier and you are more than ever convinced that his bill should become a law. We owe it to the farmers of North Dakota that Lynn J. Frazier is in the United States Senate.

It is now my delight to introduce another tried and true friend of agriculture and of the interests of the 120,000,000 common peoof agriculture and of the interests of the 120,000,000 common people. A man whom I have known for 30 years; who served in the State senate of his and my State for 14 years; who served in Congress for 4 years; and has now served in the United States Senate for 5 years. He has an unblemished record of public service covering a period of more than 20 years. He will talk to you on the Thomas-Swank bill. I now introduce my good friend Senator ELMER THOMAS of Oklahoma.

Address of Senator Elmer Thomas, of Oklahoma, on the Thomas-SWANK BILL

Through the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co. this hour is dedicated to the farmers of America.

Agriculture is more than a local industry—it is State, Nation, and world-wide, Farmers feed and clothe the 2,000,000,000 people of the earth.

Agriculture is America's most important industry. We have more than 6,500,000 farms populated by more than 30,000,000 of our citizens.

The economic status of the farmer is the barometer of pros-

The economic status of the farmer is the barometer of prosperity. When the farmer is prosperous all other groups and classes are prosperous, and when the farmer is depressed all are depressed. What is the condition of the farmer to-day? I do not need to answer. Just look around and about you. Put your hands in your own pockets, reflect upon your own condition, and the answer is eloquent.

I have just said when the farmer is depressed all are depressed. In what condition are the other classes and groups of our Taxes are not being paid.

Interest is in default.
Confidence is stilled by fear.
Calamity has come. Why? Because farmers, embracing one-third of our population, are not receiving even cost for their products and have lost their buying power.
Less than two years ago a member of the Federal Farm Board, in a public address, is reported to have admitted that "radical legislation or a class conflict will result if the agricultural marketing act fails."

If we may judge by the complaints made, criticisms urged, and bills introduced for amendment and even repeal of the farm marketing act, then we must conclude that the law as operated and executed by the Farm Board has failed.

executed by the Farm Board has failed.

Admittedly disappointed, yet we must not lose hope. Times and conditions have been abnormal. The Farm Board may have had assigned to it an impossible task. Experiments have been made, and most of them have falled; however, there must be some pos-sible plan which will bring relief.

What is the cause of our trouble? This must be ascertained | Address of Senator Burton K. Wheeler, of Montana, on the effore we can prescribe a remedy. Some diagnose the malady as | BILL FOR THE REMONETIZATION OF SILVER before we can prescribe a remedy. Some diagnose the malady as overproduction. Others do not agree with this conclusion, but all do agree that no farmer anywhere or at any time can prosper or even survive unless he gets at least the cost of production for his Farmers organized and unorganized, here and everywhere, demanding a chance to retain their homes, a chance to pay their taxes, their interest, and eventually their debts, and a chance to survive. While too many farmers have already failed, others are wondering how they can hold on, and still others are filled with fear, yet we have not lost and must not lose hope.

A supreme effort is being made to find a way out. The Farm Board and its activities are to be investigated, not so much to find fault as to find a road giving promise of leading back to prosperity.

Many bills suggesting plans for relief are pending in the Con-

The so-called Swank-Thomas bill proposes to secure for the farmer at least the cost of production for that part of his products consumed here in the States. The commodities to be affected are such as wheat, cotton, wool, beef, pork, and dairy products.

The bill seeks to assert and establish the principle that to exist the farmer must secure the cost of production. The principle is self-evident. The farmers, through legislation, are not now demanding more, and they can not live with less.

The bill just mentioned was introduced by me in the Senate

The bill just mentioned was introduced by me in the Senate and by Congressman Swank in the House, at the request of John

A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union.

This nation-wide farm organization has a complete program for the aid, assistance, and relief of the millions engaged in farming. No one bill, however, can be made broad enough to cover all the phases of agriculture.

The farmer is a planter, a producer, a processor, a distributor, and also a consumer. He is interested in every phase of national activity. He must have access to money at reasonable rates, hence he is interested in the Frazier bill which you have just heard discussed.

He is directly affected by the management and manipulation of finance and the consequent amount of money in circulation; hence he is of necessity interested in the Wheeler bill which is soon to be explained.

Relative to the bill introduced by me and in support of this measure, delegates from many States have appeared. Hearings have been held and now we are demanding that the bill be reported and passed by the Congress, thereby recognizing, accepting, and adopting the principle, cost of production to the farmer, as a part of the economic system of this country.

It may be contended by some that this is a price-fixing measure. If it be so construed, it must be admitted that the prices to be fixed are only the cost of production and therefore the lowest prices which will permit the farmer to continue to own his home, maintain his school, support his church, attend his lodge, and to fixed are only the cost of production and therefore the lowest prices which will permit the farmer to continue to own his home, maintain his school, support his church, attend his lodge, and to maintain America American.

I am not suggesting or even asserting that the chance to exist is all the farmer deserves. The right to live is a divine right. The right to secure substance with which to sustain life can not be abridged by man-made law.

In addition to asserting that the farmer has a right to live and a chance to exist, I am demanding that agriculture be seated at the same table with finance, transportation, and industry.

The banks have favorable laws with an efficient and sympathetic board to administer such laws. Bank interest rates are fixed by law or regulation. Plenty of funds are always available, and when depression comes the Federal Treasury is opened for relief.

Transportation has favorable laws with the Interstate Commerce Commission to administer such laws. Rates are fixed, a reasonable income by law is guaranteed, and when depression comes the Treasury is likewise opened for relief.

Industry has favorable laws. The importation of competitive products is restricted if not embargoed, and when depression comes the Treasury is again opened for relief.

Public utilities have the same favorable and legally recognized status. Rates are fixed and as in finance, transportation, and industry, the consuming public pays the bills.

The measure sponsored by the National Farmers' Union seeks to assert no new principle. It does not ask the passage of legislation under which agriculture may develop an oppressive monopoly on foodstuff and clothing.

We are asking and demanding the cost of production—the minimum of equality.

Farmers can not exist with less and the longer consideration

We are asking and demanding the cost of production—the minimum of equality.

Farmers can not exist with less and the longer consideration and relief are denied or postponed, the longer will all other groups and classes continue to suffer.

MR. SIMPSON SPEAKING

In 1924, in spite of my loyalty to the Democratic Party, I voted for a man for Vice President who was not running on the Democratic ticket. I had to think a lot of that man to go from my own party over to another ticket and vote for him. The eight years that have passed since 1924 have increased my admiration and confidence in that man. You may know it is a real pleasure for me to introduce that man to this vast radio audience at this moment. He will discuss a question of vital interest not only to every man, woman, and child in this country, but to the 2,000,000,000 human souls in the world. You will now hear Senator Burtn K Wheeler, of Montana.

Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I have been asked by Mr. John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union, to speak to you upon my bill for the remonetization of silver.

remonetization of silver.

To-day, as never before, there is a practical agreement among our economists and all who have given any serious consideration to the problem that the only way out of this depression must come through the raising of commodity price levels. Call this what you may, the fact remains that the burden of debt will continue to crush and destroy until the farmer can sell his wheat and cotton at a profit. There is no way in which he can pay his taxes and interest on his mortgage at the present price he receives for that which he produces.

The giving back of $160,000,000 to the large taxpayers of this country at the request of the administration and the moratorium to foreign countries have added to our Treasury deficit about which you hear so much these days and which you are expected to make up through the medium of a sales tax.

The giving back to Wall Street interests of this $160,000,000, the The giving back to Wall Street interests of this $160,000,000, the granting of the moratorium to foreign countries, the two billion reconstruction finance bill, and the Glass-Steagall bill were all measures proposed by the administration at the instance of Wall Street and passed by a bipartisan leadership in Congress, and the country in each instance, and to those of us who were unable to see eye to eye with Eugene Meyer, head of the Federal reserve bank, or with the greatest Secretary since Alexander Hamilton, now ambassador to Great Britain, went intolerant sneers and whispers of demagogues.

When the Glass-Steagall bill was before the Senate I asked Senator Walcorr, one of the administration leaders, this question:

"Can the Senator tell me whether there is anything in the pending bill that will have even a tendency to bring up the price level of commodities in general, and particularly such commodities as wheat and cotton, that have to be sold on the world market?"

In the course of what he termed an account of the senator was a superior of the senator of the senator tell me whether there is anything in the pending bill that will have even a tendency to bring up the price level of commodities in general, and particularly such commodities as wheat and cotton, that have to be sold on the world market?"

ties as wheat and cotton, that have to be sold on the world market?"

In the course of what he termed an answer to the question Senator Walcott said: "We are sticking absolutely to the gold standard; and, Mr. President, by the provisions of this bill we shall have our reserve of free gold built up so high that it will be a gold Gibraltar that will defy the world financially, and no nation will be afraid to leave their gold with us, whether it is earmarked or whether it is not earmarked. " "Twenty-four hours after this bill shall have passed our potential free-gold supply will be so large that the world will be amazed at our strength."

The 24 hours have passed, and the farmers still have to pay their mortgages with a dollar three times its value, reckoned in commodity prices when they borrowed it.

The 24-hour period has passed, and you can still hear the dull sound of the tramp, tramp, tramp of the hungry millions of men, women, and children that constitute the army of unemployed that were to have a chicken in every pot if you placed the great engineer in the White House and passed another tariff bill.

The trouble with all these measures has been that they have gone about the problem in the wrong way. The best way to help the banks and the railroads is by putting the millions of unemployed to work and raising the price of farm products. Prosperity must come from the bottom up and not from the top down.

Attempts are now being made to belittle the send providing a stream of the stream instead of housestly facing the problem and passed in the problem and providing a stream of the stream instead of housestly facing the problem and passed in the problem and passed in the problem and passed of the problem and passed in the problem and passed another tariff bill.

ployed to work and raising the price of farm products. Prosperity must come from the bottom up and not from the top down.

Attempts are now being made to belittle the seriousness of the situation instead of honestly facing the problem and providing a remedy. It may require courage to fight this battle successfully, but it must be done if our present civilization is to endure.

It is true we recovered from the panics of 1837, 1873, and 1893, but we then had our great natural resources of forests and mines and the Government was not then dominated, to the same extent at least, by unscrupulous money lords as it is to-day.

These panics were caused in most instances by money pirates, who saw only their own immediate gain and had been willing at times to drive us into war to gain their ends.

There were a few millionaires in those days and there was a chance for everyone who was willing to work. Billions of American money was not being sent to Europe in exchange for worthless bonds and the era of robbery through inflated public utilities and other business enterprises had not yet arrived.

I am not a pessimist. As sure as there is a God in heaven, just so sure will the American people find a way to correct these evils and to break the strangle hold of these selfish interests. This Government must and will once more function in the interest of the people.

of the people.

How can this be accomplished? How can we raise the com-

How can this be accomplished? How can we raise the commodity price level and thereby reduce the burden of debt?

During the past three administrations the barometer of prosperity has been the stock market rather than prosperity of the farmers. There has been no prosperity on the farms during the past 10 years, and if the administration and its advisers in Wall Street had realized this fact at the beginning and sought to remedy it this country would not be in the condition it is to-day.

I need not dwell upon the conditions as we find them to-day. It is sufficient to say that our farmers are bankrupt, 8,000.000 men without work, and a decrease in wages last year of $11,000,000,000. Their only proposals have been to reduce wages and help to refinance the great corporations.

To correct this situation I introduced a bill in the Senate last January for the remonstization of silver on a ratio of 16 to 1. This is no new or novel idea, for silver has been used by mankind from the earliest dawn of civilization.

It has been used by the leading nations of the world to the great benefit of mankind. It was used by the United States from early colonial days down to the year 1873, when silver was demonetized through trickery and deception. My bill proposes to remonetize silver so it may serve as money as it did in the days of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln. The opposition to my silver bill comes from the same interests who succeeded in demonetizing silver in 1873.

There was never a public demand for the demonetization of silver and no economic need for so doing.

Then as now the selfish banking interests were the opponents of silver. It has been used by the leading nations of the world to the of silver.

Let me state briefly why silver should again be remonetized.

First, there is not a sufficient amount of gold in the world upon which to base the money of the world. The discovery of gold has not kept pace with commerce. Commerce increased at the rate of about 3½ per cent per year, and as commerce and the credit necessary to carry it on is handled on a gold basis, and as the production of gold has not kept pace with the increasing commerce, we have now reached a point where gold can not stand the strain. To this increase in commerce has been added the additional strain resulting from the World War.

This shortage of gold has greatly increased the value of gold, which is only another way of saying that it has forced commodity prices to a low level.

prices to a low level.

In the second place, we should remonetize silver in order that

In the second place, we should remonetize silver in order that we may be able to transact business with the nations that are now off the gold standard.

With the present ratio of 65 to 1 we can not expect silver nations to buy our products. The present exchange rate on money makes the United States the natural dumping ground for other nations and prevents or discourages our export trade. I am told that heavy coal-mine machinery is now being imported from England for use in Pennsylvania coal mines.

The gold standard may be helpful to the bankers, but it spells destruction for the American farmer and American manufacturer. It is claimed that the free and unlimited coinage of silver would drive the gold out of this country and flood us with silver. All history refutes this assertion. As silver increases in value people will not want to surrender it.

history refutes this assertion. As siver increases in value people will not want to surrender it.

Sir Charles Addis, director of the Bank of England, a vice president of the Bank for International Settlements, said in an address before the British Institute of Bankers on April 3, 1930:

"The appreciation of gold, or what is the same thing, the downward trend of prices, has become a serious menace, and, if allowed to go on unheeded, must inevitably check enterprise and retard economic recovery.

"Various explanations have been advanced to account for this "Various explanations have been advanced to account for this untoward phenomenon, and no doubt several causal agencies have been at work. But it is indisputable that one of them is the monetary factor, and it is with this particular cause that central banks are directly concerned. In so far as the persistent fall in prices is due to monetary causes, to some maladjustment of the international monetary machine for whose efficient working the central banks are responsible, it will not avail them to plead that other causes are at work for which they are not responsible."

Let us then take a view of our financial oxcart. Money, using the word in its strict and definite sense, is a relic of the days of Moses and Abraham. Money as a human agency was then limited to the precious metals, gold and silver. Money of ultimate redemption has not increased since that day in proportion to the ever-growing requirements of mankind. On the contrary, the efficiency of money has retrograded, for an important commodity used as money in the earliest days of history—namely, silver—has been stricken down.

Is it true that the markets of China and India are of real impor-

Is it true that the markets of China and India are of real impor-Is it true that the markets of China and India are of real importance to American producers of cotton, wheat, copper, and other commodities? Is it true that the accumulation of wealth in India and China for centuries past has been expressed not in investments of stocks and bonds listed on the European and American markets but in accumulations of silver, and that the depression of this wealth by the precipitous decline of silver, as has occurred several times in history, tends to destroy the buying power of China and India? If so, it follows in necessary sequence that here we have the outstanding fact, a fact of colossal importance for the commercial and economic world to consider, namely, stocks of wheat, cotton, and other commodities begin to accumulate in the visible form of what is called "overproduction" whenever Asiatics begin to starve from the lack of buying power.

begin to starve from the lack of buying power.

It should not require an expert in political science to see that the only solution possible must come through the restoration of the prices of commodities. The remonetization of silver on a basis of 16 to 1 will accomplish this purpose without injury or injustice to anyone. It will enable the debtor to liquidate in honest dollars the value of those borrowed instead of in dollars or greater value.

The remonetization of silver would raise and stabilize the price of wheat and cotton on the world market without resorting to unsound methods and without cost of one dollar to the Federal

In an agricultural report of 1890 we find the following state-

The recent legislation looking to the restoration of the bimetallic standard of our currency, and the consequent enhancement of the value of silver, has unquestionably had much to do with the recent advance of the price of cereals."

If it be true that proposed legislation looking to a restoration f bimetallism caused an advance in the price of cereals, then surely no one can be in doubt of what the results will be when silver is again remonetized.

It is therefore imperative that the United States give some consideration to the best interests of the manufacturer, the farmer, and the wageworkers in this country, regardless of the bitter opposition of the international bankers.

The remonetization of silver would benefit the farmer by raising the world commodity levels which fix the price he gets for his wheat and cotton. It would increase the purchasing power of silver-using nations and their ability to purchase our surplus commodities.

It would start the wheels of industry in America, raise our price levels, and put an end to unemployment. It would make it possible for other nations to do business with us and give to the world a sufficient amount of money with which to carry on the commerce of the world.

It would be to the selfish advantage of the United States, regardless of our great amount of gold and regardless of the fact that we are a creditor nation, for it would tend to raise and stabilize world commodity prices and give the American farmer and wage-worker an equal chance with those of other countries.

I assert and challenge intelligent criticism—not mere denial-of the following statements:

First. The enactment of my bill into law would immediately thereafter nearly double the volume of the world's primary money, with the resultant increased conservative credit basis of twenty times the amount of primary money thus added to the world's Second. Within one year after the enactment of this bill the world's price of wheat, cotton, and all agricultural products would be more than trebled

Third. The purchasing power of over 50 per cent of the entire world's population now using silver as their sole yardstick of exchange and business transaction would contemporaneously be quadrupled; that is, the value of the silver stock would increase from 30 cents to $1.30, resulting in the creation of a market which would more than absorb all the surplus of our raw materials and manufactured products.

manufactured products.

Within two years all our present agricultural-land values throughout the United States would be more than quadrupled, thereby transforming the present frozen assets of the country banks in agricultural communities into liquid assets.

The unemployed-labor problem would be rapidly solved.

Both labor and capital would be benefited.

Contentment, happiness, and lucrative occupation would be substituted for discontentment and despair, with their inevitable resultant tragedies to follow.

sultant tragedies to follow.

It would relieve starvation in the midst of plenty

It would relieve starvation in the midst of plenty.

This legislation would do more than all suggestions heretofore combined toward reviving, encouraging, vitalizing, and resuscitating business in this country and throughout the world.

The market prices of securities, especially the common stocks of all corporations enjoying honest, efficient managements and being properly financed, where listed on some of the great stock exchanges of this country, would almost contemporaneously show increased activity and market value.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles in regard to Senate bill 1197, one being a copy of a communication addressed to the Hon. Arthur M. Hyde, Secretary of Agriculture, and the other an article by William Lemke, of Fargo, N. Dak.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. ARTHUR M. HYDE,

Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SECRETARY HYDE: We have yours of March 12, in which you state that your statement regarding the so-called Frazier bill

"It is my judgment that this bill is hostile to the best interests of agriculture.

This is as quoted by the Associated Press, and my wire asking whether or not you had been correctly quoted was based on this same statement

I feel that in justice to the farmers and in fairness to you that you should be advised that your statement as quoted, without some very substantial analysis of your reasons for feeling this way about the bill, is very unsatisfactory to the people of this State. The mere statement that you feel that in your judgment this bill is hostile to the best interests of agriculture, without any explanation of what part of the bill or what features in the bill cause it to be detrimented to the best interests of agriculture and in view tion of what part of the bill or what features in the bill cause it to be detrimental to the best interests of agriculture, and in view of the fact that every bill of this kind that has been presented in Congress has received a similar reception with nothing of a constructive nature offered in place of it causes the farmers to justly feel that their cause is not being properly considered by yourself, representing their industry, or by the Government in general.

In view of the fact that hundreds of millions of dollars are being handed out almost promiscuously in a frantic endeavor to prevent the destruction of other industries causes our farmers to feel that such statements as you have made indicate that the Department of Agriculture is playing a part in what appears to be a definite plan to further the disparity between agriculture and other industries.

I respectfully warn you, Mr. Secretary, that such statements must be either well qualified or will be considered in the light I have just stated. I think the presidential primary election just held in this State indicates even a more general attitude along this line than I had supposed, in that it indicates even in the larger cities a general disapproval of the administration of the Republican Party.

This depression, which has brought the condition of the second transfer of th

I realize how fully your time is occupied, but I assure you that it is important that you give some statement fully explaining your position in regard to the Frazier bill and other proposed measures for the relief of agriculture.

THEY DID IT

By William Lemke

Some one, quick, page Senator Moses, of New Hampshire, and tell him that in the North Dakota presidential primaries "the sons of the wild jackasses" kicked all the props out of the Republican fence and jumped into the Democratic pasture. Tell him that Governor Murray, of Oklahoma, came out here and, in substance, told us that he wanted one woman to love one man and one man told us that he wanted one woman to love one man and one man to love one woman, and these two together with their family to occupy one home, clear of mortgage and free of Wall Street domination—tell him that Governor Roosevelt boldly and unafraid came out in favor of the refinancing of the existing farm indebtedness by the Federal Government along the lines of the Frazier bill—that he suggested that if the Federal Government could refinance the bankers through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, through the Glass-Steagall bill, and through the increasing of the Federal reserve notes by over a billion dollars, in creasing of the Federal reserve notes by over a billion dollars, in a few large cities, that then he could see no reason why the same Federal Government could not refinance the farmers. The result of these statements was that the Democrat vote was increased by 800 per cent over what it was four years ago.

DISPAIR OF BROKEN PROMISES

The agricultural sections of the United States are on the warpath. They have long despaired of the honesty of purpose of the promise made by the administration in the last election to "place American agriculture on a basis of equality with other industries." American agriculture on a basis of equality with other industries." They are not going to permit the incompetent, inefficient administration to abuse their patience any longer. No; it can not even conceal its shortcomings by talking to them of the patriotism, suffering, and valor of George Washington and his soldiers at Valley Forge. The suffering masses know of that patriotism, valor, and suffering through experience, and they are willing to endure it for the sake of this Nation—but not for the international bankers and the inefficient and incompetent administration. Human memory may be short, but it will be long enough to remember that promise to, and that betrayal of, agriculture.

DEMAND EQUALITY

The agricultural interests of this Nation demand the Frazier bill, through which the United States Government is to refinance the existing farm indebtedness with 1½ per cent interest and 1½ per cent principal on the amortization plan, not by the issuing of bonds but by Federal reserve notes. They demand the enactof bonds but by Federal reserve notes. They demand the enactment of the Thomas-Swank bill, which provides that the farmers are to receive the cost of production for that part of their products which are consumed within the United States. The enactment of these two bills will put "agriculture on an equality with other industries."

The Frazier bill can and will be passed. It has just recently been unanimously reported out of the Senate Subcommittee on Agriculture. It will be reported out of the Senate Committee on Agriculture within the next few days by a large majority. This in spite of the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Hyde, and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, went on record as being opposed to it.

The committee took year little stock in the secretary of the treasury.

The committee took very little stock in the statement of Mr. Hyde that the passage of this bill would be ruinous to the American farmer. They could not see just how reducing the interest on farm indebtedness from 6, 7, and 8 per cent to 1½ per cent could ruin any farmer.

The committee even smiled at Mr. Mills's statement that the passage of this bill would cause inflation and upset the monetary system. They wondered why Mr. Mills was so active for the $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Glass-Steagall bill, which were passed to aid the large banks, insurance companies, and other investors who had been juggled into buying $15,000,000,000 of more or less worthless foreign bonds through the international bankers. They wondered why Mr. Mills could not see that that was inflation.

We repeat that this bill can and will be passed, but we must not fall asleep at the switch. We must continue to send resolutions, letters, telegrams, and night letters to Senator Frazier and forever urge him on to greater efforts. When this bill becomes forever urge him on to greater efforts. When this bill becomes a law it will put from two to three billion dollars new money in circulation among the people—it will loosen the frozen assets—the unemployed will again be able to get work and eat—the starving of millions will end—business will again be general.

OPERATION OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT-ARTICLE BY SENATOR BROOKHART

Mr. FRAZIER, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Has the Federal Reserve Act Failed?" by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. Brookhart], which appeared in Plain Talk maga-

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> [From Plain Talk, July, 1929] HAS THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT FAILED? By Senator SMITH W. BROOKHART, of IOWA

(The specific purpose of the Federal reserve act was "to cut the cancer of speculation," and it was regarded precisely in this light by President Wilson and Carter Glass, the two men more responsible for its existence than anyone else. But Senator BROOKHART shows that it has increased speculation out of bounds. He adds that it has concentrated credits to the harm of the Nation, that it has deflated agriculture and reduced the wages of labor, that it has denated agriculture and reduced the wages of labor, that it has overinfiated certain lines of industry and deliberately kept up interest rates for agriculture, industry, and commerce while providing stock gamblers with ready and, until lately, cheap money. No more severe indictment of the Federal reserve system has ever been printed.—Editor.)

In recent months—one might say in recent years—this country has been printed agreement the country and the country agreement the country agreement agreement the country agreement the co

In recent months—one might say in recent years—this country has been witnessing an uninterrupted orgy of speculation which has few parallels in modern times. New records for stock turnovers have been broken repeatedly in Wall Street in recent months; several thousand new "easy-money" millionaires have been created, and at the same time, as a necessary corollary, hundreds of thousands of small "investors" have lost every penny they possess; and the concentration of money and credit in New York has taken a heavy toll from agriculture and all forms of legitimate industry. Recently there have been complaints from Europe that credit there also is being restricted through the fact that their surplus money is being attracted to New York by abnormally high interest rates, and predictions are being made that this will injuriously affect our foreign trade.

In fact, although we hear much about "prosperity" and the newspapers are constantly telling how billions are changing hands on the various stock exchanges, it is my deliberate opinion that on the various stock exchanges, it is my deliberate opinion that we are headed straight for one of the gravest economic crises in the history of our country unless we speedily bring about a reasonable readjustment of credit and thereby check the unrestrained stock gambling which is corrupting every phase of strained stock gambling which is corrupting every phase of American life.

When the Federal Reserve Board recently convened to consider making another advance in the rate of rediscount—and the mere possibility of such action precipitated a bear raid that wiped out hundreds of millions of dollars of paper profits in a single day—there were nearly $7,000,000,000 of bank deposits in New York City used exclusively for brokers' loans, and this vast sum represents approximately one-third of all deposits in all member banks of the entire Federal reserve system.

The threat to raise the rediscount rate doubtless was intended to put the brakes against speculation. Earlier, in December, that to put the brakes against speculation. Earlier, in December, the rediscount rate actually was raised; but since then fresh records were made in daily stock turnovers, and speculative shares soared to new high levels. Even Secretary Mellon's warning that the prices of some stocks might be too high was twisted about by the Wall Street gamblers and made the basis for a bull movement in bonds. And more recently Gov. Roy A. Young, of the Federal Reserve Board, when speaking before the Cincinnati Commercial Club, asked the bankers of the Nation "to use hoss sense" and to set their own financial house in order, virtually confessing that under the law the Federal Reserve Board is helpless to remedy conditions.

The result of these mild warnings caused a "speculators' panic." Call money skyrocketed to 20 per cent, and there was a drastic decline in the prices of stocks. More serious, from the standpoint of the Wall Street operators, there was a disposition on the part of the public to withdraw from the market. This was bad for the brokers' business, and it resulted in a furious protest against any

Several big bankers openly defied the Federal Reserve Board by offering new brokers' loans—at a handsome profit to themselves, offering new brokers' loans—at a handsome profit to themselves, of course; radio appeals were made for business men to get behind a "hands-off" policy; and the Federal Reserve Board was bitterly attacked by certain newspapers and even on the floors of Congress. As a result the Federal Reserve Board withdrew into the cyclone cellar and the gambling fever is again taking possession of the public.

In other words, the Federal reserve system surrenders its financial leadership to the stock-exchange operators, who now seem in complete possession of the money market. I am not alone in this opinion. Paul M. Warburg, one of the framers of the Federal reserve act, and former financial advisor to President Wilson, cer-tainly can not be classed as a radical, but recently he scored this surrender in no equivocal language:

"The rudder has passed into the hands of stock-exchange operators who now and for many months past have governed the flow of money not only in the United States but in the principal marts of the world. History has taught mankind that speculative overexpansion invariably ends in overcontraction and distress.

"If a stock-exchange debauch is quickly arrested by prompt expansion invariably ends in overcontraction and distress.

"If a stock-exchange debauch is quickly arrested by prompt and determined action, it is not too much to hope that a shrinkage of inflated stock prices may be brought about without seriously affecting the wider circles of general business. If orgles of unrestrained speculation are permitted to spread too far, however, the ultimate collapse is certain not only to affect the speculators themselves but also to bring about a general depression throughout the entire country.

"People who express fear that the increases in the rediscount rate might hurt business, overlook the far greater hurt the country will have to suffer if their advice to permit the situation to work its way out is followed.

"When commercial paper commands 5¾ per cent and bankers' acceptances sell at 5% per cent, rediscount rates of 4½ and 5 per cent seem grotesquely out of line. Procrastination in bringing rediscount rates into a proper relation with the actualities and rediscount rates into a proper relation with the actualities and hesitation in taking effectual steps to reassert the Federal reserve system's leadership place a grave responsibility on those in charge of its administration."

I do not agree with Mr. Warburg's conclusion, but I would like to point out that the surrender was made when the Federal reserve act was passed—and I believe it was done deliberately by the big financial crowd.

Personally, I believe the Federal Reserve Board's gentle policy, which is in sharp contrast with its sharp deflation of farm values and workers' wages in 1920—has created a situation which calls for remedial action by Congress, which action should include some drastic and fundamental changes in the workings of the Federal reserve system. It is obvious to every thoughtful person that we have reached a point where the country is becoming crazed with speculation to such an extent that the situation may aptly be compared to the "Mississippi Bubble" mania which caused a general financial collapse in France more than a which caused a general financial collapse in France more than a century ago. We won't tolerate Monte Carlos in this country, and our laws rightly forbid lotteries, horse-race betting, faro, roulette, and plain poker, but we not only permit, we actually encourage unrestricted gambling on a gigantic scale through our various stock and commodity exchanges, when it can be demonstrated beyond any possible doubt that every legitimate business interest in the Nation is suffering as a result of this speculative orgy and will suffer still more when the inevitable reaction sets in sets in.

In the last eight years farm values have shrunk from seventynine to fifty-eight billion dollars—an actual loss of $21,000,000,000—and at the same time farm mortgages have increased from $6,000,000,000 in 1920 to the staggering total of $14,000,000,000 to-day. This truly appalling depreciation in agriculture—a basic industry involving nearly one-third of our total population—is largely the direct result of the maladjustment of edit caused by speculation.

While agriculture has been defiated, certain branches of industry have been inflated and overcapitalized to an alarming extent; and this condition, too, has been brought about by the facility with which securities can be floated on the stock market. This same condition is encouraging concentrations and monopolies, with consequent higher prices, and as surely as night follows day this hectic period of artificial and inequitable expansion will be followed by lean years of readjustment, unemployment, and acute industrial depression.

acute industrial depression.

Already the concentration of credit in Wall Street for speculative purposes has curtailed the development of legitimate enterprises elsewhere in the Nation. The interest rates on call money went above 15 per cent several times in the recent "Hoover market." These abnormally high interest rates attracted to New York $7,000,000,000 of the Nation's credit—and the accumulation of this huge sum for Wall Street speculation naturally meant a restriction of credit for other more legitimate lines of business. This is conceded by every economist worthy of the name. George E. Roberts, vice president of the National City Bank of New York, recently declared:

"High interest rates signify more than the effects upon wheaver

High interest rates signify more than the effects upon whoever

"High interest rates signify more than the effects upon whoever pays them; they signify that a selective process is going on; that some one who would like to get credit is not getting it. That means a check upon activity and a restriction of purchasing power somewhere; and in the long run that is not good for business or good for the corporations whose stocks are in the market."

There is only a limited amount of money available for the needs of the whole Nation, and it logically follows that the more money is centralized in New York for speculative purposes the less money there is available elsewhere for the legitimate needs of agriculture and commerce. I already have shown in a preceding paragraph how farm values have been beaten down in the last eight years through lack of adequate credit, and I believe definite symptoms now indicate that the same process is beginning to take place in industry.

toms now indicate that the same process is beginning to take place in industry.

According to a national survey in November, 1928, building and construction lines were 14 per cent less active than in November, 1927, and 9 per cent under the mark of November, 1926. In Chicago the building for November, 1928, was 30 per cent less than that of the preceding year, in Los Angeles more than 60 per cent less, in San Francisco 35 per cent less; and Buffalo showed a decline in construction of more than 50 per cent. Obviously, money for building purposes is becoming stringent in every part of the country; how could it be otherwise when New York brokers are willing to pay as high as 20 per cent interest for short-time call notes?

The abnormally high rates paid in New York for call money not The abnormally high rates paid in New York for call money hot only have curtailed the amount of credit elsewhere in the country but have increased general interest rates. This was freely conceded by Governor Young, of the Federal Reserve Board, in Cincinnati. He said:

"* * There are approximately 27,000 bankers in the United States * * and while, from what I am able to ob-

United States * * * and while, from what I am able to observe, they take care of local needs, when they have funds to employ outside of their own community and are offered call loans at rates from 3 to 4 per cent above credit based on production and distribution, they extend that credit which brings the best rates, all other things being equal.

"This forces the commercial borrower to make his offer more attractive, with the result that in the course of time everyone pays higher interest rates. While up to the present time commerce and industry have enjoyed lower rates than the speculator, this process of lifting may go to a point where it will become a serious deterrent to business, and it is that phase of the present situation with which the Federal Reserve Board most concerns itself "

Governor Young has stated the case very clearly, although I can not share his optimism that business has not yet been injured. The slowing up of building in all parts of the Nation is evidence to me that legitimate industry has been strangled for lack of credit, and the staggering blow dealt to agriculture need not be stressed again at this point. It is significant, however, that in his lengthy speech Governor Young did not once mention the state of agriculture. Considering the indisputable facts, his studied avoidance is a confession that the Federal Reserve Board has signally failed to afford equal credit opportunity to the 30,000,000 farmers of the Nation. That alone is sufficient to condemn workings of the system and to prove the necessity for some drastic and immediate changes. But, as I shall presently show, there tic and immediate changes. But, as I shall presently show, there are other fundamental faults inherent in the Federal reserve sysare other fundamental faults innerent in the Federal reserve system, and it will never produce general prosperity for the common people of the country until those weaknesses are corrected.

In fact, after nearly 15 years of operation, the Federal reserve system can be indicted on at least five major counts:

1. It has resulted in an enormous increase of speculation.

2. It has concentrated credit with evil results.

2. It has concentrated credit with evil results.
3. It has deflated agriculture and reduced the real wages of labor.
4. It has overinflated certain lines of industry.
5. It has deliberately kept up interest rates to agriculture, industry, and commerce, although until recently providing stock gamblers with plenty of 4 per cent money.

After all, it is well to remember that the Federal reserve system was the original brain child of bankers, and that it is run by bankers primarily for bankers. As I shall prove, the prosperity of the common people of the country is of only secondary importance to the little inside group of financiers who control this gigantic credit organization, which, in my humble opinion, Congress very unwisely places in their hands.

Now, in logical order, let me discuss the five charges I have

Now, in logical order, let me discuss the five charges I have leveled against the Federal reserve system as it now operates:

Every competent economist and honest statesman realizes that Every competent economist and honest statesman realizes that uncontrolled speculation is ruinous to the welfare of any country. It was for the announced purpose of curbing stock gambling and preventing financial panies that the Federal reserve system was set up in 1913. That was plainly expressed by the sponsors of the act. In his message to Congress urging passage of the law, President Wilson said:

"We must have a currency, not rigid as now, but readily, elastically, responsive to sound credit. * * Our banking laws must mobilize reserves; must not permit concentration anywhere in a few hands of the monetary resources of the country or their use for speculative purposes in such volume as to hinder or impede or stand in the way of other more legitimate, more fruitful uses * * *"

Precisely the same idea was even none emphatically expressed.

Precisely the same idea was even more emphatically expressed when the bill was presented in Congress by Carter Glass, who declared:

The whole fight of the great banker is to drive us from our firm resolve to break down the artificial connection between the banking business of the country and the stock-speculation operations at the money centers. The monetary commission, with more discretion than courage, evaded this problem; but the Banking and Currency Committee of the House has gone to the very root this gigantic evil and in this bill proposes to cut the cancer

"The avowed purpose of this bill is to cure this evil, to withdraw the reserve funds of the country from the congested money centers, and to make them readily available for business uses in the various parts of the country where they belong."

The above statements from President Wilson and Senator Glass make it manifest that the Federal reserve law was intended to "cut the cancer of speculation" from out of the fabric of Amer-

"cut the cancer of speculation" from out of the fabric of American business; but now, after nearly 15 years of operation, one has to admit that the law has signally falled in its primary purpose.

When the Federal reserve act passed Congress testimony taken by the Pujo committee revealed that $766,000,000 of bank deposits were being used in New York for brokers' loans. To-day the amount of bank deposits used for stock gambling is nearly eight times as great as when the so-called remedial law was passed.

So far as fulfilling its announced purpose "to cut the cancer of speculation out of American business," the Federal reserve act ertainly has been one of the most farcical failures of all legislative history.

Stock gambling never has been conducted upon such an extensive and widespread scale as it is to-day. Within recent months as many as 6,000,000 shares have been sold on the New York Stock Exchange in a single day, and it is nothing unusual when the tickers fail to keep up with the volume of business.

During the recent "bear raid," which followed the advance in

During the recent "bear raid," which followed the advance in the rediscount rate, the value of stock of a dozen corporations, picked at random, depreciated more than $1,317,500,000 in a period of five days. This is equal to the combined assessed real-estate valuation of Butte, Atlanta, Birmingham, Louisville, and New Orleans. And remember, this represents only 12 out of a list of 1,500 listed stocks. Tens of thousands of small operators saw their margins wiped out during this drop, and doubtless indescribable misery and no small amount of crime resulted in many parts of the Nexton. the Nation.

The operations of the "bulls" and "bears" are printed on the front pages of every daily newspaper in the land. The big "wire houses" conduct branch offices all over the country. It is difficult indeed to resist succumbing to the contagion of getting somecult indeed to resist succumbing to the contagion of getting something for nothing; and to-day stenographers, clerks, salesmen, workers, and even farmers are distracted from their daily duties and feverishly "follow the market"—in many cases putting up money for margins that they can ill afford to lose—while an "inside ring" of experienced Wall Street operators rig the market up and down almost at will, and in the aggregate trim the outside suckers for hundreds of millions of dollars every year. It is the greatest "sure-thing game" of the age, and the New York Stock Exchange is the biggest gambling house in the world; but it is very unfortunate that we have allowed this gambling fever to affect the entire Nation like some poisonous virus.

So much for my contention that the Federal reserve act has falled to check speculation. Now I will show how it has concen-failed to check speculation. Now I will show how it has concentrated credit.

The Federal reserve act requires all member banks to redeposit

The Federal reserve act requires all member banks to redeposit their legal reserves in one of the central reserve banks without interest. Furthermore, if a member bank has surplus funds above its reserve and wants to deposit these funds with a central reserve bank, the law requires that no interest can be paid.

This provision is made to order for the New York banks, and virtually gives them a monopoly on all that portion of redeposits of member banks above the reserves required by law to be deposited in Federal reserve banks. The New York banks have been paying 1¾ to 2 per cent for these redeposits, and until recently lending the money to speculators at about 4 per cent, while farmers and workers were compelled to pay 7 and 8 per cent on bank loans used to produce food and useful commodities.

In my own State of Iowa there are some $900,000,000 of bank loans used to produce food and useful commodities.

In my own State of Iowa there are some $900,000,000 of bank deposits; and of this total more than $500,000,000 is now being loaned in Wall Street in three accounts; redeposits, long-time bonds, and margin loans. The inevitable result is that business men are denied funds for legitimate growth, and farmers are unable to borrow sufficient money to carry over livestock or grain crops and are forced to dump their produce on the market when prices are lowest. At least that is what has happened in the past, and this ruinous policy costs the producers of Iowa millions of dollars every year, because the funds put in the Iowa banks by Iowa producers are drained off to Wall Street to be used by a few parasitical gamblers. sitical gamblers

When the Federal reserve act was passed it was announced with

When the Federal reserve act was passed it was announced with a great fanfare of publicity that speculative loans were to be denied the rediscount privilege in the Federal reserve banks. This, it was fondly supposed, was the keen-edged scalpel that was to cut the "cancer of speculation" out of American business.

But the stock gamblers never have worried about this, for the same lew, by prohibiting the Federal reserve banks from paying interest on members' deposits, almost automatically drove the surplus deposits of the country to Wall Street—and I. for one, am critical enough to believe that this particular provision of the law was inserted precisely for that purpose. The amount of bank deposits used by Wall Street for speculative purposes has increased nearly eightfold since the Federal reserve act was passed, and I believe the facts justify my charge that this has resulted in and I believe the facts justify my charge that this has resulted in the further concentration of credit into the hands of stock gamblers where it is harmfully used.

Now, I shall discuss the charge that the Federal reserve system has deflated agriculture, and I also shall prove the deflation was deliberate:

Prior to 1920 the Federal reserve system had encouraged land investment—as a means of raising more grain and livestock to win the war—and was the most potent agency for promoting inflation. It was on the bull side of the market until late in inflation. It was on the bull side of the market until late in 1919, when an inside group of big financiers, holding the Federal reserve machinery in their hands, secretly decided to deflate farm values and to take the bear side of the market.

At this point I want to state that the Federal reserve system never has the right to adopt a deflation policy. That always is an economic crime. It has a perfect right to prevent inflation; but after having encouraged inflation and approved the loans and rediscounts by which the fabric was erected, it has no right to turn around suddenly and destroy the enterprise it fostered. The manner in which agricultural values were deliberately destroyed in 1920 is an economic crime beyond description; it was cold-bloodedly engineered by the financial crowd in control of the Federal reserve machinery, and this crowd profited enormously by the resultant widespread ruin.

The formal meeting at which the long-discussed policy was agreed upon was on May 18, 1920. Governor Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, handed down the decree of our invisible government in the following words:

government in the following words:

"The directors of Federal reserve banks are clearly within their rights when they say to any member bank, 'You have gone far enough; we are familiar with your condition; you have got more than your share, and we want you to reduce; we can not let you have any more.'" (Federal Reserve Board conference minutes.) (S. Doc. 310, 67th Cong.)

It was agreed to raise the rediscount rate to 7 per cent—this was kept from the public for a time, so that favored insiders could go on borrowing money and prepare for the coming storm—but in all the great agricultural States of the West the Federal reserve heads sent out letters to members of reserve banks ordering them to compel the farmers to reduce their loans and pay off their mortgages. Then in October, when the crops had been matured and the farmers were ready to market their produce, the Federal reserve governors openly showed their hands.

Public meetings were held in all the agricultural States. A representative of the Federal reserve system held four in Iowa, and I personally attended one. We were told that our loan allotment was $36,000,000, that we already had been loaned $91,000,000, and that we must dump our crops on the market, sell our livestock at a sacrifice, let go of our land, if necessary, and reduce our loans. our loans.

Iowa then had a crop valued at $1,000,000,000. On a conservative basis we were entitled to three times the loans we then had outstanding. But some mysterious, invisible power had decreed cutstanding. But some mysterious, invisible power had decreed our financial ruin. The same condition existed in other agricultural States, although at that time the Federal Reserve Bank of New York had loaned out for speculative purposes more money than was loaned out by all the Federal reserve banks in some 13 States west of the Mississippi River.

Loans were called. Bankers sent for farmers, and under threats of foreclosure compelled them to dump their crops on the market. Naturally, the big speculators had been tipped off in advance and a bear raid was in full swing. Prices broke all down the line. In Iowa corn fell from $1.75 to 27 cents a bushel; the price of wheat dropped 80 cents in a few days; the price of livestock was wheat dropped 80 cents in a few days; the price of livestock was not sufficient to pay the freight to the nearest market; and tens of thousands of hard-working farmers were bankrupted overnight in the creation of a wholly artificial condition by the Federal serve Board's wrecking crew.

The Manufacturers' Record says farm lands and the two crops of 1920 and 1921 were deflated to the extent of $32,000,000,000 and that all other business was deflated to the extent of only $18,000,000,000. In other words, agriculture was deflated about six times as much in proportion as other lines of business—and do not forget that only little business was deflated. Big business was tipped off in advance and made enormous profits out of this illicit deflation. The Federal Reserve Board had saved Wall Street from a panic, but it handed the American farmer the worst price panic in history, and agriculture has not yet recovered from that foul blow.

Since 1920 agricultural values have kept on declining because credit has been drained away by Wall Street speculation, and this same speculation has created a dangerous inflation in certain industries. This has been brought about in the following manner:

industries. This has been brought about in the following manner:

Owing to the increased interest rates charged by local banks, and the easy money prevailing in the big eastern financial centers, many concerns have found it cheaper to finance themselves through the stock market. The result has been a great increase in refinancings through the issuance of bonds, preferred stocks, second preferred stocks, and various other devices, which all offer a great temptation to overcapitalize.

So long as local bankers were advancing funds for reorganization or expansion they usually insisted that the business be kept upon a fairly conservative basis, and that the money invested bear some actual relation to the earning value of the stock; but when stocks and bonds can be sold broadcast to persons who have no direct knowledge of the corporation's condition, the element of personal responsibility vanishes and in many cases the sky is the limit.

As proof of the above statement it is merely necessary to cite that in 1921 the total value of all common and preferred stock listed on the New York Stock Exchange was a little over $4,000,000,000, while to-day the combined paper value of the stocks listed on Wall Street has reached the staggering total of $61,000,000,000,000. It is a fact—significant but little realized—that the various business enterprises of the United States are rapidly approaching a point where their total capitalization will represent a sum greater than that on which the entire national income can pay 5 per cent interest. Inevitably this condition must spell ruin and bankruptcy for many innocent purchasers who own what they believe to be "securities" bought at highly inflated prices on an artificially stimulated bull market.

Recently I checked over a long list comprising some of the largest industrial concerns in the United States, and found that during 1928 their stock values had increased an average of 27 per cent, while during the same period the average earnings of these identical corporations had declined on an average 11 per

Within two years the market value of 50 industrial stocks, 'he 20 public-utility stocks, and the 20 railroad shares which are used in computing the Standard Statistics index of the prices of stocks has increased from approximately seventeen and one-half billion to thirty-three billion dollars, an inflation that is wholly unjustified by an increase in the earnings of the above-mentioned corporations.

The situation outlined above fully justified my charge that the Federal reserve system has encouraged a dangerous inflation in certain lines of industry. The rise in the prices of stock-exchange "securities" has not enriched the assets of the corporations or lowered their production costs or increased their earning power. The only difference made by the advance in the price of securities is a wholly fictitious change in the value of paper markers known as shares, and this bears no relation whatever to the real prosperity of the Nation. of the Nation.

Now we come to the consideration of my last indictment—that the Federal reserve system has deliberately kept up interest rates and thus placed an unfair burden on agriculture, industry, and commerce. Here I can convict the Federal reserve with its own official admissions.

and thus placed an unfair burden on agriculture, industry, and commerce. Here I can convict the Federal reserve with its own official admissions.

The Federal Reserve Board some time ago issued a booklet entitled "Questions and Answers on the Federal Reserve System." On page 135 the question is asked, "Why is interest not paid on the reserve balance carried with the Federal reserve bank?"

Its own answer follows:

"Because it is wrong in principle and would defeat one of the most important objects for which the Federal reserve system was established, namely." to afford means of rediscounting commercial paper. If a Federal reserve bank were compelled to use at all times a large percentage of its resources to purchase paper in the open market for the purpose of earning interest to be paid to member banks on their reserve deposits, it is manifest that this would absorb funds to such a degree as to leave it without adequate resources to meet the needs of its member banks in case of sudden emergency or for heavy seasonal requirements.

"Morcover, even if this were not the case, member banks would probably lose far more than they would gain if Federal reserve banks should pay them interest on their reserve banks amount to approximately $22,00,000,000. The payment of interest at 2 per cent on this amount would require the Federal reserve banks in Government securities, it would not only dissipate the reserves as above specified but would have the effect of increasing the supply of credit to such an extent as to force down interest rates. If the amount were used in the open market in the purchase of bankers acceptances and bills of exchange, it would come in direct competition with member banks and by increasing the supply of credit to such an extent as to force down interest rates. If the amount were used in the open market in the purchase of bankers acceptances and bills of exchange, it would come in direct competition with member banks and by increasing the supply of credit to such an extent as to force down interes productive purposes.

I contend that, stripped of all technical terms, a reserve bank has but two basic functions:

One is to act as a reservoir for the redeposits of member banks. One is to act as a reservoir for the redeposits of member banks. There are 27,000 banks in the United States, and there are times when member banks have more funds than they can loan to their regular loan customers. A bank wants to deposit these funds in its reserve bank for a few days or a few months with the right to recall them when needed at home. The local bank also should get a small return on these redeposits. This is a legitimate function of a reserve bank and should be useful in keeping capital employed, mobilizing credit, and lowering interest rates.

The second basic function of a reserve bank is to rediscount

The second basic function of a reserve bank is to rediscount paper of its member banks. Farmers are buying feed or seed, merchants are making reasonable increases of stock, or manufacturers are buying raw materials. Their needs may require more credit than the local bank can provide from its own deposits. Therefore it must call upon the central reserve bank for temporary aid; to obtain this it sends its commercial paper to the reserve bank for sale by rediscount.

The redeposit and the rediscount business are the only two basic services a reserve bank can render its member banks. In fact, they are the only two services that a member bank can render its individual customers.

they are the only two services that a member bank can render its individual customers.

The principal purpose of a Federal reserve system, so far as service to the public is concerned, is to make a more efficient use of credit supply, and thereby to reduce the interest rate. If a reserve system does not accomplish this purpose, but, on the other hand, actually maintains higher interest rates for the public while collecting a vast credit surplus at low interest rates to be used for speculation, it is a menace to the general welfare and should be drastically amended or abolished entirely.

It is plain, I think, that interest is not paid on Federal reserve redeposits for the very reason that it would then be necessary to invest funds to earn this interest, which in turn would release other funds and increase the credit supply until the general interest rate was materially lowered. Lower interest rates certainly would benefit farmers, workers, manufacturers, and everyone engaged in legitimate industry; but lower interest rates might reduce bank earnings, and it should be clear by this time that the Federal reserve system is being operated for the benefit of bankers and stock speculators and not for the benefit of the American public.

The farmers and workers—in fact, all of the common people of this country—never again will enjoy a fair share of our national prosperity until they organize their own cooperative banking system under their own control. We are the only civilized country in the world that by law prohibits such a cooperative system.

prosperity until they organize their own cooperative banking system under their own control. We are the only civilized country in the world that by law prohibits such a cooperative system.

The farmers deposit far more money in the commercial-banking system than is ever loaned back to the farmers. Labor deposits many times more than is ever loaned back to labor. Farmers and workers would benefit by a cooperative banking system, but under the law commercial banks have a monopoly.

Iowa recently authorized cooperative banks, but no provision was made for a central reserve bank. Nebraska, too, has authorized them in general terms, but they are not properly defined by the law. Several other States have credit union laws, but they do not contemplate a great cooperative system; and this means that any banks that might be organized would become mere feeders for the commercial system.

The laws should be amended to permit the establishment of a national system of cooperative banks. I am now drafting measures for legislation to this end. In addition to this legislation much must be done to remove the existing evils of the Federal reserve system. I have introduced a series of bills to accomplish this purpose. One would prohibit any bank from making a speculative loan in the same terms that the law prohibits the Federal reserve banks from rediscounting such a loan. Why should a speculative loan be outlawed in the reserve bank for rediscount and at the same time legalized as an original loan by the member bank? It should be called upon to furnish a banking system to sustain an institution of stock gamblers.

should be called upon to furnish a banking system to sustain an institution of stock gamblers.

Another bill would prohibit one ordinary bank from paying another ordinary bank for redeposits and turn this item of reserve-bank business into the reserve banks. It would require the another ordinary bank for redeposits and turn this item of reserve-bank business into the reserve banks. It would require the reserve bank to pay 2 per cent interest. This would increase the volume of reserve-bank business very greatly. On this increased volume it would never need to charge over 3 per cent on rediscounts and, perhaps, could make a profit at even a lower rate; so this bill fixes the rediscount rate by law at 3 per cent, and takes away from the Federal Reserve Board the power of affecting prices and business by raising and lowering the discount rate. That is a power too great to be intrusted to any board.

The Congress of the United States is the only board representing all the people that should exercise such power. The right to do so is as old as the English law. It is simply fixing a usury rate and that has always been done. If the rediscount rate is fixed at 3 per cent the ordinary bank can lend to farmers, laborers, and ordinary business at 5 per cent; and this bill has fixed the general usury rates for loans of that character at 5 per cent. This gives the people the advantage of lowering the general interest rate by efficient use of surplus funds in a reserve banking system.

These provisions have been criticized by the statement that they would drive all the business into the State banks. I have anticipated that argument, and have offered another bill to require the State banks to comply with the same rules or be denied the use of the United States mails and the privileges of interstate commerce. This would put all the banks under the same regime.

Unless something of the kind is done we are now headed for the of the United States mails and the privileges of interstate commerce. This would put all the banks under the same regime.

Unless something of the kind is done we are now headed for the greatest panic in the history of the world.

The recent action of the Federal Reserve Board, while in the right direction, is powerless to actually stop this fabulous bubble of stock inflation. Perhaps it has gone too far already to be stopped by anything but a panic. In conclusion I want to ask: Shall the Congress of the United States remain an impotent onlooker in this ruthless destruction of the prosperity of the great masses of our people? masses of our people?

THE POLITICAL PARADE "-ARTICLE BY COL. EDWIN A. HALSEY

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for incorporation in the RECORD a very interesting article, entitled "Here Comes the Political Parade," by Col. Edwin A. Halsey.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sunday Star, Washington, D. C., March 27, 1932]

"HOLD YOUR HOSSES!-HERE COMES THE POLITICAL PARADE!"-DELE-GATES HAVE POLISHED THEIR HIGH SILK HATS, BRASS BANDS WILL BLARE, ORATORS WILL SHOUT, AND THE BIG SHOW IS ABOUT READY TO BEGIN—JUST 100 YEARS SINCE THE FIRST AMERICAN PARTY CONVENTIONS WERE HELD—SOME HIGHLIGHTS OF GATHERINGS OF THE DELEGATES

By Edwin A. Halsey, sergeant at arms of Democratic National Committee

"The convention will come to order. The sergeant at arms will direct the delegates to take their seats and clear the aisles of guests. The chaplain will offer prayer." These words, spoken by the chairman of the respective national committees of the two great parties—Democratic and Republican—swing into action the presidential-nominating conventions of 1932. Thus assembled this year these conventions commemorate exactly 100 years of political conventions of the two dominant parties. It is a coincidence that after a century of conventions the national conventions of both after a century of conventions the national conventions of both parties of 1932 are meeting in the same city, and, as in 1832, they convene in the same building. Both national conventions of 1832 were held in the Athenæum, Baltimore. Both conventions will be held this year in the stadium, with a seating capacity of 25,000, in Chicago—the Republicans holding their convention June 14 and the Democrats June 27. So the next President of the United States will be named in Chicago. The conventions will sit about three or four days.

Each convention will have 1,154 delegates representing the States and Territories. The Territories represented will be Alaska, District of Columbia, Hawaii, Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, Canal Zone, and Virgin Isles. The delegates are apportioned to the States by the Democrats according to the size of the State congressional delegation, only the number of the delegates is twice that of the State congressional delegations. The delegates in 1928 were 1,089 for the Republicans and an even 1,100 for the Democrats. Two-thirds of the Democratic delegation is required to nominate, while the Republicans require only a majority.

In the Democratic ranks there has been a general agreement that there will be no repetition of the New York convention proceedings so far as length of time is concerned. The intention is to expedite the proceedings, and the general impression is, there will be a nomination in a comparatively brief time.

That conventions can be swayed by oratory was proven by the

That conventions can be swayed by oratory was proven by the two outstanding incidents surrounding the nominations of Garfield and Bryan. Garfield attended the convention of 1880 in Chicago as a delegate, and it was through his speech, nominating John Sherman, that he was himself nominated. William Jennings Bryan, while a delegate to the convention in Chicago in 1896, and as a newspaper man representing the Omaha World-Herald, owned as a newspaper man representing the Omaha World-Herald, owned by Gilbert M. Hitchcock, afterward Senator from that State, won the nomination by his "cross of gold and crown of thorns" speech. Senator Joe T. Robinson of Arkansas was permanent chairman of the Houston Convention in 1928, and his speech as chairman brought him before the convention and unquestionably influenced the Houston delegates in naming him for Vice President.

Representative Edgar Howard of Nebraska, who was private secretary to William Jennings Bryan, related the following incident, which followed immediately after Bryan concluded his famous speech in the convention of 1896:

"The crowd was in a very hilarious mood. Everybody who could speech in the convention of 1896:

"The crowd was in a very hilarious mood. Everybody who could find something to swing in the air would do so, making as much of a demonstration as he could. Men and women alike would wave their hats, coats, whatever they could get hold of. To illustrate how demonstrative the crowd really was, there was one man in particular, a very unusually dignified and reserved person, a man last among men who would loose from his tongue a questionable expression in the presence of a lady. He was standing against, and with one arm around, one of the wooden supports of the convention hall, waving his black alpaca coat and shoutling 'Hurrah for Bryan.' Near him was a magnificently gowned woman who had taken off her hat and stuck her parasol through it, waving them in the air. 'You must be from Nebraska, too,' remarked this lady. To which the man replied, 'You can bet your breeches I am, madam.'"

The scene Representative Howard describes is somewhat typical

The scene Representative Howard describes is somewhat typical of conventions after a nominating speech, but Bryan's speech thrilled his crowd more than usual.

That one might become confused while addressing a convention proven by the following, from the Kansas City Journal of July

"In conclusion, in announcing his intention of supporting the Democratic Party and its ticket, Mr. Davis said with great em-phasis: 'I stand upon this platform and shall support William J.

"It was a curious and laughable confusion of syllables of Bryan's name, but the crowd knew what he meant and cheered

The Mr. Davis referred to was Webster Davis, who had been invited to address the convention. Another account said Mr. Davis's concluding words were "William Brennings Jyan."

no way allay the enthusiasm, but may add to it, and pandemonium will reign as usual as favorite candidates are placed in nomination.

Nominating speeches are immediately followed by the test of strength of the advocates of the particular candidate to make a demonstration to prove that their man is the outstanding one of the convention. It is no secret that managers of these demonstrations have had in mind the length of others and have deliberately carried on the demonstrations regardless of how tired their advocates may have become or how worn the delegate particles.

active carried on the demonstrations regardless of how tired their advocates may have become or how worn the delegates participating, the big idea being to carry their demonstration longer than the one previous or longer than the one candidate which they are trying to outrival in making a demonstration.

In the old times the question of reaching the entire audience in the hall by voice and keeping the large assemblage entertained in the matters of the convention was a hard matter. Usually not more than one-fourth of the occurents of the hall heard the more than one-fourth of the occupants of the hall heard the proceedings. Because of the desire to be able to take care of enormous crowds, the committee gave little thought or consideration to the acoustics or carrying power of a man's voice. At the Chicago convention in 1912 the manager of the hall improvised a Chicago convention in 1912 the manager of the hall improvised a 4-sided sounding board which came down to a point directly above the position of the presiding officer, so that the speaker's voice resounded through a much greater part of the hall. This was noticeable by the quiet, as in previous conventions the large part of the audience that was unable to follow the proceedings provided their own amusement, and the hum and buzz of conversation at times interfered with the proceedings. In 1920 a number of young engineers were brought into the Republican convention hall and studied the situation, and their contribution was in the form of eight large horns, made of wood, about 10 feet in length, a disk connected with them being placed directly in front of the speaker. The night preceding the convention the hall was thrown open for visitors and a concert provided with the aid of a small phonograph. This system of amplification made the music audible in every section of the hall and proved quite an assistance in expediting the work. To-day not only those an assistance in expediting the work. To-day not only those within the four walls of the convention hall are able to follow the proceedings but millions of citizens seated in their homes, far more comfortable than those within the direct vision of the speaker, can closely follow the convention through the instrumentality of radio.

Chicago has been host to a greater number of conventions than any other city, harily contentioned 16 metaborations than any other city, having entertained 16 major conventions since 1860. Baltimore ranks next, having had within its borders 13 major conventions, Democratic and Republican. St. Louis comes third, having had 5; Philadelphia fourth, with 4. Other cities having had more than one convention are Cincinnati, Cleveland, Kansas City, and New York. Cities having had only one are Denver, Harrisburg, Houston, Minneapolis, and San Francisco.

Champ Clark was the only man who ever received a majority of the votes of the delegates and yet was not nominated, as he could not get the two-thirds vote required. Two men nominated by connot get the two-thirds vote required. Two men nominated by conventions who have received the majority of the popular votes in the United States have failed to become President in that particular election. Cleveland, in 1688, although receiving a larger vote than Harrison, was defeated for the Presidency, as Harrison received the larger number of electoral votes. The same is true of Tilden when he was defeated by Hayes in 1876, although Hayes in the actual counting of the electoral votes received only one more than Tilden. This discrepancy between popular and electoral votes is accounted for by the fact that in many instances in the Southern States the Democratic vote would be 4 to 1 to that of the Republican vote, thus bringing up the total Democratic vote in these two particular instances to a number greater than the Republican vote in the whole Nation.

Thirteen of the Presidents of the United States have been named on the first ballot.

on the first ballot.

Although there was no national convention, the first presidential election occurred January 7, 1789. The constitutional provision that the House of Representatives should elect, if there has been no choice made by the people, as in the case of the election of 1800, gave the election by the House to Thomas Jefferson over Aaron Burr. The nearest approach to conventions was the secret party caucus of the olden days, and the first of these secret caucuses was held February 25, 1804, in Washington. Both Democrats and Republicans in that year held their caucus in the same city, and it was in Washington that Thomas Jefferson was renominated. Nominations for Vice President have been declined and the first declination was by John Langdon of New Hampshire in 1812. He had been nominated by the Republicans. Senator Thomas J. Walsh of Montana, chairman of the 1924 Democratic Convention.

Walsh of Montana, chairman of the 1924 Democratic Convention, held in New York City, put aside the nomination for the Vice Presidency by declaring the convention in recess.

The two-thirds rule adopted by the Democratic Convention of May 21, 1832, has been in vogue ever since. It was at this conven-tion that Andrew Jackson was nominated. The first national committee was organized in the election of 1848 by the Democratic Convention of that year.

While we now have magnificent colliseums and auditoriums for our conventions, such has not always been the case. After the The heat in the convention halls in the past has been one of the main drawbacks in holding conventions in midsummer. Prostrations have been numerous. It is so arranged now that much of the discomfort will be a relic of the past, as the stadium in Chicago has a cooling system much the same as is used in motion-picture theaters. The delegates will be able to work in comfort and naturally will be more composed. This cooling system will in the Whigs, in 1848, used the Chinese Museum in Philadelphia. The next unusual place was in 1860, when the Republicans held their convention in Chicago in a wigwam erected especially for that occasion. It was in this wigwam that Abraham Lincoln first was nominated. A theater was the scene of the Republican Convention in 1864 in Baltimore, while the Democrats met in 1872 in was nominated. A theater was the scene of the Republican Convention in 1864 in Baltimore, while the Democrats met in 1872 in Ford's Opera House.

All conceivable ideas are used to get into a convention hall. One of the strangest was used in Houston. Everyone knows that a death message is always delivered as promptly as possible, regardless of circumstances. A friend of a Texas ranger, to be sure that the message reached him, wired this ranger, who was on duty in the convention hall, that there had been a death. The ranger immediately went to a telephone and called the sender of the telegram, only to find that it was a ruse for the sender of the telegram to ask the ranger for a ticket to get him into the hall.

The presence of Texas Rangers in the Houston hall probably did a great deal to keep order among the guests, as the rangers have a great reputation of being effective in time of disturbances.

The platform of the convention is, as some have said, "something to get in on and not to stand upon." The platform, in fact, is the outline of party principles, or the promises it intends to carry out should it come into power. It is an address to the American people, and it summarizes in very carefully selected words the deficiencies of the enemy, but praises the virtues of their own party to the extreme.

The writing of a platform in a convention sometimes is such a stubborn matter that it holds a convention in session longer than the nomination of the candidates. Probably one of the most outstanding platforms ever formulated was that promulgated by the stubborn matter that it holds a convention in session longer than the nominations of the candidates. Probably one of the most outstanding platforms ever formulated was that promulgated by the Republicans in the campaign of 1868, which nominated General Grant. Though President Johnson was still in office, the convention platform said in part, "We profoundly deplore the untimely and tragic death of Abraham Lincoln," which was very natural and a very commendable statement, but then the platform went on to say, "We regret the ascension to the Presidency of Andrew Johnson." The platform went on further to take the President to task for things he had done and things he had failed to do. And judging from the castigation by this platform, Johnson's administration must have indeed been "a tragic era." Thus we have the strange spectacle of a party in power denouncing its own President.

The two conventions in Chicago will be marked in contrast possibly by attendance. The conclusions of the Republican Convention, as it is seen at this time, are somewhat foreclosed. That President Hoover and Vice President Curtis will be renominated seems definite and certain, and the convention proceedings will be in the form of a ratification meeting. The Democratic Convention promises to be the most colorful ever held.

There are always many events planned to interest delegates while they are in a convention city. Probably one of the most original was at the Democratic Convention in Denver in 1908. There the delegates were privileged to indulge in a snowball fight when the thermometer was hitting around 104 or 105 in the shade. Snow was brought in from the mountain tops adjacent to Denver in carloads and dumped on the grounds adjacent to the convention bell tion hall.

During the Republican Convention in Chicago in 1908, the day the nomination of the candidate for President was to be made the jam in the building was such that the fire marshal took charge and ordered that no one be admitted. This applied to delegates as well as press, and when the fire marshal gives an order it is law. This meant that those inside could not leave for lunch with any assurance of being able to get back in. This, of course, was a boon to the proprietor of the lunch room within the building. Not anticipating such a sudden inrush, he had not made any par-Not anticipating such a studen intusit, he had not made any particular preparation and his main stock was loganierry juice, coffee, and strawberry pie. This lunch room was a long, corridorlike, unfinished place with a counter about 50 feet long. As there was little choice, one was compelled to take just what was handed him, and the supply of forks and paper plates was totally inadequate.

Another instance where the convention city desired to entertain its guests to the utmost was at the Democratic convention in San its guests to the utmost was at the Democratic convention in San Francisco in 1920, the first national convention to be held on the Pacific coast. California, noted for its hospitality, on this occasion determined to go the limit, and on the second day crates of oranges were brought into the press section and everyone invited to partake generously. The unhappy part was that in preparing the orange treat no care was shown in disposing of the peels, with the result that the center aisle was soon a mass of peelings. The the result that the center aisle was soon a mass of peelings. The following day several hundred crates of fresh apricots were brought to the hall, but the orange experience prompted those in charge to leave the fruit in a corridor just outside the hall.

Preposterous as it may seem now, the Taft managers in 1912 were distinctly disturbed by rumors that former President Roosevelt would literally stampede the convention by riding in one of the hall's street entrances on horseback. Roosevelt was in Chicago at the time and there was such intense feeling over the State delection; context as to which should be seated Roosevelt or Taft. gation's contest as to which should be seated, Roosevelt or Taft delegates, that the convention officials were apprehensive and placed an additional force of police in the hall to prevent any actual fighting over the contest or to combat the Rough Rider and It all seems absurd now, but the report was taken his followers.

At the conventions there are always well-known characters. They travel hundreds of miles, and some of them make it a profitable journey by selling photographs of themselves and otherwise extracting coins from visitors and delegates. One-eyed Connolly was one of the characters at Houston who appealed to me for a job, but when I told him that if he were to be given work his notable achievement of "crashing the gate" at every important gathering would be impaired and minimize his publicity as a "gate crasher," he remarked that "even so, I have to eat."

The original telegraph report was a mere skeleton of the routine of the convention, completely devoid of the "human interest" element, as the newspaper phrase goes. To-day not only is every of the convention, completely devoid of the "human interest" element, as the newspaper phrase goes. To-day not only is every word uttered in the convention given a place in the news reports of the press associations but from the pens and typewriters of hundreds of special correspondents—including the "sob sisters"—hundreds of thousands of words flow steadily over the wires directly to the desks of the telegraph editor at home. Special arrangements are always made for the radio "mikes" and special privileges are given to the movie and "still" cameramen.

Each convention has its dramatic moment which stands out

Each convention has its dramatic moment which stands out. Most frequently it is when certain candidates are placed in nomination, but in the 1904 Democratic convention at St. Louis, which nominated Alton B. Parker, it was Judge Parker's telegram to the convention after he had been nominated that caused great consternation. His message came in the early morning after an all-night session and stated that he regarded the gold standard as firmly and irrevocably established. This statement came with startling surprise, for the platform had eliminated all reference to monetary standards, which had prevented a big clash in the convention. After a hurried meeting of the resolutions com-mittee of which Sepator John W. Daniel of Virginia was chatrmittee, of which Senator John W. Daniel, of Virginia, was chairman, the convention voted to send to Judge Parker a telegram saying that while the platform was silent, there was nothing in his views expressed in his telegram which would preclude a man his views expressed in his telegram which would preclude a man entertaining such views from accepting a nomination on that convention's platform.

The incident, as thought by many, might vacate the proceedings and conclusions of the convention, but the telegram drafted by the resolutions committee saved the day. It was probably one of the most startling pieces of information that had ever been received by a convention when Chairman Sheehan, who was managing Judge Parker's campaign, announced receipt of the telegram. I do not recall anything else that I have witnessed at a gram. I do not recall anything else that I have witnessed at a convention that created such consternation as the Parker telegram. At every convention some one unusual feature stands out. As an illustration, the "24 votes for Underwood" was one of the main features of the New York convention. One of the most amusing incidents of any convention of recent years was occasioned by Governor Hanley, of Indiana, who nominated Mr. Fairbanks at the Republican convention in Chicago in 1908. Governor Hanley had a way of emphasizing his remarks by clapping his hands together each time he stated a point. The crowd being his hands together each time he stated a point. The crowd being in a somewhat hilarious mood, more to be entertained than to be serious, started clapping hands in unison each time he did. This brought on great laughter, much to the discomfort of Governor Hanley, and he appealed to the presiding officer for order. Needless to say the chair was helpless.

The convention is flooded by povelties on certain occasions.

The convention is flooded by novelties on certain occasions. In New York Miss Anna Case opened the session by singing The Star-Spangled Banner, and while she was singing there were released from the ceiling thousands of miniature American flags, which floated down to the audience. In Houston, where the resiwhich hoated down to the audience. In Houston, where the residents are very proud of their gardenias, these flowers were tied to tiny baloons and released among the audience. Again, when Jesse Jones was mentioned for President, his advocates released thousands of tiny balloons with Mr. Jone's name and picture on them. The expression "the standard bearer," so frequently used as referring to the nominee of the political conventions, is an expression which no doubt is an outgrowth of the presidential convention.

Each State delegation sits on the convention floor under vention. Each State delegation sits on the convention floor under a standard with the State's name inscribed, so that they can be easily located and identified. It is this standard, when carried, which indicates how the State delegates will probably vote after a candidate has been placed in nomination. The standard is usually lifted from its resting place on the floor and borne around in jubilation, indicating that that State which is inscribed upon the standard is solidly back of the man placed in nomination.

One of the funniest and at the same time serious incidents One of the funniest and at the same time serious incidents occurred at one of the ante bellum conventions. It is related that a temporary occupant of the chair at that time was considerably annoyed by a delegate who insisted upon being heard. The session had gone far into the night, and the temporary occupant of the chair was a delegate who had probably been indulging very liberally in stimulant to keep him going under the strain. In hammering for order and trying to get the unruly delegate to take his seat he wielded the gavel, uttering the words, "Sit down!" He lost his balance, and the gavel flew over and hit one of the clerks standing directly in front of the chairman. "Time out" had to be taken to bring the clerk back to consciousness. Odd banners are frequently carried during the performances of the delegates after their candidate has been placed in nomination. One of the funniest was at the Republican convention of 1908.

One of the funniest was at the Republican convention of 1908, when the Texas delegation appeared with a pair of trousers of enormous size, made of alpaca, a product of Texas, hoisted high in the air, upon which was written, "As pants the hart for cooling streams, so Texas pants for Taft."

The keynoter of the campaign, the temporary chairman of the convention, should, to fulfill the accepted requirements for the job, "be an Adonis in appearance, silver-tongued in voice, deliver a masterpiece of diction, embodying the acme of achievement and promise; sound phrases that are pleasing to the extremes, praise party performances, defend party delinquencies, denounce the enemy, thrill the radio audience, and actually, all in all, execute a performance par excellence "—truly a superman's job.

It is a large order to get such a man. The hunt is on and no doubt before the steam rollers of the conventions start to move a man to meet the festicious requirements of the conventions will man to meet the fastidious requirements of the conventions will have been found.

The subcommittees of the national committees which make the selection of the keynoter and choose the permanent chairmen of the conventions have many problems to settle before a selection is made. Whether the keynoter shall be wet or dry, from the East or West, and what candidate he might favor, will give the subcommittees concern.

James D. Preston, who for thirty-odd years was superintendent of the press gallery in Washington, and who supervised the press galleries at the conventions of both parties, will not attend in that capacity this year, but will go to the Democratic convention, at least, as an assistant sergeant at arms.

THE FEDERAL CITY

Mr. FESS. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the book on the Federal City which was submitted by the secretary of the Fine Arts Commission, and prepared under the Joint Committee on Printing of the Senate and the House under the direction of the clerk, has been completed. It has 402 illustrations; it is the finest thing up to date that has been produced on the subject, I think, and I know Senators will all be glad to know that it is finished and that they will receive copies in due time.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

SAMUEL L. GROSS

Mr. HASTINGS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Samuel L. Gross, of Texas, to be United States marshal, northern district of Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask that that nomination be immediately confirmed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

ADDITIONAL EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. AUSTIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Cooper Hudspeth, of Arkansas, to be United States marshal, western district of Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Charles E. Winter, of Wyoming, to be attorney general of Porto Rico.

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Col. Louis Meredith Nuttman, Infantry, to be brigadier general, vice Brig. Gen. Campbell King, to be appointed major general May 1, 1932, and also the nominations of sundry other officers in the Regular Army.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of post-

Mr. SCHALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Joseph Fritsch, jr., of New York, to be United States marshal, western district of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. HASTINGS. If it is in order, I desire to move a reconsideration of the action of the Senate on the 23d instant, rejecting the nomination of Charles A. Jonas to be district attorney for the western district of North Carolina.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, did I understand correctly the Senator to move for immediate consideration?

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Delaware enters a motion for a reconsideration.

Mr. HASTINGS. I merely desire to ask that the motion be entered.

Mr. HARRISON. There will be no desire to try to prolong this matter, will there, may I ask the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will say that, if the Senate will agree to the motion, I will be prepared to-morrow to go on with it. I should like to be heard upon the subject, for the reason that I think all the facts were not laid before the Senate. I was unavoidably absent at the time the nomination was considered, and had expected to address the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it. Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the Senator from Delaware voted in favor of the confirmation of Mr. Jonas?

Mr. HASTINGS. There was no record vote.
The VICE PRESIDENT. There was no record vote, and a motion to reconsider may be entered by any Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. If there was no record vote, my parliamentary inquiry is of no avail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

TREATTES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is in order. The legislative clerk proceeded to read Executive KK (70th Cong., 2d sess.) and Executive A (72d Cong., 1st sess.).
Mr. MOSES. I ask that the treaties may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaties will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles A. Sandburg to be postmaster at Jamestown, N. Y.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask that the nomination of the postmaster at Jamestown, N. Y., be held over and not acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be passed

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Frank L. Lee to be postmaster at Campbell, Ohio.

Mr. ODDIE. I move that that nomination be confirmed. The objection of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Bulkley] has been withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Robert P. Joyce to be secretary in the Diplomatic Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Robert Alexander Marshall to be junior hydrographic and geodetic engineer (with the relative rank of lieutenant, junior grade, in the Navy).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Hubert Alexander Paton to be hydrographic and geodetic engineer (with relative rank of lieutenant in the Navy).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made. This completes the calendar.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 29, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 28, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon. The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Bestow upon us, O Lord, our God, that enduement of light and grace which are necessary to lift into the largest and noblest life; allow not courage and conviction to succumb to weakness. O Spirit of Might, inspire us to unyieldthe right. Lead us into the fullness of that which is wisest and best. Through these laboring, waiting hours make all minds considerate and patient. Wilt Thou grant to those who are bearing heavy burdens that require constant thought and endeavor relief from weariness, and may they have an alliance with Thee that gives strength and vision. Our Heavenly Father, may we all bend ourselves to our tasks, and thus while helping others we shall find ourselves illuminated and blest. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 26, 1932, was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House. A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-five Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF DRAINAGE AND IRRIGATION DISTRICTS

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under clause 4, Rule XXVII, I move that the Committee on Rules be discharged from further consideration of House Resolution 117. which is a proposed rule for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4650.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of a resolution, House Resolution 117, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk reported the title of the House resolution.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Hall] is entitled to 10 minutes; the gentleman from North Carolina 10 minutes.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina if it is his intention to yield me a part of the time?

Mr. POU. One-half of the time to which I am entitled, which is five minutes, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman gives me the full five minutes?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing].

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, obviously it is impossible to discuss the merits of the bill which will be the subject matter before the House if the Committee on Rules is discharged. Obviously, it was not intended, under the rule under which we are now operating, that the merits should at this time be discussed. What I shall present to you will be not the merits but the reasons for giving the Committee on Irrigaing devotion to the right as Thou, O God, giveth us to see I tion and Reclamation an opportunity to present the merits,

The situation before the House to-day is not the usual one which we think of when we think of the discharge rule. This is not a case of discharging a committee which has before it the consideration of an important bill, against the consent of the committee, probably without hearings by the committee, frequently without consideration of the bill by the committee. On the contrary, this bill has been thoroughly considered. Full hearings have been held. The bill has been studied, it has been perfected, and it has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. It not only has been reported unanimously by the committee at this session of Congress, when a majority of the committee were Democrats, but last session a similar bill had exhaustive hearings, was thoroughly studied, and was unanimously reported by the committee, when a majority of its members were Republicans. The committee feels that this legislation, while it was desirable last session, because of conditions which now exist in the districts affected by the bill, is absolutely necessary this year. In fact, the committee feels that this is the most important, the most vital, and the most urgent piece of legislation that it has had either at this session of Congress or at the last session of Congress. What the committee asks is that it be accorded its day in court; that it be accorded an opportunity to present to you the clear and convincing evidence which was presented to the committee, and which convinced the entire committee of the importance and of the necessity for this legislation.

The safeguards in this bill for the Public Treasury have been most carefully worked out so that there will not be one single dollar lost to the Public Treasury by the operation of this bill, because of the provision for reappraisal of the lands within the district to be affected by it, and by compulsory reduction of the outstanding debts against the Entire communities totaling investments a hundred times the amount involved in this bill are in danger of being wiped out unless financial relief is afforded these districts. They must function if the communities are to continue to exist. In drainage districts worn-out pumping machinery must be replaced; in levee districts, the levees must be rebuilt and strengthened; in irrigation districts the canals must be repaired, and if these things are not done the community is faced with destruction. Many of these districts can not borrow a dollar to do this absolutely necessary work. Ten per cent of the districts are actually in default. Their default in turn has destroyed the credit of the remaining districts. If the districts fail to function, the communities dependent upon them will soon cease to exist.

Only a little while ago Congress voted $2,000,000,000 for loans to restore and stabilize the credit of private corporations to save business from ruin. That was proper enough. But business can always be restored if the community is preserved. If the community is destroyed, business is gone forever. Therefore we should be willing to act to-day to save these communities from ruin by voting $100,000,000 to restore and stabilize the credit of these districts. Let it not be said that we favored billions for private corporations but not one dollar for public corporations, that we favored billions for business but not one cent for the people. I sincerely hope that this motion will prevail and that the bill will be passed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five minutes. Mr. Speaker, I hope my judgment on the merits of this bill has not been warped by my sincere opposition to this method of legislating. I am fundamentally opposed to this method of bringing legislation onto the floor of this House [applause), but I am now trying to overlook that objection and state as briefly as I can, in three or four minutes, the opposition which many of us share to the bill itself.

In the first place, this is a Treasury drainage bill instead of a bill for the relief of farmers. [Applause.] It author-to give the committee its opportunity to have its day in | izes an appropriation of $100,000,000, and at the most inopportune time such a suggestion could ever be made to the American Congress. [Applause.] It promises more than that. There are certain solvent drainage districts in the country which, if this bill is passed, would immediately take steps to make themselves insolvent in order that they might come within the provisions of the bill or secure additional legislation. In that event it would be necessary to appropriate $391,000,000 to take care of all drainage districts.

> This matter has been before our Committee on Rules at least twice. We have had hearings on it. We have gone into it thoroughly. I say to you, gentlemen, this is not the opportune time to consider this matter even on its merits. I certainly hope the House will vote down this motion to discharge the Rules Committee and reassure the country of its sanity.

> Obviously I can not go into details nor dwell at length upon the merits of the bill, but I do want to leave this thought with you: If this is a bill for the relief of farmers, it would only relieve a handful of them, and we ought to do something for all of the farmers of the Nation rather than for a specific group. I am not sure it is actually a bill calculated to relieve any appreciable number of farmers. My honest judgment is that this is a bondholders' relief bill rather than a bill for the relief of those who live in the drainage districts. [Applause.] All of the propaganda that has come to me has come from those who own bonds. I feel sorry for them. I should like to see them have some relief. But, gentlemen, until we can take some steps in this House to reduce expenditures, to balance our Budget, and, most important of all, find the money with which to pay for the things we want, it is no time to give even them consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. How is the time divided?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes on a side.

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. I have five minutes in rejoinder, have I not?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has five minutes remaining, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Pou] has five minutes.

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. The gentleman from North Carolina is supposed to consume his entire 10 minutes, and then I have five minutes in which to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to close the dehate.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to my colleague from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, this is the most far-reaching, the most dangerous, and the most vicious measure that will probably come before this House in a long time to come. [Applause.] If we discharge this committee to-day, we might as well open the floodgates and allow every half-baked bill, every unsafe piece of legislation, and every "ism" to descend upon us for consideration.

This is purely a bondholders' bill. [Applause.] It is for the purpose of having bonds come to par that have been hawked about this country for 15 and 20 cents on the dollar. It was conceived by the bondholders and fostered and nourished by the high-priced and powerful lobby now adorning these galleries. [Applause.]

They call it a farmers' measure. There is not one dollar's worth of relief to any farmer in the Nation. I know something about drainage districts. The largest pumping plant on the face of the earth is in my district, and we have a great many other smaller districts there. Not a single farmer-and the farmers have studied this bill ever since it was presented-has ever asked me to support it. But, on the other hand, as the gentleman from Indiana has said, every single bond attorney and every man who might own some of these bonds has come here and lobbied for it.

I hope the House will kill this unwise measure by voting it down right now! [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield my remaining minute to the gentleman from North Carolina, if he cares to

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, up to this moment this Congress has appropriated between $2,000,000,000 and $3,000,000,000 without raising one single dollar of revenue.

As has been said, this is a proposal to take care of $391,000,000 of irrigation and reclamation bonds. There is no more justification, Mr. Speaker, for taking care of that many irrigation bonds than there is to take care of the same number of mortgages in the city of New York or in the city of Philadelphia or the same number of mortgages throughout any other section of the United States. [Applause.] Many millions of farmers in this Nation can not even pay interest charges; why make those living on irrigation projects a preferred class?

Gentlemen, for God's sake, it is time to call a halt. The members of the Committee on Rules in the exercise of our conscientious legislative duty as we saw it have not seen fit to give preferential status to this measure. I am willing to stand until doomsday to keep off the floor of this House all measures except those which are absolutely necessary to run the Government. [Applause.] If you wish to discharge the Rules Committee, that is your province. I shall endeavor to discharge my duty as God gives me light to see, regardless of the effect on my political fortunes.

This same measure was before the last Congress, as was stated, but no action was taken. Now the same pressure is brought to bear in favor of it by the same lobby.

As has been said, this is not a farm-relief measure. It is nothing in the world but a bondholders' bill.

Let us address ourselves to two great objectives. First, economy. Reduce our own salaries not less than 20 per cent, as I believe we should. [Applause.] Reduce expenditures of Government. Save a couple of hundred million dollars in that way, and then let us address ourselves to the still greater task of raising sufficient money to balance the Budget. [Applause.]

There are times, Mr. Speaker, when men in this body must take their political lives in their hands. You may call me a fool. You may call me a rascal, but for God's sake I do not want you to call me a demagogue. [Applause.] Until I can see more clearly ahead than I do now, regardless of what the consequences may be, I shall do all in my power to keep off of the floor of the House all measures except those which I believe are absolutely necessary to maintain and sustain this Government. If you run over us, the consequences are yours. [Applause.]

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER].

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. Swing] has expressed to this House the attitude of the advocates of this bill, and that is to plead for a hearing. I do not care what type of legislation is offered here; if it is backed by a very considerable number of the membership of this House it is entitled to consideration. I have never yet been able to step into the corridors of this House without finding some fellow on his hind legs with his ears laid back braying, "A bond bill!"

Let me tell you the type of bill we have here. There was a petition filed with the names of 213 of the Members of this House before the Rules Committee asking for a hearing on the merits of this bill, and when that number of our colleagues express an interest in the legislation the cry of a bond bill is not a sufficient answer.

The gentleman from California [Mr. Swing] told you that community life is involved in this proposed legislation, and I want to emphasize the statement and offer the expression at this late hour of the session that there has been appropriated from two to three billion dollars for the private corporations is not a sufficient answer to our plea. I supported that measure. You have provided relief for every type of corporation, but not one dollar is provided for the distressed communities asking for relief under the provisions of this bill. Here is another thing I want to impress upon you. Not one dollar of Federal farm-loan money or jointstock land-bank money or money under any other provision made by the National Treasury can be applied to one acre of the land where this community life is going down. They have built towns and cities in these areas, and because 10 per cent of them are in default the other 90 per cent of them must lose their credit. This is the condition they are in to-day. If we can rehabilitate the 10 per cent in default, 90 per cent of all the districts that have been reclaimed will have their financial credit restored, and it will not be necessary to give them the aid sought in this bill. Can we do other than ask you to let us present the bill? If it is a bond bill, you will vote it down; but, gentlemen, when twothirds of the membership on this side of the House and one-third of the membership on the other side of the House petition for a hearing on this legislation, are you satisfied when it is charged that it is a bond bill and foreclose an opportunity to present the legislation?

As a matter of fairness, I appeal to you to give us an opportunity to present the matter to you.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the Committee on Rules be discharged from further consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 117).

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 133, nays 204, answered "present" 2, not voting 93, as follows:

THE REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, Congress has been in session four months. The whole of this time has been devoted to consideration and action upon President Hoover's program to relieve present distressing conditions in the country. In other words, we have been seeking, and are seeking still, to correct the mistakes and cure the ills brought upon the American people by ill-advised legislation, gross extravagances, criminal waste, and an utter disregard of the rights of the people.

Those responsible for our present economic situation blame it upon world conditions. There is a connection, which is reflected in the loss to this country of export business amounting to more than $1,000,000,000; the loss of import duties, amounting to hundreds of millions; removal of American industrial plants to foreign countries to escape payment of retaliatory tariff rates, with disastrous effects also upon American labor; the loss of world markets to the American manufacturer and American farmer and the loss of prestige as a world power, to say nothing of moratoriums and other things.

To be added to these losses is $1,000,000,000 per annum in moneys appropriated by the Federal and separate State Governments to enforce nation-wide prohibition; the loss of another billion and more each year in revenues that a tax upon intoxicating liquors would yield. All of this could be very easily remedied and conform to the will of the people.

It is little wonder, with these great losses and wastes, we are seeking new methods of taxation to care for existing deficits. Our present deplorable situation could have been averted by sanity in legislation, economy in Government, stoppage of criminal waste, the abolition of existing commissions and boards, as I stated a moment ago. For the most part they serve the interests they are expected to regulate and curb. Deficits reach such a tremendous total that the sales tax was proposed as a means of adding six or seven hundred million dollars to our revenues. I opposed this tax. I believed it to be wrong in principle, and anything that is wrong in principle is wrong in practice. It would have imposed a tax upon the millions who are now seeking to secure enough to provide their families with the necessities of life. That statement justifies my attitude, so that neither explanation nor apology is necessary from me or any other Member of the House who took a similar position.

Much of the suffering the people are now enduring could | have been averted had President Hoover called a special session of Congress two years ago to meet the situation that then existed. Many such demands were made, but the President was adamant in his determination not to do so. Conditions continued to grow worse.

A survey of the unemployment situation made in connection with the taking of the Federal census of 1930-Government figures—indicated that the number of people then idle was 2,500,000. Recently, William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, in protesting the passage of the sales tax, placed the number at 8,000,000. Multiply that number by four and you get some definite idea as to the amount of suffering there is in this country at this time. This increase of 5,500,000 in the army of the unemployed makes our task all the more difficult now in finding a solution. In other words, we have three times as many dependents, with deficits more than doubled.

Our chief trouble in this country lies in the fact that we have departed from the fundamental principles of government. We no longer have representative government. Equal rights, equal opportunity, and even human rights have been brushed aside. Instead of a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, we have a bureaucracy, with multiplied commissions and boards, which are absolutely useless. More than that, Congress has delegated to these commissions and boards executive, legislative, and judicial authority, which, in my opinion, is a violation of the Con-

The functions of government are simple. And what are these functions? To promote the general welfare, safeguard and protect the rights of all the people, regardless of sex, color, or creed-and sadly neglected; to provide a national defense, which is now threatened by the agitation in favor of disarmament; the right to levy taxes and import duties is the only provision in the Constitution that anyone appears to have any recollection of at this time; to regulate commerce and trade, a function of government that is of little importance at this time; preservation of the rights reserved to the States and preservation of the rights guaranteed the individual citizen. All of these have been violated constantly, with the exception of the right to impose taxes upon the people. It is now being abused, and has been for years. However, nations must pay their debts the same as individuals if they would preserve their credit.

Where the money is to come from to meet the Government's overdue obligations is yet to be worked out. However, a solution will be found, and the greater burden will be imposed upon the extremely wealthy. An additional tax levied upon the millionaires and billionaires of the country, taken in connection with the favors granted in tariff legislation, will not impose a heavier tax upon them than they should pay in justice to those who pay a greater tax in proportion to their wealth and ability to pay.

Now I want to revert for a moment to government by bureaus, commissions, and boards. What are their functions? I can not undertake to enumerate them here now. The time is too short. However, I assume that they were intended to serve some good purpose, but the opposite appears to be largely true.

The Federal Farm Board will serve as a fair illustration. There is a very general sentiment in favor of its abolishment because of its failure. It was intended, of course, to benefit the farmer, but where is he to-day? Flat upon his back, looking upward and patiently awaiting the transition from the world of constant turmoil to one of perpetual joy.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is another. It is supposed to run the railroads, with most of the rolling stock on the sidings, and in poor condition at that. Officials of American railways who represent the stockholders have little or nothing to say as to their management. The Tariff Commission is the real joke in the deck of 52 or more commissions, and so forth. It deals with the flexible plan in the Hawley-Smoot tariff law, which authorizes it to increase or lower rates. Few are lowered, although most appeals ask for reductions. There is, too, the Federal Oil Conservation | ready in cultivation. The aim is to prevent the loss of Commission, which, I presume, came along after the Teapot Dome scandal.

The Radio Commission is another. Radio broadcasting is becoming the greatest monopoly we have in this country, and will soon surpass in influence and power the United States Steel Trust and other great trusts of the country. The Federal Power Commission, the United States Shipping Board, Bureau of Mediation, the Bureau of Efficiency, and others deserve attention, but time will not permit. Take the Bureau of Efficiency, for instance—what is it doing? Is there any noticeable improvement in efficiency in government anywhere? The instances cited, with a word of comment in each case, seem to me pertinent, and should suffice to prove my contention that these bureaus, commissions, and boards are more ornamental than useful and for that reason should be abolished as a matter of added efficiency and the saving of the $1,000,000,000 they are now costing the Government.

President Hoover, who has created several commissions of his own, including the Wickersham Commission, has finally reached the conclusion that the duties of these various commissions and bureaus are overlapping, and that as a matter of economy they should be consolidated, if not eliminated. He wants to do this himself, which is purely a legislative function, with Congress disinclined at this time to grant him that authority.

In conclusion I just want to add a word: Unless we get away from these orgies of criminal extravagance and waste and get back to the rule of the people, the country, with all its boasted wealth of approximately $400,000,000,000, will go on the rocks. The Government, with all this great wealth, four hundred billions—think of it—is having difficulty in raising $3,000,000,000. In other words, the Government appears to be in the same unfortunate position as the man in business, perfectly solvent with assets largely exceeding liabilities, who is unable to borrow a few dollars upon good security to tide him over. That situation has existed for the past two or three years, and still exists to-day, with millions of dollars released to the banks to improve conditions. There has been no perceptible improvement up to date. How will the Hoover relief program work out? That remains yet to be seen. How long it will take it to filter down from the banks and other financial institutions to benefit the ordinary man on the street and the man on the farm is a question which time alone will answer.

Everyone who is interested in the welfare of the country is anxious to see results that will put the country upon a solid financial footing and give us a prosperity that will

LOANS FOR RELIEF OF DRAINAGE DISTRICTS

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I advocate Federal aid for drainage districts. The act under consideration, known as H. R. 4650, provides for loans to drainage and irrigation districts as an aid to agriculture. An annual appropriation is authorized and the Secretary of Interior is charged with the administration of the revolving fund created. Loans are made for a period not exceeding 40 years at a low rate of interest, after thorough investigation by the Secretary of the Interior, to take up outstanding bonds. Safeguards with respect to titles, soundness of engineering works and reasonable probability of repayment by the districts aided are provided in the bill. In a word, the real purpose of the bill is to extend to drainage districts the equivalent of the Federal aid now extended to reclamation districts.

As disclosed by the hearings, thousands of farmers in drainage districts will be forced to abandon their homes unless relief from burdensome drainage taxes and assessments is provided.

The act is a plan for refinancing distressed districts on a long-term basis. The plan is to save productive lands alhomesteads because of the inability of farmers to pay heavy annual taxes for public works installed by authority of law, by refinancing drainage works, and thereby reducing the annual tax levied against the lands. The measure thus provides for the reduction of farm taxes and makes it possible for the farmer to pay his taxes and save his home. It is really a farm relief measure through Federal tax relief.

FEDERAL INTEREST

The Federal Government adopted the reclamation policy in 1902 to promote the reclamation of arid lands in the West. From every standpoint there is just as good reason and just as much authority of law for Federal aid in drainage as there is for Federal aid in reclamation. The Federal interest in one case is as vital and valid as in the other. As a matter of fact, both reclamation and drainage are parts of the internal policy of the General Government. Drainage in other parts of the country is synonymous with irrigation in the arid States. Moreover, it is interesting to recall that drainage is in reality an essential part of irrigation. In reclamation irrigation canals and drainage ditches are both necessary. Reclamation involves the application of water to lands to make them capable of cultivation; drainage means the taking of water from lands so that they may be cultivated.

BENEFITS

Drainage promotes the distribution of production; it provides for the distribution of population; it creates national wealth; it aids transportation; it supplies markets for factories; it makes business for the city and provides for employment on the farms. Country life will be promoted by the pending legislation.

AUTHORITY

There is ample constitutional authority for this legislation. Congress legislates for the general welfare, Among other things it promotes the public health. Drainage, in addition to reclaiming fertile valleys, eliminates malaria in many cases; it thus promotes the public health. Drainage promotes the general welfare.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides for the levy of taxes for the general welfare. Congress has the power to appropriate money for any purpose which in its judgment is for the general welfare. It is for Congress to determine the legislation in the public interest.

The difference between the constitutional power to appropriate and the constitutional power to regulate and control must be kept in mind. The power to legislate for aid to drainage districts, just as the power to legislate in aid of reclamation, is not specifically given to Congress. Article I, section 8, clause 18, authorizes Congress to collect taxes, provide for the general welfare, and to make "all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." If the end be legitimate, if it be within the scope of the Constitution, all means that are appropriate and that are plainly adapted to that end, that are not prohibited, are constitutional. Congress has entered into many fields under the necessary and proper provision of the Constitution. It has aided in the construction of transcontinental railways; it has provided for the preservation of battlefields. Necessity has revealed the power, and the Congress is authorized to utilize all legitimate means for the general welfare.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

The continued drainage of areas that are already reclaimed, rather than enlarging and extending cultivated areas, is desirable in aid of agriculture. It will be far more economical to aid existing drainage districts to provide for their indebtedness over long periods than it would be to assist and encourage in the development of new districts. Agriculture will be better promoted by aiding in the drainage of lands already under cultivation than by the continued utilization of less fertile lands more suitable for growing timber. Diversification will be encouraged. A balanced agriculture will be fostered. The passage of drainage legislation will constitute an important step in practical farm relief.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill and to include a letter written by W. H. Dick, president of the National Drainage Association, dated March 10, 1932, to many constituents in my State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, I will not object to the gentleman's own remarks, but I will object to anything except that.

Mr. BURTNESS. I think the letter will be useful to Members of the House in showing to them the type of propaganda that has been sent out and giving more light on the lobby that comes to Washington.

Mr. DYER. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to insert their own remarks in the Record on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to insert their own remarks in the RECORD. Is there any objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, it is distinctly understood that they are to be the Member's own remarks. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi so stated, and the Chair incorporated it in the statement of the gentleman's motion.

There was no objection.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I desire to address myself to H. R. 4650, which provides for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation, and similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects. I shall discuss the question from the standpoint of my State and its interest therein growing out of the proposed relief for drainage and levee districts. I am more familiar with conditions as they exist in southeast Missouri, in my congressional district, but the conditions which exist there no doubt reflect in a great measure the conditions which exist in similar communities throughout the Nation.

In southeast Missouri, which is strictly a farming section, the problem of drainage and reclamation is looked upon as a community matter. All the people, regardless of their occupation or profession, are dependent either directly or indirectly upon agriculture. In the State of Missouri there are approximately two and one-half million acres of drained land, approximately two million of which are located in the eight alluvial counties of southeast Missouri and are in the district which I have the honor to represent.

Thirty years ago, practically all of this territory was an almost impenetrable swamp subject to annual overflows from the Mississippi River and tributary streams and creeks that drained the waters from the uplands. The only industry that was carried on, and that in a small way, was the timber industry.

Courageous and determined people from Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, and Indiana, and even from States still farther east came into southeast Missouri to establish their homes. Small settlements developed throughout the dismal swamps. Malaria, chills, and fever depleted their ranks. The stagnant waters that covered the greater portion of the territory and the floods from the streams were to be combated. Determined to relieve the conditions that confronted them, the first drainage district in southeast Missouri was organized and the ditch dug in 1903. Since that time the number of drainage districts in that territory has increased to 112, ranging in size from 1,000 acres to 547,000 acres. In developing this program, the aggregate length of the ditches that have been dug exceeds in length the Amazon or the Nile, and required the removal of more dirt than was excavated in the construction of the Panama Canal.

In this program of development between 1903 and July 1, 1927, we incurred a bonded indebtedness of $54,536,142.19. Of that amount through the thrift, energy, and industry to that date we had paid $23,081,530.56, leaving at that time a balance due of $31,454,611.63. On this enormous indebtedness up to November 15, 1925, there was a default of only $70,000, or approximately one-third of 1 per cent of the bonds and coupons that matured. Since 1903 in addition to this program of reclamation the people of that great territory have expended approximately $80,000,000 in clearing. fencing, developing, and improving the land that they drained. Practically every community in these eight alluvial counties is penetrated by hard-surface roads; splendid schoolhouses have been erected in every school district; consolidated high schools have been built in every town of any size and in many of the rural sections; churches of every denomination have been constructed; in fact, as a result of the thrift, industry, ambition, and courage of the people of southeast Missouri, that territory has been converted from an uninhabitable swamp into one of the most fertile and productive agricultural communities in the United States; but the droughts came; the great flood of 1927 stopped our progress, destroyed much of our wealth, and left us in distress. Following the disastrous flood of 1927 the depression, which is nation-wide, came upon us. Prices of farm commodities struck the lowest level in the history of the country. Farmers are no longer able to meet their payments in these drainage and levee districts; no markets for their products; and without money with which to pay installments, the ominous sound of the hammer on the auction block is heard through this territory, and, as the farm is stricken off to the highest bidder, another family joins the army of the unemployed.

The relief provided in the pending bill is the only relief that can save us. We are not asking for a gift or a dole, we are not beggars. We have too much courage and self-respect for that. We are only asking for a loan, we are only asking equal opportunity with other industry, we are only asking that you treat us as you have treated the railroads, we are only asking that you give us the same consideration that you have given to the national bankers, that we be accorded the same treatment that has been accorded the insurance companies, we are only asking that you manifest as much interest in the farmers of this country as you have shown to the people of foreign countries. You have accorded relief to all the groups to whom I have referred, but you have snubbed the American farmer.

Agriculture is our basic industry, it is the industry upon which every other activity of the Nation, either business or social, depends, and I assert without hesitation that unless something is done to rehabilitate agriculture and save the farmer by whose sweat and toil you are being fed, we will not emerge from the depression in which we are found until there is a collapse of our whole industrial and economic system.

Talk about communism, radicalism, and bolshevism! I contend that you can not relieve the country of that condition by throwing open the Treasury of the United States to big business in all its forms and denying even a word of sympathy to that great group of people who feed and clothe the world. I warn you to-day that the people of this country who are in distress in the workshop or upon the farm—I should say in the bread line or upon the farm—will not long remain silent; not because they are communists, not because they are radicals, not because they are bolshevists, but because they have a right to demand and ought to demand equal and exact justice.

This bill would give relief to 5,000,000 people upon the farm. Five million patriotic and loyal people. Five million people who are losing their homes day by day, and who have exhausted every source of protection and relief at their command, and now turn to their Government that they have so loyally and so faithfully served with a last appeal, not for a dole, not for a gift, but merely for a loan to tide them over the abysmal depths of the so-called depression.

You say the Treasury is empty and that you have to balance the Budget, but the gentleman who speaks of that closed his eyes to the Treasury and to the Budget and supported the moratorium. You closed your eyes to these things when you voted for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. You turn a deaf ear to the farmers who are in distress and plead for the protection of the Treasury and balancing the Budget; but when big business appeals to you, you prick up your ears like a Missouri mule, kick down the doors to the Treasury, and invite the privileged few to participate in the Nation's cash.

I am impatient with this policy. To my way of thinking it is indefensible. The gentlemen who oppose the consideration of this bill speak of it as a bondholder's bill. I charge that such a statement is unwarranted and unauthorized. It is an insult to the integrity, the honesty, and the honor of the committees in the Senate and the House who on four different occasions, almost unanimously, reported the bill. Men who are just as honest, just as patriotic, and just as loyal to their country and their country's flag as the gentleman who has suggested that this is a bondholder's bill. This bill was reported after exhaustive hearings and after thoroughly considering every provision of the bill. The farmers who are back of this legislation have asked that every amendment necessary to protect the Government be accepted. The farmers are opposed to Treasury raids and ask that the Treasury be protected, but what did these gentlemen who call it a bondholder's bill do when legislation for the relief of big business was being considered? One of the distinguished gentlemen from North Carolina stood on the floor when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was being considered and pleaded with crocodile tears in his eyes, but to-day he stabbed the farmer in the back. You never hear anything about lobbying when legislation in behalf of special interests is being considered, but it is a crime when some one undertakes to voice the wishes of the farmers of this country.

Ill fares the land, to hast'ning ills a prey, Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

Julian Friant, of Cape Girardeau, Mo., very forcefully and eloquently presented the case before the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee in 1930, when he referred to the dedication by President Coolidge of the San Carlos irrigation project, which is to reclaim 80,000 acres in the Florence-Casa Grande Valley of Arizona at a cost of $5,500,000.

"Standing on the parapet of the huge dam which impounds the waters of the Gila River, and which has been named for him, President Coolidge dedicated the project, 'To the advancement of religion, education, better homes, and a better country.'"

President Coolidge was speaking of land which was being supplied with water at a cost of $70 per acre.

We are pleading for land which has been drained at an average cost of less than $10 per acre.

President Coolidge had a vision of development that is to take place on land reclaimed from a stubborn but healthy desert.

We are trying to protect a development that has taken place on land reclaimed from a treacherous and sickly swamp.

President Coolidge was thinking of happy homes yet to be built, and we are appealing for once happy homes about to be lost.

All, however, are part and parcel of our great American Nation which is interested in all of its citizens.

We, therefore, appeal to you to treat us as you have treated others, do for drainage and levee districts what you have done for irrigation districts, and without any risk or cost to the Government, give us an opportunity to save our homes."

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, to consume the time of this House at this time with a lengthy discussion of the distress of the American farmer would be fruitless—not fruitless because the case of the American farmer lacks merit but because his distress is so apparent, so real, and affects so vitally the welfare of the Nation that none but one who has willfully closed his eyes through prejudice, ignorance, or a reckless disregard for what the future may bring forth can fail to perceive it. Menaced on one hand by the destruction of his markets both in this country and abroad, and on the other by the sheriff's sale unless something can be done to remedy the position of this great group of our citizens upon whose relief and upon whose prosperity the relief and prosperity of the Nation depend, we can hardly hope to see the end of this economic crisis. Much has been said and many have been the proposals made to alleviate his distressed condition, but what is needed at the present time is concrete action rather than empty promises.

In the Glenn-Smith drainage bill now before the House for consideration is embodied a concrete plan to aid and assist a portion of our farmers by lifting from their shoulders a burden which is causing them to lose their homes, and to further augment the increasing army of the unemployed. This bill is designed to permit the Federal Government to take over the obligations of certain drainage districts, after a careful investigation and appraisal by the Secretary of the Interior assures him that the value of the farm lands behind the obligations of the various drainage districts is sufficient to protect the Federal Government against loss, and after granting a 5-year moratorium upon interest payments, to receive back the amount loaned with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum within a period of not more than 40 years. Now, bear in mind that this bill is not a bondholders' bill, designed to protect a few investors from an unfortunate undertaking. Any loan is to be made only after the appraisal made by the Secretary of the Interior has shown that the value of the security back of the obligation is adequate to protect the obligation. The Government itself is to evaluate the security and then decide to what an extent a loan will be made. If the outstanding indebtedness is greater than the Government's own estimate or appraisal of the land back of the indebtedness, then no loan can be made under the terms of this bill to the drainage

All that can be done is for the drainage district to compromise with the bondholders for an amount coming within the appraisal value set by the Government and then apply for a loan to retire the bonds at their compromised value. The drainage district will then pay back to the Government the sum borrowed with 3 per cent per annum interest. In addition to the fact that the Government is protected under the terms of this bill by having the right to make its own appraisal of the value of the land back of the bonds, it is further safeguarded by the fact that before any loan can be made the Secretary of the Interior must be satisfied that legal authority exists for and ample provision has been made for the annual taxation of the property which secures the lien of the Government for its loan. Further, the Secretary of the Interior is to determine the maturity of the loan made by the Government, and the taxes upon the property benefited must, at the end of 10 years, be sufficient to establish a sinking fund which will retire the obligation at the date of its maturity. The Government is in no sense taking over a loan made by private investors-it is itself determining the amount it will loan upon its own estimate of what the security is worth, it is itself setting the maturity of the loan, and it is receiving in the Treasury the amounts put in the sinking fund to retire the various loans. The Government is loaning money under the same terms and having the same means of considering the advisability of its making a loan as a private lender. And at the same time the Government is rendering a service to a class whose position to-day is more unfortunate and intolerable than that of any other-a class whom the Federal Government has heretofore either been unable or unwilling to assist in any really effective way.

A great many Members of this House recently voted for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, providing for the ultimate withdrawal from the Public Treasury of $2,000,-000,000. This measure, it is claimed by those supporting it, was to assist the large banking, business, and railway interests of the country. I do not believe that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill will bring any great relief to the country from its present business depression. I believe that time will prove that that legislation will add to the already great deficiency in the Public Treasury without any adequate return for the public benefit. For this and other reasons which I deemed adequate I could not and did not support that measure. I could not see my way clear to open up the Public Treasury for the expenditure of $2,000,000,000 more when that Treasury is already depleted and now has a deficiency of about $2,000,000,000, and especially as I can not believe it would bring adequate public benefit. I regret that to-day the rule of discharge was defeated, depriving thereby the House of Representatives from immediately considering and voting upon the Glenn-Smith bill. This legislation should be passed and passed promptly.

Thousands of farmers in these drainage districts along the Mississippi, the Missouri, and other rivers of the country are finding it difficult to meet their taxes, interest, and assessments against these farms on account of present low prices of farm products and livestock, although no more valuable land lies anywhere in this world. If prosperity is to return in this country, it must begin its return among the farmers of the country and work its way upward; it will not work down from the top.

Give the farmer a fair chance to hold his home and a world market to receive the products of his farm, and his purchasing power will be restored; unemployment will then begin its disappearance. The world markets have been largely destroyed by reason of special-privilege legislation which has been set against the farmer; when this barrier is removed the farmer will not ask any legislation in his own behalf but he will not be satisfied with any National or State administration that denies to him and his family an equal opportunity before the law.

The Glenn-Smith bill, if enacted into law as it should be. will enable the farmer to secure money at 3 per cent interest with which to retire his indebtedness within the drainage district as I have already explained: that is no lower rate than the Government has extended in other instances. The Glenn-Smith bill, if made a law, will save the homes of thousands of farmers, without loss to the Government, and surely it is as important to save to the industrious, hardworking farmer his home as it is for the Government to make available $2,000,000,000 to sustain the frozen assets of the railroads or financial institutions. Again let me repeat, prosperity will not return in this country until conditions become such that the industrious farmer can prevent his farm from being sold at the courthouse door and until he can receive a fair price for what he produces on his farm. It is not too late to pass this bill, and if passed, it will be a piece of constructive and valuable farm relief.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation has been considering this measure, of which I am the sponsor, for five years. In the Seventieth Congress our committee conducted extensive hearings on a similar bill, H. R. 14116, and in the last Congress we continued hearings on H. R. 11718, both of which I introduced. We also conducted hearings on the pending bill, which should convince the House that we have not gone into this matter hastily. We have endeavored to secure the best information regarding conditions in the various sections of the country from those who are best posted regarding the necessity of the legislation, in order that we may come to the House with a case prepared as nearly 100 per cent as possible.

The House is now considering the discharge of the Committee on Rules from the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 117. Upon the adoption of this motion the House will then, under the rule, proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 4650—

To provide for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation and/or similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects, or to counties, boards of supervisors, and/or other political subdivisions and legal entities, and for other purposes.

PRECEDENTS FOR LEGISLATION OF THIS CHARACTER

This legislation is along the line of the enactments by Congress during the last few years with the hope of stabilizing the basic industry of agriculture. When we appeared before the Rules Committee at the last session of Congress questions from the members indicated that they thought we were making a new departure, that we were going into a new field. That was not true at that time, and it certainly is not true at the present time, for since we appeared before the committee at the last session of Congress there has been enacted legislation providing for enlarging the activities of the Federal Farm Loan Board to relieve farmers who are unable to meet their obligations and giving the board authority to extend existing loans, rather than to require them to come in and make a new loan. We also recently enacted legislation providing for a Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which extends relief to banks, trust companies, insurance companies, railroads, and various organizations of different kinds. There is also a provision to relieve depositors in insolvent banks, and also a bill is being considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency providing for home-building organizations, which would probably cost $100 000 000.

There is nothing local or partisan in this legislation, nor in similar legislation which has been considered, especially during this session of Congress. Every Member of Congress, regardless of his political affiliations, realizes that the country is in such a condition of depression, so many people are out of work, and so many organizations and financial institutions are failing that it is necessary for us to throw aside partisanship and legislate for the best interests of the country. We feel that this legislation fills a gap that is not taken care of in any of the bills to which I have made reference. We have had a law for some years providing for the making of loans to farmers, through the Federal Farm Loan Board, by means of Federal land banks, and that law is being liberalized now to the extent of putting $125,000,000 of the Government's money into these banks, to be loaned to farmers, and the law has also been liberalized in regard to the extension of loans. So that those classes of people are taken care of. They have security. But the farmers that are to be taken care of in this legislation do not have an opportunity to borrow money from the Federal land banks or from any other governmental agency, because the Government requires that any advances made against such property shall be a first lien on the property, and these lands are all encumbered by bond issues, which were made necessary in order to secure money to put the land in a condition so that it can be cultivated.

CHARACTER OF LAND TO BE BENEFITED

With reference to the character of lands to be benefited: Swamp lands are useless unless they are drained, as are arid lands unless supplied with water. We have also in this bill a provision for the relief of private irrigation districts. Those lands are useless unless water is placed upon them. So it is necessary, before the farmers go upon the swamp areas or upon the arid lands, to obligate themselves to spend a considerable amount of money to put the land in condition so that it can be farmed. It is quite different from the prairie lands which were settled 40, 50, and 60 years ago where the lands were ready for the plow. Even in the forest sections of the country the settlers could utilize the lumber for buildings, fencing, and so forth, in a way that would bring some income. But these lands in the arid and swamp districts require the farmers to assume large financial obligations in order to put the land in condition to be farmed.

Most of these drainage and reclamation projects were inaugurated 10 or 15 years ago at a time when farming was more profitable than it is at the present time. Many people sold their farms in the Mississippi Valley and went into the arid West and into the swamp country thinking that they would be able to farm more profitably; but because of the expense incurred in preparing the land for cultivation and also because of the low prices of farm products, these people who have spent years in their efforts to reclaim this land and cultivate it and build their homes are now confronted with this great debt which is hanging over them. They have, through their efforts, created communities and towns; they have built their houses and have developed their land; but now they are confronted with the necessity of paying these assessments and their interest on the bonds and, in some instances, paying the bonds themselves in order to make progress. This bill simply provides that the Federal Government shall step into the picture and relieve these farmers—probably 500,000 or possibly 1,000,000 of them. The census report states that there are about 5,000,000 people living on these swamp lands and on these irrigated lands.

URGENCY OF THE PENDING LEGISLATION

The following statement is from Mr. Julian N. Friant, of Cape Girardeau, Mo., a very prominent farmer and business man, and a man who has been engaged in civic work in his own locality and elsewhere. He has furnished statistics with reference to the conditions in the State of Missouri, from which it appears that from 1910 to 1925 the percentage of delinquencies was very small, running sometimes less than 1 per cent; but in 1925 it was 5.1 per cent delinquency on these drainage districts, of which there are over 100 in this particular locality. In 1926 the percentage of delinquency was 15 per cent; in 1927 it was 32 per cent; in 1928 it was 53 per cent; and in 1929, the last year for which figures were available, it was 79 per cent. I quote from his statement as follows:

Our newspapers are full of advertisements of tax suits and foreclosures. Hundreds of farmers have lost their homes and others are being closed out every month. If that process goes on much longer, most of the farmers on our drained lands will be sold out and will lose the homes they have worked so hard, so long, and under such great difficulties and hard living conditions to build. The number of tax sales each year is sure to increase unless you come to our assistance. Some of our farmers are still able to pay their taxes and do the necessary improvements, but they are helpless because they are merely a part of a public enterprise and can not function as individuals.

These people are living in districts, and the district is responsible for the financial indebtedness, for the entire indebtedness.

In addition to being a crime against our civilization and a rank injustice to the thousands of people who have given their energy, their ability, their money, and the best part of their lives to developing this country, it would be a great economic waste to allow these districts to go back to swamps. We, however, are at the end of our row. We have exhausted our resources. We are helpless in the matter and are at your mercy. As the representatives of a great and wealthy Government, we do not believe you are going to permit our people, who have made such a marvelous record, pay such a terrible price for their progress.

I am reading this statement in an endeavor to enlighten the House as to the importance of this relief legislation.

I now refer to the testimony of Mr. J. A. Melville, chairman of the legislative committee of the Utah Association of Drainage Districts, from which I quote:

Drainage Districts, from which I quote:

In one district I represent, as an attorney, the district has now taken title to nearly 50 per cent of the lands in the district, because the farmers were unable to meet their obligations. Unless some relief is given these good people they will have to go. These have spent 10 or 15 years there building their homes and improving their farms. They are getting advanced in years. Farming is probably the only occupation they know. They can not go into industrial avocations and compete with those there, because they are not familiar with them; and, as I said, they are getting to be old men. One of our supervisors, approaching 70 years of age, had to take title to his own farm in the name of the district. It is really a pitiable condition. There are many people there waiting to see what is to be done, if anything. They have asked us, "Shall we plant crops this year, or shall we go?" We have hesitated about advising them, but we have told them to remain there, believing that some relief will come. Those who own the bonds secured by the land say, let them remain upon the land; but they can not remain there permanently because the bondholders are entitled to their money, or as much of it as they are willing to accept. We can not hope to keep those people permanently upon that land without some relief because these lands are security for the bondholders. Our bondholders have been very generous. They realize they face a loss; that their securities, like all other farm securities, have depreciated in value, and some of the bonds have been sold to farmers for 50 per cent of their face value. A few of the more prosperous farmers have used these to pay off their farms. If we had a fund from which these people could borrow, we could make a nice settlement with the bondholders; and it would not be an injustice to them, because their losses would be minimized if they could get a cash settlement.

CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY

The constitutional authority for this legislation is well set forth in the following statement before the committee by the distinguished Representative in Congress, Mr. Whittington, of Mississippi:

Congress legislates for the general welfare. It promotes the general health and good education. Drainage eliminates malaria in many cases. It promotes the general welfare. It aids agriculture. If the end be legitimate, if it be within the scope of the Constitution, all means that are appropriate and that are plainly adapted to that end that are not prohibited, are constitutional. Congress has provided for the preservation of battlefields; it has built railroads; it has aided transcontinental railroads. During the war it took over the entire transportation system of the country. Constitutional powers have kept pace with the new agencies brought into use by the increasing demands of commerce, wealth, and population. Reclamation, which is synonymous with drainage, is a part of the internal-improvement policy of the United States. It distributes production, it creates national wealth, it provides for transportation, it makes business for railroads, and it contributes to the health and wealth of the community and the Nation. Agriculture is the basic industry of the country; and the Nation, for its own well-being, must promote agriculture as a part of general policy for the public welfare. The Government of the United States must protect country life. The West is entitled to reclamation, but the North, East, and South are entitled to drainage. (From the testimony of Representative Whitringrow before House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, January 29, 1929.)

As the title of H. R. 4650 indicates, the legislation is for the

As the title of H. R. 4650 indicates, the legislation is for the relief of farmers in drainage and irrigation districts who, as a general rule, do not come within the provisions of the Federal farm loan act, and for whose benefit no relief legislation has been heretofore enacted.

The proposed law does not apply to the development of any new land but is intended to enable the farmers on various existing projects to have their assessments, which are in arrears, funded in order that they may continue to operate their lands until agricultural conditions are such as to enable them to maintain themselves and farm at a profit. As has been disclosed in the extensive hearings which have been held on this legislation, unless relief is afforded, there are thousands of farmers who will be forced to abandon their lands and have them taken over by the bondholders.

The districts are required to pay 3 per cent annually on the money advanced.

The relief proposed under this bill is to be in the form of loans adequately secured by first liens on the benefited farms, the repayment of which is further guaranteed by the fact that each loan is to have behind it the taxing power of the State. In a word, it is an extension of credit—a plan for refinancing distressed districts on a long-term basis.

NOT AID FOR INDIVIDUALS BUT FOR COMMUNITIES

It is not a plan to extend aid directly to individual farmers in their individual capacities, but it is a plan to aid farmers in their collective capacities where they have organized districts to install and maintain public works. It is the public works, the collective or community works authorized by and operated under authority of the law, that are to be relieved by this bill.

NO OPPORTUNITY FOR SPECULATION

There is no provision in this bill that would afford an opportunity for speculation either in the bonds of any district or in the lands covered by the bonds. The proposed law would prohibit the purchase of any bonds in excess of the appraised value thereof.

PRACTICAL RELIEF FOR UNEMPLOYMENT

When a farmer loses title to his land, one of two courses is left open to him. He can go to work as a hired hand for some other farmer if he can find one who will employ him, or he can go to the city to look for a job. In this connection Secretary Hyde, of the United States Department of Agriculture, writing in the Saturday Evening Post, has supplied some official figures concerning the drift of population from the farms to the city. He gives the Government estimates on the net loss in farming population through the drift to the cities, as follows: For the year 1922, 1,120,000 persons; for 1924, 679,000; for 1925, 901,000; for 1926, 1,020,-000; for 1927, 604,000; for 1928, 598,000. Thus we see that for a period of six years the average drift from the farms to the city has exceeded 800,000 a year, or a total of 4,912,000. Statistics collected and compiled from official sources show that several thousands of farmers have annually been sold out for drainage taxes while other thousands are facing the same fate. Dispossessed, these farmers are and will be forced into the ranks of the unemployed. To enact this bill into law not only would be to give much needed and substantial relief to worthy farmers engaged in the fundamental industry of agriculture but also would be to prevent in a considerable measure further increase in the number of unemployed.

REDUCTION OF FARM TAXES

It is a plan to save highly productive lands that already are under successful cultivation.

It is a plan to prevent the utter ruin of farmers owning and operating lands, who are losing their homesteads because of their inability to pay heavy annual taxes levied on their farms for the public works which have been installed by authority of law, by refinancing the public works on a long-term basis and thereby reducing the annual tax levied against the individual farmer.

The extent of relief which each individual farmer can obtain under this bill can be definitely and exactly computed from his tax receipt.

MAKING IT POSSIBLE FOR FARMER TO PAY

In order to readjust and more effectively distribute the burden of debt, districts created by authority of State law and having a definite status as political subdivisions, either as counties or special-tax districts, may refinance their public works—the public ditches, so to speak, that are supposed to be open and accessible to any farmer in the district who seeks an outlet for his own private ditches.

Under this plan districts which are unable to meet either the interest or the principal of their outstanding bonds may refinance their undertakings by the issuance of refunding bonds; such refunding bonds to be accepted by the United States Government as security for loans sufficient to retire as they mature outstanding bonds and the accumulated interest thereon.

ADVANTAGES TO FARMERS EXPLAINED

The advantages of this plan become evident when it is considered that the residents of these districts are pioneers who in response to the call of the Government in the first years of the World War undertook to do in a short period of time what heretofore had required a hundred years to accomplish. In a word, they issued drainage bonds to run 20 years to pay for permanent improvements, the benefits of which were to be enjoyed by all succeeding generations, when in the very nature of the case the expense of constructing these public works should have been spread over at least 50 or 75 years. The refunding of the debts will constitute an extension of time and will thereby reduce the annual tax for works to an amount so small as to be surely within the farmers' ability to pay.

IMPROVEMENT TAXES CONSTITUTE THE LARGER BURDEN

At present the improvement tax in many districts is more than half of all the taxes the farmer has to pay, more than school district, road and bridge, county, and State taxes combined. In a considerable number of districts this tax constitutes two-thirds of all taxes levied, and runs in many instances to an amount per acre equal to more than half the gross per acre earning of the land. From this it becomes apparent that the refunding of debts by means of long-term bonds will provide substantial and immediate relief to deserving farmers who are suffering sorely, but through no fault of their own.

IMPROVEMENT COSTS IN ADDITION TO TAXES

This form of relief becomes the more appropriate when it is borne in mind that the expense of providing public ditches or drainage works is only a part of the burden which the individual farmer must bear, but that in addition to this there is the cost of providing and maintaining tile and surface drainage on his own farm to enable him to make use of the public works. There is ample precedent for affording this form of relief to be found in the reclamation act of 1902 and in each of its several subsequent amendments.

FARM RELIEF THROUGH TAX RELIEF

This bill would extend relief to several millions of farmers who are overburdened by taxes by putting into operation a plan for refunding certain bonded indebtedness, which plan would automatically suspend for a period of five years the collection of taxes levied on farm property to meet the interest and principal on this bonded indebtedness.

The plan does not apply to all bonded indebtedness of farm communities, but it does apply to drainage and other districts where the districts have been unable to meet the interest or principal owing to the inability of the farmers resident in the district to pay their taxes. The suspension of taxes, which, of course, are local taxes, is brought about automatically by reason of deferred interest payments and extended time of payments on principal. In other words, under the provisions of this bill drainage and other districts in distress may refund their operations, may suspend the collection of taxes for a period of five years, and may extend the period for which the bonded indebtedness is to run to not exceeding 40 years, thereby making it possible to greatly lighten the burden on the farmers resident in the distressed district.

The plan is simple. Under section 1, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lend, out of a revolving fund which this bill creates, to any such district or legal entity an amount sufficient to redeem bonds and meet accrued interest under restrictions imposed by this bill and under regulations administered by the Secretary of the Interior.

It will be noted that under section 3 loans are not made to individual farmers, but that loans can be made only to districts which are political subdivisions and legal entities existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State where located. It will be noted that the same section also provides that no loan shall be made by the Secretary until, by examination of the engineering works of the district, he has satisfied himself that the drainage works are operating with reasonable success and are giving the lands designed to be benefited a reasonable degree of relief.

The Secretary is further required to make an appraisal of the value of the taxable property of each district applying for a loan, and he is to make no loan until he is satisfied that it can be and will be paid at maturity.

Section 3 also carries a safeguard against any speculation in outstanding bonds, by restricting the loan which may be made to any district to an amount which could be and would be paid at maturity, even though that amount may be much less than the face value of the outstanding bond which it is proposed to refund. In a word, the Secretary is not to lend an amount in excess of the actual value of the outstanding bonds.

Section 4 carries the necessary provisions for safeguarding the loan, such as the requirements for the setting up of the annual tax to provide an adequate sinking fund, and that said sinking fund must be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

Section 5 provides that these loans shall be made for a period of not exceeding 40 years, the exact period in each case to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior.

This same section provides that these loans shall bear interest at a rate of 3 per cent, payable annually.

Section 5 also provides (and this is one of the most important provisions as a relief measure) that during the first five years of the loan the interest shall accrue and be payable during the succeeding years of the loan in equal annual installments.

This section further provides that these loans shall be secured to the Government by the issuance and delivery to the Secretary of the Treasury by the applying district refunding bonds payable to the United States in the amount of the loan, and it shall appear on the face of each bond that it is a lien on the taxable property within the district securing the loan.

It is further provided, as a safeguard, that no district may issue additional bonds for any purpose without having first obtained the written consent of the Secretary of the Interior, so long as this indebtedness remains unpaid.

Section 7 limits the extent of this relief by creating a revolving fund and limiting the annual appropriations thereunder to $20,000,000, the total amount of the revolving fund so created being $100,000,000, to be appropriated at the rate of $20,000,000 a year for five years.

The appropriateness of this form of relief is found in the fact that local taxes are the greatest source of distress throughout the farming areas of every State in the Union, and in the further fact that the tax levied in these drainage and other similar districts is greater than all other local taxes. In many cases, it has been shown by testimony before our committee, the taxes for drainage and similar bonded indebtedness is greater than all State and local taxes combined. Therefore, to permit a refunding of these operations on a plan that would give the residents of these distressed districts a practical moratorium for five years on all taxes for drainage and similar purposes, and thereafter to provide for a low rate of interest and to provide further for a long-term extension of credit, would be to provide a very sane and effective relief.

That there is very great need for this relief has been shown to our committee by the testimony of scores of witnesses from some 25 or 30 States throughout the Union. The testimony shows that the farmers residing in these districts are in a sense victims of civilization. They have had forced upon them by circumstances over which they had no control, or, at least, little control, expensive improvements which, all combined, have made a burden they could not bear-a burden so large that to-day, the testimony before our committee shows, hundreds of thousands of deserving farmers are losing their homes and having their lands sold out from under them to pay their drainage taxes. They have to meet taxes for roads, which, in many instances, have been voted upon them by the residents of cities. Those who have agitated the rapid building of roads—and this includes the farmer himself—seldom have considered how much of a road tax the farmer could in comfort pay. The agitation for good roads, beginning with the part that the Federal Government has taken in it, the further part taken by State governments, and also the part that is taken by the chambers of commerce of cities, has constituted an irresistible propaganda that has given us the roads but also a great burden of taxes.

The same is true in the matter of schools. The agitation for larger and better country schools—the movement for the consolidated school district—has emanated, to a large extent, from the residents of the large cities, who have given little thought to, and who have had little knowledge of, the burden that a consolidated school district puts upon a struggling farmer. Roads and schools are a part of civilization. So is drainage. So is irrigation. But drainage is necessary in order to get the land to yield a living to its occupants. The same is true of irrigation. The living must precede everything else. The farmer could not escape drainage and irrigation. He might have taken his roads and his schools in smaller doses. If left to his own judgment, doubtless he would have done so; but both roads and schools were urged upon him by his neighbors and his fellow citizens and forced upon him by the collective action of all the citizens of his State. Drainage and irrigation were forced upon him by nature itself.

It has seemed to our committee that the relief of conditions like these is fundamental and would constitute an important step in practical farm relief.

Of course, not all farm taxes can be relieved, but under the plan provided in this bill the largest single item of local taxes can be so reduced as to make the burden light enough to be borne without distress.

The demand for relief for drainage districts comes from a farm population of approximately 5,000,000, which, according to the census of 1920, lives within these districts.

The average size of their holdings is about 65 acres. They have their all invested in their farms. In some districts, it has been shown to our committee, thousands of farmers have lost everything because of their inability to meet their drainage taxes. In some areas 60 per cent of the farm population has been dispossessed, their land having been taken for taxes.

The relief provided in this bill would be readily available and would help the conditions known to exist in considerable areas of 34 different States of the Union. Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for the passage of H. R. 4650 is so great that the proponents of this bill have filed the petition as provided by the rules of the House asking that the Rules Committee be discharged and that the bill be considered upon its merits. Therefore a discussion of the merits of the bill is proper before a vote is taken on the motion to discharge the committee.

The problem dealt with in this bill has been diligently studied by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation for the last few years. During this time the committee of the Seventieth and Seventy-first Congresses, as well as the present committee, conducted extensive hearings in an effort to determine whether there is a real need for this proposed legislation, and whether the need is national in its scope and a proper field for national legislation.

The hearings revealed that in at least 34 States of this Union progressive and patriotic citizens, largely in response to the demand of the Government for a greater production of food and other agricultural products during the World War, undertook upon their own initiative and responsibility the task of reclaiming from the swamp areas many millions of acres of land in the valleys of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. In the arid and semiarid States of the West great irrigation projects were launched by citizens prompted by the same patriotic desire to serve their country in time of need, and to add to the aggregate wealth of the country.

To accomplish these purposes it was necessary in all of the States that there be concerted action and, accordingly, the citizens of the various States proceeded under their own laws to organize improvement districts varying in size and area according to the location and the purposes to be served. Some are purely irrigation districts, some are drainage districts, some are levee districts, and some combine all of these activities. At the time most of these districts were organized agriculture, as was practically every other business, was enjoying prosperity, and agricultural products were selling at a price sufficiently above the cost of production to justify the landowners to undertake this additional expense of improvement. At that time it could not be foreseen that within a few years the price of agricultural products would drop to the unprecedented levels that exist to-day.

In the organization of these districts, and for the purpose of carrying out the improvements contemplated, it was necessary to issue bonds and other evidences of indebtedness in order to raise money. These bonds were issued, and their payment was guaranteed by a pledge of assessed benefits against the land within the district, or by a pledge of the taxing power of the district, so that there was placed behind these bonds the full value of the lands and the improvements thereon within the particular district, as well as the taxing power which in some States covered all property of every kind and character situated in the districts.

In most instances the work contemplated and executed by the districts accomplished the purpose intended and many millions of acres of land were reclaimed and added to the aggregate wealth of our country. Hardy and patriotic citizens founded their homes upon these lands and proceeded to develop the lands and build schools, churches, roads, and all other things necessary to contribute to the general welfare and prosperity of the States in which the districts are situated. In most cases the districts were functioning properly, and it was thought by all that these citizens had wrought well and had accomplished much, not only for their individual benefit but for the benefit of the Nation. The time came and has prevailed since 1926, with the unprecedented decline in values of agricultural products, until now many of these districts are in default, and these same citizens who had apparently planned so well and who had discharged a patriotic duty now face the prospect of losing their all. The obligations of these districts are first liens upon the property situated therein and must be discharged if this calamity to a considerable portion of the citizens of this country is to be avoided. There are more than 5,000,000 people residing in these districts and earning their living from these lands, but they have reached the parting of the ways. It is necessary now that relief be given these citizens or they will lose the homes they have established and be forced to seek employment elsewhere or to join the ever-increasing horde of unemployed. This is no imaginary menace to the well-being of this country. Foreclosures have been instituted and are now pending in a great many of these districts, and unless the National Government, through its power given by the Constitution, extends to them a helping hand economic ruin and disaster will inevitably follow.

It is known that people who have followed for a considerable number of years agricultural pursuits, when forced to abandon that vocation usually drift to the cities and in the course of years they and their families lose their status as producers of wealth and become consumers of wealth. Gentlemen may argue that we have an overproduction of agricultural products in this country now, but there is no such thing as a general overproduction of necessities. Production can only be measured by the desires of humankind, and no one in this country is satisfied with the things that he possesses. Better homes are in demand, better schools are needed, better roads are required, and in general a higher plane of living is sought by us all. These things can not be acquired if production is stopped or hampered, and from an economic standpoint this Nation can ill afford to fail to render to these people this relief.

Under the provisions of this bill this relief can be afforded. It is not a gift. It is not a contribution. It is merely an extension of credit. The Government does not stand to lose one penny by the extension of this credit. Under the terms of the bill the governing authorities of the districts are empowered under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the holders of these securities and reach an agreement with them as to the present value of the securities. When this has been determined, if the investigation of the Secretary of the Interior reveals that the public works of the district are properly functioning, and if there exists the economic value as agreed upon, then he is authorized to advance to the governing authorities of the district a sum of money sufficient to liquidate the outstanding indebtedness.

To secure the payment of the advance so made he takes back from the governing authorities of the district the undertaking or bonds of the district conditioned that the district will pay into the Treasury of the United States during a period of time not to exceed 40 years the money advanced to the district with interest at 3 per cent. Investigation reveals that the bondholders in many districts are willing to make material concessions and to accept in payment a sum much less than the face value of the bonds now against the districts. While it is not the desire of anyone that any investor shall lose money, the investor is facing one of two alternatives. He can either negotiate with the governing authorities of the districts, or they can resort to foreclosure and take the homes of these people, and either return these lands to the arid wastes or swamps from which they were reclaimed, or they may enter upon the farms and cultivate them en masse and thus destroy the little home owner and the little farm, and convert these immense areas into an agricultural country operated by a great corporation. Certainly no one desires that this condition shall be brought about, and it appears to me that this Congress would be derelict in its duty if it sits idly by and permits such to happen.

Gentlemen may argue that this is a bill designed for the relief of bondholders. It is not such a bill. It is true that the bondholders may and will derive benefits from it, but the bondholders have behind their bonds now the resources of these districts, and the conditions are such that the people residing in the districts can not pay the obligations, and in the last analysis this bill is primarily for the relief of the individual landowner.

Gentlemen may argue that this is class legislation and that to extend aid to the landowner in the district will be giving him an advantage over the landowner who lives outside the district, but such is not the case. These improvements, particularly in levee and drainage districts, are improvements that benefit in a measure the entire country and all of the adjoining lands, and the man on the outside of the district receives a benefit by having an outlet established for the drainage of his lands and still does not have to meet the special improvement taxes. Instead of being a discrimination it is a bill that will establish equality, because when you relieve these lands from this devouring burden of special-improvement taxes you place that particular landowner on the same plane as the adjoining landowner whose property is not mortgaged for the payment of these taxes.

The bill further provides that during the first five years after a district is given the relief that no special drainage. levee, or irrigation taxes shall be due, except such as may be sufficient to maintain and keep in operation the public works therein, thus giving in a measure a period of five years to these oppressed landowners in which to rehabilitate their farms and reconstruct farm improvements, and to free themselves of their other local indebtedness. No greater task confronts this Congress or this Government than that of extending to the American farmer the opportunity in which he may by his initiative and industry rehabilitate himself. Agriculture, if given an opportunity, will rehabilitate itself. We have enacted the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. We are extending to every financial institution in this land the benefit of the resources of the Government, and the time appears opportune to extend to these depressed farmers, these 5,000,000 people, the same manner of help and relief that we are extending to the financial structures of

The enactment of this bill will afford practical relief to the unemployment situation of our Nation. If we can, by the passage of this bill, prevent the addition of these millions to the unemployed of this country, we shall have rendered a great service. The direct benefit which the farmer will receive from this bill can be measured by his tax receipt. These improvement taxes to-day constitute by far the major portion of the taxes which the farmer is called upon to pay. Its passage will give to that farmer a ray of sunshine.

It will kindle anew in him a hope and spur him on to greater endeavor, and result finally in the saving to him and to his family the home that they have carved out of the wilderness or have established upon the arid wastes. At the same time it will restore to the local tax books, State and county, this property and give to the local government a source of revenue.

We have within the last few years heard much about farm relief. This bill constitutes and is the foundation for real farm relief to a substantial number of real dirt farmers. There is nothing hazy nor mysterious about it. It is practical. It is workable. It carries every safeguard against speculation. It provides a means whereby those whose homes have already been jeopardized and temporarily lost may redeem those homes and may recoup their life's work. In operation the bill is direct and the relief will be readily available.

There are 4,631,155 acres in drainage projects in Arkansas alone; 2,614,427 acres of this area are improved land, 4,435,-280 acres are sufficiently well drained to raise a crop, 609,211 acres fit for a partial crop, and only 586,664 acres unfit because of lack of drainage.

There are 2,940,035 acres in occupied farms and, in 1930, 2,425,632 acres were actually in planted crops.

There are 4,974 miles of ditches and an invested capital of $37,532,575.

There are 316 drainage districts in the State, with an average of 18,243 acres.

Thirty-two per cent is in arrears on payments of principal and interest, meaning that in 1930 there were 1,001,260 acres

Interior, in his book on Conservation, published in 1931, at page 13, says:

Irrigation from a Government standpoint is handled by the Reclamation Service, in the Department of the Interior, which is custodian of a revolving fund amounting on June 30, 1931, to $151,694. This fund is used for the development of irrigation projects in the West. The Reclamation Service develops these projects ects in the West. The Reciamation Service develops these projects and they afterwards return the money, which is put into new projects. There are 25 of these Federal irrigation projects, irrigating one and one-half million acres divided into 40,000 farms. The crop value on them in 1930 was $65,000,000, and they support a population of nearly half a million people. The fund was created in 1902, when much of the land to be reclaimed was Government land.

Further, on page 29, this same official says:

There are three units in the entire Colorado River project, the There are three units in the entire Colorado River project, the Hoover Dam, the power houses, and the All-American Canal—with a total authorization of $165,000,000. The canal will be 200 miles down the river, will cost $38,500,000, and will be big enough to float a ship drawing 20 feet of water. It will carry water to desert lands in southern California, replacing the present international ditch, and will be the biggest irrigation canal ever built. The money for all of this will be advanced by the Government. The cost of the dam, power plant, and appurtenant works will be repaid with interest from power sales, contracts for which are already signed. The cost of the All-American Canal will be repaid by the water users benefited.

Further, on page 154, the same official says:

Gradually, with the development of a more intelligent under-standing of the fundamental problems, we have acquired new conceptions of continental conservation. Conservation is a term around which much confusion has lain. Conservation means wise around which much confusion has fail. Conservation ineans who use. Wise use means that a natural asset shall be used for the proper purpose and at the right time. Conservation does not mean the hoarding of national resources for a hazy indefinite future. It does mean intelligent and thoughtful planning for every resource of our continent.

On page 164 of the same book the distinguished Secretary

We must distribute urban population over wider areas as rapidly

If, as a national policy, we must distribute urban population, would it not be wiser to take steps now to prevent the flow of rural population to the urban centers?

On page 173 he continues:

The public-land States include that vast arid portion of the country where farming is not possible without irrigation. Congress early recognized this essential difference from the rest of the country where settlement under the homestead laws brought about full agricultural development and enacted the desert land and Carey acts to supplement the homestead law. Under these private laws by private and community effort the essential agricultural development of the West received its first impetus. The limit of development of the West received its first impetus. The limit of development by private enterprise was reached when the low-water flow of the streams was all appropriated and it became necessary to provide storage of the floods to be held for use during the dry season. The high cost and long development period of these large projects made them prohibitive from the standpoint of comparatively short-term investments, and many well-intentioned efforts in this direction resulted in total loss of investment not only by the promoters but by thousands of settlers as well. This led to the enactment of the reclamation act, designed to make possible in the arid States the building up of farm population and production in fair proportion to steadily increasing urban population of those States based upon mining, lumbering, and, along the coast, shipping and industrial pursuits.

The bill under consideration does not apply to Federal reclamation projects but applies only to private enterprises, and because of the high cost of the development the people who have undertaken this work now face the possibility of their total investment being lost, and this applies to the farmers' homes as well as to the bondholders. Therefore, following the reasoning of the distinguished Secretary, it is now necessary, if this calamity is to be averted, that the Federal Government extend aid to these non-Federal projects.

Speaking further along the same lines, on page 175, he says:

delinquent.

Ninety-eight per cent were organized between 1905 and 1925; 2 per cent have been organized since.

The average cost of maintenance and operation in 1929 was 4 cents per acre.

Our Government has already undertaken work of a very similar nature. Hon. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the perous communities on the public domain. The irrigation of the arid and semiarid portion of the West is assuming proportions of increasing significance as knowledge and experience enlarge the useful field of our first endeavors and reveal the multiplicity of problems involved in the development and protection of every project. Drainage, colonization, flood control, erosion, power, and kindred subjects have in fact, or should become, major pieces in the mosaic which is now the Reclamation Service.

On page 178, in speaking of the work and recommendations of the committee appointed by the President, he says:

Much has been accomplished toward flood control by projects already constructed primarily for irrigation, and the Hoover Dam project will reach the apex of achievement for the arid West in that respect. But the far-reaching benefits of each successful project in the protection of the lands below the impounding works serve only to intensify recognition of the immensity of the fields still unoccupied. None of the public-land States is free from the danger and devastations of floods, but the flood which wipes out a prosperous community or destroys an area in an agricultural district is a national and regional as well as a State calamity, varying in importance only to the extent of the property destroyed and the number of lives wasted. Whether it be the Mississippi at flood with its dreadful potentialities or the Rio Grande above the Elephant Butte or the Colorado above Black Canyon after that project has been completed or any stream in the West subject to the same destructive forces in flood time as are these great river systems, the principle that the problem of control is national and regional as well as State remains, and the same should be recognized.

Therefore, it seems to be recognized by those in high authority that the problems embraced in this bill are national in their scope. If they are national, then the Congress should act to save the agricultural districts that are now supporting a population of more than 5,000,000 people.

If it is wise for the National Government to advance a total of $316,964,000 to afford relief to 40,000 farms, with a population of only 500,000 people, is it not wise for the Government to advance the sum carried in this bill to save many thousands of acres, upon which more than 5,000,000 people live? There is no difference between the wiping out of an agricultural district and the destruction of the hopes and ambitions of its people by a flood than by a failure of the Government to act in a time of necessity.

The learned author further reviews the effort and the legislation of the National Government in extending relief to the landowners in the arid and semiarid West, and further says, beginning on page 243:

Then, finally, in 1902 the Federal reclamation act, under which the Government advanced the money for projects too big to be otherwise handled, came into being. It has brought water to various sagebrush plains from Canada to Mexico, and has distributed under careful supervision the fertile lands which, before it waved its wand, were barren wastes.

In that policy the Government was farsighted. It took the initiative and said to those people: "We will develop your project, and you can repay upon terms that will permit you to live and rear a family." The only difference is that the people which it is intended to benefit by this bill took the initiative and started the projects. They would have carried on had not this depression come. It came; and the question is now whether they should be discriminated against because they had the initiative and desire to develop the resources of this country or whether they should have set idly by and drifted hither and thither, waiting for the Government to take the initiative and build these levees and drainage canals.

Further, in speaking of the necessity to conserve and to protect our tillable land, the distinguished Secretary said:

The sand largely has run through the hourglass for agricultural lands on the public domain.

That statement is literally true, and the sand has run and is running now through the hourglass for the saving of homes of more than 5,000,000 people in 34 States in this land. Unless this Congress heeds the urgent call for help, in my opinion, it will be neglecting its duty to conserve the resources of our great country, to aid unemployment, to stop the drift from the farm to the city, and in fact, will strike a blow at the continued development of the resources of this great land.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I desire to discuss with you the bill H. R. 4650, commonly known and referred to as the Glenn-Smith bill, which is now before the House for consideration.

It was my privilege during the first two years of my experience in Congress to be a member of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, which considered various bills referred to it, and the drafting of this bill carried with it the best thoughts contained in each of the bills introduced.

First, I desire to state that this bill affects possibly more people in the United States than any other one bill that is now before Congress. The bill vitally affects 35 States in this Union. The committee drafted this bill and reported it through its chairman, Mr. Addison T. Smith, which had the unanimous indorsement of the committee, and we fully expected to get a hearing on this bill during the last session of Congress.

We petitioned the Rules Committee for a rule for the consideration of this bill, and the petition presented to the Rules Committee contained 135 names of Members of Congress who were vitally interested in the passage of this bill. To our surprise, after three days of pleading with the Rules Committee, we were denied a rule on this bill during the last session of Congress so that it could be considered and passed.

The bill was reintroduced this year in practically the same form as it was last year and with only a few minor amendments. I understand that it was presented this time to Congress with the unanimous report of each member of this committee.

The chairman, Mr. ROBERT S. HALL, of Mississippi, has used every effort to get the bill before this session of Congress for consideration. He applied to the Rules Committee for a rule for the consideration of this legislation, and I understand that 218 Members of Congress petitioned the Rules Committee for a rule for the consideration of this measure and we have been denied a rule by them for the consideration of this important legislation.

We have resorted now to the only remedy left, by filing a petition with the Clerk and asking for 145 Members to indorse this petition to take it out of the possession of the Rules Committee for a consideration of the bill on the floor of the House, and that number has been signed to this petition. Now we ask you to sustain this petition and bring the bill to a final passage. We plead with you to do it.

It is not my disposition, and I would not under any circumstances criticize any member of the Rules Committee or any other committee for his action with reference to any measure, but it is my candid opinion that if the Rules Committee had given this bill the careful consideration that the committee has, or had read the hearings before this committee showing the emergency for this legislation, that they would not have denied us a rule for the consideration of it.

I want to take up the bill, first, and discuss it section by section, and it is my opinion that every objection that anyone may offer to this bill can be answered by those of us who have made a careful study of this measure.

Section 1 of this bill provides that-

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to loan, out of the revolving fund hereinafter created, to any such district or legal entity an amount sufficient to redeem such bonds, certificates of indebtedness, or lawful indebtedness, and unpaid judgments, warrants, and the accrued interest thereon, in the manner and under such restrictions and conditions as are hereinafter set forth.

It might be well here to state that at a time when the Nation was prosperous many improvement districts were formed by acts of the legislatures of the various States and if conditions had prevailed as they were when the legislation was first enacted, the taxes could have been met without such a heavy burden being thrown on the landowners. The most of these levy and drainage district bonds are bearing 6 per cent interest. On account of the excessive overflows and droughts, it has been impossible for many people to meet their levy and drainage district taxes and many thousand acres of the finest land in the United States has been forfeited for these taxes.

In one county in my district there are more than 60,000 acres of the very finest kind of lands that have forfeited for their levy and drainage and general taxes, and have been bought in either by the levy or drainage districts or have been forfeited to the State for the nonpayment of taxes.

Here is where the burden falls heavily upon those who do pay; they are required to pay a larger tax in order that county, State, and school taxes are kept up. You will remember that when an improvement district is formed all the lands inside of the improvement district are pledged for the payment of the money borrowed and the taxes accruing against it. If one man should pay his taxes on all of his lands as they fall due, both levy and drainage district and State, his lands are still in the district, and every acre of them is bound for the payment of the full amount against said district.

If one man could pay his taxes and be relieved of that burden, then there would not be such a justification for this kind of legislation. I will discuss this matter further before the conclusion of my address

Section 3 of this bill provides:

Loans shall be made only to the legally constituted authority which has issued the bonds or its successor in interest, and not unto it until the Secretary of the Interior has satisfied himself by such examination of the engineering works, for which the legal obligations were issued, as he may deem necessary, of the reasonably successful operation thereof, and that the lands designed to be benefited by these works are receiving benefit to a reasonable

The Secretary of the Interior shall make or cause to be made an appraisal of the value of the taxable property of each district making application for a loan as well as of its economic value, and no loan may be made until the Secretary is satisfied it will be paid at maturity.

Loans may be made annually or otherwise to take up the principal of and/or accrued interest on the aforesaid bonds already due and unpaid and/or as they become due: Provided, however, That when the amount of the outstanding and unpaid bonds and interest of any district is greater than the appraisal and/or the value of the bonds which such district could issue under the terms of this act, then the governing authority of such district, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized and empowered to negotiate with the owners and holders of the outstanding bonds and other evidences of debts of any such district for the purpose of compromising and reducing the amount of existing indebtedness, both of principal and interest, in any such district to an amount not greater than the appraisal therein, and thereupon the Secretary of the Interior may loan to such districts in the manner herein provided an amount sufficient to pay off the bonds and other indebtedness so compromised and reduced.

This section of the bill very carefully protects the Government in making these loans. This section provides further that the Secretary of the Interior shall either make or cause to be made an appraisal of the valuation of the property, and no loan shall be made until the Secretary is satisfied that the loan will be paid at maturity.

This section further provides that when the outstanding and unpaid bonds and interest of any district are greater than the appraisal of the value of the bonds that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered to negotiate with the owners and holders of the outstanding bonds or other evidences of debt for the purpose of compromising and reducing the amount of the existing indebtedness, both of the principal and interest in any such district to an amount not greater than the appraisal of said property. This prevents anyone holding the bonds from receiving any more than the actual value of their bonds at the time they are to be

In other words, if a bonded indebtedness has been fastened on a district and the bonds are only worth 50 cents on the dollar, and the Secretary of the Interior so finds, then before these bonds would be taken up and refunded the holder of the bonds would have to reduce the amount to the sum that it is found that the bonds were actually worth, and the landowner would save this difference, which would help him out of his trouble that he is now in.

Section 4 of the bill provides as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior, before making the loan, That the Secretary of the Interior, before making the loan, must be satisfied that satisfactory legal authority exists for and ample provisions have been made to annually tax the taxable property pledged as security or as subject to assessment for the bonds issued sufficient to pay the maintenance expenses of the district for a period equaling the life of the loan and beginning at the end of 10 years the annual taxes must be sufficient to establish a sinking fund which will retire the loan at the maturity dates fixed by the Secretary of the Interior. All money collected for the sinking fund must be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the debtor, but may be transferred into the revolving fund by the Treasurer of the United States on application by the Secretary of the Interior.

This section of the bill provides that beginning with the 10 years after the passage of this act there shall be started a small sinking fund which will be amortized and carried through the remaining period of 30 years and will by that time retire not only the interest but the bonds themselves and leave the lands clear of debt.

The most important section of the whole bill is section 5, which reads as follows:

which reads as follows:

Loans shall be made for a period not exceeding 40 years, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior in each case, which shall bear interest at a rate of 3 per cent per annum, payable annually: Provided, however, That during the first five years of the loan the interest shall accrue and be payable during the succeeding years of the loan in equal annual installments.

Loans shall be secured by the issuance and delivery to the Secretary of the Treasury by the legally constituted authority refunding bonds payable to the United States in the amount of the loan, and it shall be and appear on the face of each bond that it is a lien on all the taxable property within said district and/or the benefits assessed against said property or said property which may be subject to assessment for the payment of said bonds, and the Secretary of the Interior shall fix the dates of the maturities of said bonds. That where such bonds are issued by a county and it shall appear that under the laws of the State in which such county is situated such bonds are direct and general obligations of the county issuing the same, and that provision is made by law for the levying and collecting of taxes for the payment of such bonds, it shall be sufficient if each bond on the face thereof shall pledge the full faith and credit of such county: Provided further, That no district may issue additional bonds for any purpose without having first obtained the written consent of the Secretary of the Interior as long as it is in debt hereunder.

Let me, if I can, give you a practical example or appli-

Let me, if I can, give you a practical example or application of this bill to an individual farmer living in my district. We will say that he owns 1,000 acres of land, that are in one of these improvement districts, and on account of the heavy burden of taxation the improvement district is now in the hands of a receiver. The usual rate of taxes in these drainage and improvement districts is 6 per cent and the farmer is required to pay that and not only that, but he is also required to pay a further general tax for the maintenance of the schools of the county and State government.

This bill proposes to come to his rescue and to have these levy and drainage district bonds refunded and to be carried over a period of 40 years. For the first five years no interest is to be paid at all. At the expiration of five years, he then begins to pay a tax of 3 per cent and pays that tax for the next five years. At the end of this time, or at the end of the 10 years, then a small sinking fund is started, which, carried through a period of 30 additional years, will entirely retire both the principal and interest of the bonded indebt-

In other words, it will be a saving of 3 per cent on interest, and the saving on interest also would much more than be enough to mature the entire bonded indebtedness during the period of time this bill is to run.

If this bill should pass and be signed by the President, it would be a new day for agriculture in the United States. The very best lands that we have in the United States are involved in these drainage and improvement districts. During the 5-year period of time when no interest is to be paid, the lands could be brought into a state of cultivation, and at the end of the 10-year period, there would be no trouble whatever for the farmers to meet this small tax.

Section 6 is a very important section of the bill also. Section 6 provides as follows:

Whenever any district shall have sold any property in said district for unpaid taxes and shall have bought in the same, and shall hold the title to such land, then the Secretary of the Interior shall require, when any loan is made to said district, that the district allow the owner at the time of such sale and purchase, or his heirs at law, executors, administrators, or assigns, to repurchase said land within a reasonable time to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior for no greater sum than the taxes for which it was sold and purchased, plus taxes which have accrued on the same since the date of said sale.

This provision in section 6 will enable many farmers to gain back their lands that seemingly were lost forever. Notwithstanding any statute of limitation that might have run in any State before the Government would make the loan which would require the district or bondholders to surrender the lands back on the payment of the amount of taxes due up to that time. This provision would enable many persons to regain their lands that never could be regained in any other way.

This bill provides for a 5-year period of making these redemptions, and $20,000,000 each year would be used for that

The Government could not possibly lose anything on one of these loans because the lands involved in it and which would be security for the loan are the best securities that could be had.

We have in the State of Arkansas alone in the various drainage and levy districts 2,183,015 acres of land involved in the districts. Of this amount of land 1,231,797 acres are in cultivation. The assessed valuation of the lands in these districts is $29,689,454.23. There are 31,687 individual landowners of lands in these various districts.

The drainage taxes this year in our State amounted to $1,844,779.79. Of this total amount of acreage in our levy and drainage districts in my State we have 321,289 acres that are now delinquent.

The total levy and drainage district bonds outstanding in my State is now $21,706,424.87. From these figures, which are similar to those in other States, you can readily see why the landowners in my State are so vitally interested in the passage of this act.

Many of these districts in my State have been formed to aid in controlling the flood waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries. In a great many instances tax burdens for flood control have been placed against the lands of individualsmuch of which lie in my district—which should never have been placed against the lands at all, but should have been paid by the United States Government.

And certainly, when the Government finds the people in such distress as they are now, it certainly should be willing to come to their rescue with a reasonable proposition that the Government could never lose a dollar on.

The National Government in the past laid out what is classed as a standard levee, that it created to protect other lands before the standard levee as proposed by the engineers of the War Department was built. It was necessary that the owners take care of the flood water, and they found that the natural outlet was in Desha County, through Cypress Creek drainage system, which system appears to have been formed by natural sources many years before any levee construction had been undertaken.

About the year 1910 this survey was undertaken by the Department of Agriculture, and soon after the completion of the survey a bill was introduced in the Arkansas Legislature creating the Cypress Creek district. The preamble of that bill recited that the drainage district was being constructed for the purpose of closing Cypress Creek Gap, thereby making it possible for the Government to build its standard levee for the purpose of controlling the waters of the Mississippi, which formed part of the flood control.

The property owners were told, and it was generally understood by all the property owners, that the standard levee anticipated the highest possible stage that could exist and that they would have protection forever from the ravages of the Mississippi River.

The Cypress Creek drainage project was financed, so far as the survey was concerned, by the Department of Agriculture, and the act which created the district provided that the levee district might use its funds in assisting in this project. In other words, both the levee and drainage acts anticipated a levee system and not a drainage system.

In order that the settlement waters might be carried on through to artificial outlets the people of Checo County formed a similar project, taxing their lands under the project which was to protect themselves from the Mississippi River.

Legislation from time to time carried the legislative dec-value and thus authorized the expenditure. These lands were taxed first to build a levee, which levee was constructed to aid navigation and agricultural industry, the Government putting up $2 to aid navigation and the property owner putting up $1 to aid agriculture.

In addition to this the landowners have put up a very heavy drainage tax in order to help the levee, which levee was intended to assist the economic conditions of the vicinity saved by the levee

I can not conceive how Congress, that has gone to the extreme limit of helping every other class of industry, can in this hour of distress turn a deaf ear to agriculture and refuse to come to the relief of the many persons that are now in distress on account of this burdensome tax, when the relief could be given and the Government never lose

It is my opinion that before we get out of the economic depression that we are now in we must begin where aid is so badly needed to bring agriculture and agricultural lands back to their rightful use and value. Agriculture is the basis of all our wealth, and when it fails everything else fails with it and when it prospers everything else is prosperous.

I hope to see the day very soon when agricultural lands will be free from debt, and when the price of the farmers' commodities will at least bring the cost of production with a reasonable rate of interest for the investments made, and when this is done we will see better times and the dawn of a new day.

The passage of this bill would do more to restore confidence in agriculture than any measure that could possibly pass this Congress, and I trust that every one of you will find it in his heart to come to the rescue of this class of persons and cast his ballot for this bill.

THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BANK-HEAD in the chair.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request, and I ask for two minutes to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when the House voted on the first paragraph of the manufacturers' sales tax title, it was understood that if that was eliminated a motion would be made to eliminate all the succeeding paragraphs of that title dealing with the manufacturers'tax title of the bill.

We have disposed, by the adoption of the so-called Crisp amendment, of matters that would remain in the title as a special tax. There is no need of the other provisions in the title dealing with the manufacturers' tax title, so that my unanimous-consent request is not to have the remaining provisions read, but to strike them all from the bill, simply leaving in the title the last section, which provides when the special tax shall take effect, 30 days after the passage of the bill. If that is granted all of the other sections in the title will be eliminated, and we will resume consideration of the bill on page 31 of the administrative features.

Mr. RANKIN. It was understood that they were to go

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Georgia at this point tell us whether or not he has made up his mind to demand a separate vote on the oil amendment and the coal amendment?

Mr. CRISP. They are all together in the same amendment, and I have myself, as acting chairman of the comlaration that these lands would be greatly enhanced in | mittee, voted in some instances, in order to stand by my committee, as otherwise I would not have done. I have not reached any conclusion as to that, but I can say to the gentleman from New York that I know of one member of the committee who is going to demand a separate vote.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman at this point think that the amendment would be divisible, so that we could have a separate vote on the oil-tariff provision and also on the coal-tariff provision?

Mr. CRISP. If I may have my time extended for a couple of minutes

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Here is the parliamentary situation. In the so-called Crisp amendment there was a special excise tax levied on wort, malt sirup, and grape concentrates, and that also included the tax on imported oils and gasoline, and an amendment was added to that Crisp amendment providing for a tax on coal. When we get into the House, if we have a separate vote on the Crisp amendment, and the amendment should be rejected, in my judgment that would eliminate from the bill the tax on wort, malt, lubricating oil, and on coal, but it would not reach the tax on imported gasoline. Why? Because if that amendment is rejected, then that part of the bill which contained the tax on gasoline would still be in the bill. I think that is the parliamentary situa-

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman pursue that further and state whether the reverse of that is true. Having had the vote on the wort, malt, and so forth, could we have a separate vote on the oil-tariff provision?

Mr. CRISP. From a parliamentary standpoint, I think you could not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is very unfortunate, because some of us want to find out how many Democrats are sitting on this side of the aisle. That is why we want a separate vote

Mr. RANKIN. This can be done, as I understand it. We can get a vote on these propositions on a motion to recommit. Mr. CRISP. You can.

Mr. RANKIN. Is the gentleman from Georgia willing to go with us on a motion to recommit? Mr. CRISP. I shall cross that bridge when we get to it. The gentleman knows my personal views.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman indicate how far down we go by this unanimous-consent request; how much we eliminate from the bill? We begin at section 602.

Mr. CRISP. Starting on page 229, at section 602, we go down to section 619, on page 250, and the only thing left in the hill is the title:

This title shall take effect on the thirtieth day after the enact-

That is, the tax contained in the bill on wort, grape concentrates, malt, and so forth, takes effect 30 days after the enactment of the bill. All the rest is stricken out.

Mr. HASTINGS. And 619 would be retained in the bill? Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. But everything between 602 and 619 would go out if the unanimous consent is granted?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. If unanimous consent is granted, it is then the gentleman's purpose to go back to the front of the bill and start in where we left off?

Mr. CRISP. On page 36, and try to dispose of those gaps in between.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman to say that we are going to put these Democrats on record on these coal and oil provisions?

Mr. CRISP. I did not say that.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say yes. Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Unless I am assured of that vote I shall object to the request.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, this does not affect that in the slightest. I hope the gentleman will not object. What is the use of reading these matters and then striking them out as you come to them? I ask that they all be stricken out now. That is all I ask.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Under those conditions I withdraw my objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. We are on title 4. I understand a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means is working on some excise taxes to raise the revenue which would have been raised by the manufacturers' excise tax.

Mr. CRISP. That is correct.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understand the subcommittee is not yet ready to report to the full committee.

Mr. CRISP. It is not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will whatever of excise taxes the Ways and Means Committee decides to report to the House come in under title 4?

Mr. CRISP. I think that is the proper place for them. They will be before the House for its consideration open to amendment, and it will be within the province of the House to strike them out. This request is made to expedite matters.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And if the unanimous consent is granted, the gentleman intends, then, to go to page 36, and come back to title 4, and then offer the amendments the committee has agreed on.

Mr. CRISP. As soon as the committee has their recommendations ready-and I hope the committee may be able to reach some conclusion to-morrow—they will be brought in. The committee is honestly and sincerely seeking to bring in a program that will be acceptable to the House to try to balance the Budget. We are not trying to bring in any program that might show disappointment, spleen, or that would cause embarrassment to anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to discuss the merits of that

The CHAIRMAN. The attention of the gentleman from Georgia is called to the fact that the Clerk has not yet read paragraph (e) on page 229. Does the gentleman wish to include that in his request?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

I do not see how any Member of the House can object to this request. It was the judgment of the House that all of that title was to be stricken out, and this request is simply to do that, instead of having to read it and then move to strike out each paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia IMr. CRISPI asks unanimous consent that the further reading of all of the bill, beginning at paragraph (e) on page 229 down to and including section 618 on page 250, shall be stricken from the bill.

Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, in order to propound a question, did I correctly understand the gentleman to indicate that when the Doughton amendment was adopted the manufacturers' sales tax title was to be stricken out? If that is so, why did not that motion strike out the tax on lubricating oils, and so forth, on page 228; because, in regard to those taxes, the bill reads:

In the case of the following articles the tax imposed by this title shall be in the following rates.

Mr. CRISP. I have tried to answer the gentleman with regard to that matter. These items were in that title, but they were not under the 21/4 per cent manufacturers' tax.

They were not involved in the manufacturers' tax at all, but | they happen to have been incorporated in that title of the bill, and they had a specific excise tax levied against them. The understanding of the House did not include striking out those items but only everything that would be required to pay the regular 21/4 per cent manufacturers' tax.

Now. I can add nothing to that statement.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman's unanimous-consent request is granted, then the Federal Government will be able to issue a certificate giving a clean bill of health to the Capones and other racketeers manufacturing 9 per cent beer from brewers' wort, which is legalized in this section, in direct conflict with the Volstead Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Fiscal year ending in 1932: For credit against the tax of amounts of tax paid for a fiscal year beginning in 1931 and ending in 1932, see section 132.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, along the line of the colloquy between the acting chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and several Members with reference to oil and coal, I wish to make this observation, and I make it because of the reference made by a number of the newspapers throughout the country to the consideration that this bill has received in the House up to date: In my opinion, we will pass a bill which will approximate the greatest amount of satisfaction under existing conditions. There is nothing about the situation to date that disturbs me. We have had our fight. Men have honestly differed on the excise provisions. Personally I was opposed to it in principle. I never believed in a tax on the necessaries of life, but I felt that what was left, under the circumstances, under the law of necessity, compelled us to proceed in that direction; but Members honestly differed, and the matter is out of the bill and we are going ahead with a determination to balance the Budget, because practically all of us realize that that is necessary. We also realize that the people of the country are demanding that the Budget for 1933 be balanced. The unfortunate feature about this bill is the tariff provisions. I recognize that those from oil districts and from coal districts are interested, but until we get out of this bill those two tariff provisions a suspicion will be attaching against this bill during its entire progress through the House and, if the bill passes the House with those two provisions in it, when it gets over to the other body.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand, this is a tax bill to raise revenue.

Mr. McCORMACK. For the Treasury.

Mr. RANKIN. And not a protective tariff bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. Absolutely not a protective tariff bill. Mr. RANKIN. But if we leave those two tariff provisions in the bill, the one on oil and the one on coal, will it not be an invitation to every man on the floor of the House who has something in his district which he wants to protect to be offering an amendment to put a tariff on it?

Mr. McCORMACK. Absolutely. But my brief observa-tion is not to create controversy but to make a slight

I have confidence that we will pass a good bill, and the people of the country ought to realize that this House is operating rationally now. We are going along with a determination to balance the Budget. The two provisions in the bill with reference to a tariff should be eliminated, and at the proper time I hope we will be in a parliamentary condition that a proper motion can be made to that affect, in order that a revenue bill will pass the House.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Why is not the proper procedure, just as we did in previous sessions, to have an emergency tariff brought before us on a straight-out, square, and fair issue, instead of having it inserted in a revenue measure?

Mr. McCORMACK. I agree with the gentleman and I thank him for his observation.

We want to perform our duty. We want to try to pass a revenue bill. We want to do it for the purpose of driving out fear and instilling confidence, and the House of Representatives, in my opinion, is going to do its duty.

We are going to pass a bill which will balance the Budget in as fair a way as it is humanly possible under the circumstances. However, its success depends upon removing the tariff provisions relating to oil and coal from the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, from now on I am not going to allow these statements to go unchallenged. I had hoped that we would let pass the water that has gone over the wheel. I had hoped that when we returned to page 36 we would go on with this bill in an orderly way. That is what we ought to do.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. May I earnestly join in that hope and request that we go back to page 36 of the bill and read the bill in an orderly way.

Mr. HASTINGS. If we can do that I am ready to stop now. We had our fight over this oil provision, and I challenge any man to a debate upon the merits of the question. It is as meritorious a provision as any in the bill anywhere. [Applause.] It is a revenue measure. I want to say to Members who keep continually attacking it that the oil provision is as defensible as any provision in the bill. [Applause.] I clearly showed, when the provision was under discussion, that it will bring $43,000,000 of revenue to a depleted Treasury. It will help the unemployment situation as much as any other provision in the bill. It will help to relieve a prostrate industry. All of this fight against the socalled tariff or excise provision in this bill is in behalf of four of these big importers of oil from the South American field. [Applause.] I am here to fight for the independents and speak for the little producers in this country. I am fighting for increased revenue, both for my State and for the Nation.

I dislike to thrust myself continually into this debate. But I might as well serve notice now that if we are going to have to reargue this question fourteen times a day, we are ready for the fight.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. Mr. BLANTON. And to show how little dependence we can put upon the position taken by our friend from Oregon [Mr. Hawley], who in the last Congress was the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, it is enough to say that he preached to and lectured us on the necessity of balancing the Budget and for strict economy last Saturday and yet this afternoon came in and voted for a $350,000,000 bill, which we killed by a vote of nearly 2 to 1, and which had it been passed would have made the balancing of the Budget absolutely impossible.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. Mr. McGUGIN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] a while ago said that if we should allow this oil provision to remain in the bill it would probably mean that the Democratic convention at Chicago would denounce the bill. I want to ask the gentleman this question: If he can think of anything the Democratic Party could do which would more completely result in its defeat in Texas and Oklahoma than to do that?

Mr. HASTINGS. I did not pay enough attention to the gentleman's question to be able to answer it, because I did not want to go beside the mark and be divided. However, I repeat that is a meritorious provision. It is one that will raise revenue; it is one that is in the interest of the laboring man and the farmer; it is one that is in the interest of the independent producers; and it is one that is against those four big fellows who import oil from the South American field and who are attempting to control the legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, unlike the gentleman from Oklahoma, I am going to keep both feet on the ground. I just want to reply to the request of the gentleman from Georgia that we cease talking about the tariff on oil and coal. Out of my loyalty to the Democratic Party, whose fate has been jeopardized in this House within the past two weeks, I do not propose to let what has been already said go as the last word on those two embargo provisions in this tax bill. I serve notice that you are going to hear about these two Republican promises until this tax bill is passed or defeated. [Applause.]

Some of us here still love our party. Some of us think our party should conduct the affairs of this Government. I would like to see some fighting in behalf of this tax bill. I would like to see people throw out their chests instead of throwing out their stomachs. This is no time to mince words when our party needs support. We are either Democrats or we are not. We are not Democrats if we vote for this bill with either one of those two provisions in it.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Instead of being a tax-raising bill these provisions will make it a bill to raise the price of coal and oil to the American people to the extent of anywhere from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000. It will penalize the American people, and I am ready for the fight, too.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The alleged tariffs on oil and coal will not raise any revenue at all, and their proponents know it. I can not conceive of the Democratic Party failing to denounce these two tariff provisions in the Democratic National Convention in June. I was not using loose words when I said that, because I sincerely hope the men who will attend that convention, if these two provisions are left in the bill, will go so far as to denounce this tax bill as undemocratic.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that the two tariff provisions which were so largely supported by the Democrats are nearer an embargo than any provision in the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, which the Democrats have denounced from this floor and throughout the country?

Mr. O'CONNOR. They are surely embargo measures. There is no question about that. I do not think they will stay in the bill, because I can not conceive of them staying in the bill when the Democrats recover their equilibrium.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then why is the gentleman so disturbed?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am disturbed at the attitude and the harm already done to my party even by temporarily placing them in the bill, and I am dicouraged at this ineffective and sometimes effeminate fight that is being made for the tax bill. Let us have a masculine defense of this bill. You can not pass legislation here by submitting to everything suggested or by mere expressions of good faith, love, and affection. Let us have some fight for the measure. If we must put up a fight, let us put up a real one or else take the bill back to the committee and let somebody else carry on the fight.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. As a Democrat, if these provisions stay in the bill for coal and oil, I want some protection for my lumber in Oregon.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, the gentleman does.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. And we propose to demand protection for our lumber,

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is just the trouble with tariff logrolling. If Members were Representatives from their States as they really are instead of being merely Representatives of their States, we would have a unified national policy on tariff as well as taxation. If the theory of local interest only were carried to its logical conclusion, we would not have a national government. The men in this House are elected Representatives from their States but at the same time as Representatives of the entire United States.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. BOLAND. I want to tell the gentleman from New York that I did not go around the county of Lackawanna talking about the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill; but I am here, and I put on this amendment Saturday for the purpose of trying to protect the miners up there who are starving to death because of this foreign coal that is coming into this country.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman from Pennsylvania occupies a most unique position in the House. He was elected both as a Republican and a Democrat, but I was elected and every other Member on the Democratic side was elected as Democrats, and not one of you can not justify your vote for these two tariff provisions. If these items do stay in the bill, every real Democrat should vote against the entire bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, we have had enough talk on this paragraph. I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer as an amendment to that motion that debate close now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McReynolds). The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri offered an amendment to that motion.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia that all debate close now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman's motion.

Mr. DYER. I am trying to save the Democratic Party from itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's remarks are not in order.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we hear a good deal of talk about men's Democracy. I challenge the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Connor] on his Democracy. I am as good a Democrat as he is, and a better one. [Laughter and applause.] When Mr. Raskob wired, in the campaign of 1928, if I were willing to go along on the tariff views in order to help Mr. Smith, I wired him I would do it, and I did do it, although it cost me thousands of votes.

I am a Democrat. I went down to Houston to the convention and took the ticket that was not my choice, and I am looking in the face of Democrats here who took their ticket and went down the line, and some of them did not come back in 1928, and yet you stand here and challenge the Democracy of any of our States.

You may talk about the platform at Chicago, but I will tell you what I think will be in that platform. In my judgment there will be a plank in that platform indorsing the tariff on oil and on the natural products of this country. That is what I hope will be in the Chicago platform. [Applause.]

You say that your Democracy does not indorse a tariff. I did not read that in my book. [Laughter.] It was not in the platform I read. This is no time or place to display our Democracy; in fact, it is a mighty poor time to be talking about each other's Democracy in this House. [Laughter and applause.]

There is one thing I have always noticed, and that is that gentlemen from districts that have always gotten their tariffs heretofore were never very particular about the manner in which they got them. They would take them on a revenue bill or any other kind of bill if they could get the tariff, and now because they happen to wake up and find that a few western people have put something in the bill they can not keep quiet but still keep on coming here and talking about it.

We gave you a vote the other day that surprised you, and then you slandered us by saying that we had gone out and made some kind of trade. There is no body of men in this House that has ever learned to trade like some of the New England men. They long ago learned to logroll and trade on tariff provisions or on the things that they want protected.

Now, I want to say this, and this is my admonition to the Democrats. Let us go along here and write this bill and help these men get the best bill we can. We have expressed ourselves and have made known our own ideas. We have expressed them vehemently and sufficiently to satisfy our associates and the country as to our views on the revenue bill we want.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. YON. Does not the gentleman think we have talked enough about this subject, and after this bill is adopted in Committee of the Whole will there not be an opportunity to vote on these amendments?

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman, but I have not thrust myself into this debate at all, and I would not have been here now except for the criticism of the merits of this oil excise tax. Not a bill nor a provision in a bill will pass this Congress that will put as many idle men to work as this oil excise tax; it will put 350,000 idle men to work.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to our friend from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] that the only provision that affects oil in this bill was put in it by the almost unanimous consent of the Ways and Means Committee, the great majority of which were Democrats. My colleague corrects me and says the vote was 14 to 9 in the committee for the tax on oil, but the bill comes here without a minority report against it from either the Republican or Democratic side. That is the only provision in the bill affecting oil. Why was not there a minority report filed against it? There was a companion matter of equal importance to the country, affecting coal, that was put in from the floor. It was put in by the Democrats, helped by some good, wellmeaning, well-intentioned Republicans of good judgment. [Laughter.] When did the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] begin writing a Democratic platform? In 1928. The only Democratic platform he helped to write was in 1928, down in my home State, in Houston, Tex., where I was born, and it went on the rocks. [Laughter.] He caused my strong Democratic district to go Republican, not for Hoover, particularly, but Republican against the kind of a platform that the gentleman from New York helped to write. He caused my Democratic district and my Democratic State and other Democratic States for the first time in history to go against Democracy and to vote for and help to elect President Hoover. When he has been writing Democratic platforms as long as the Democrats of my State have, he will write them more to conform to the wishes of the Democrats of the country, and not for just a few politicians living in New York.

Now, as my friend from New York—and I do like him as much as does anybody in the House [laughter]—if my friend calls this sales-tax fight effeminate, I wonder what he would say if he saw a man's fight some time. I never saw him make any fight on the floor that was not effeminate. [Laughter.] I want to tell the gentleman from New York that this oil provision in the bill is a revenue matter, and it is going to stay in this bill. It is undisputed here that the foreign importers of oil to this country have an advantage of $1.03 per barrel over every American producer in the United States. And we are not going to permit this very reasonable revenue-producing tax against foreign oils to be knocked out of the bill.

I offered an amendment the other day reducing that advantage, and only giving them about 19 cents advantage. I offered the amendment raising the tax to 84 cents per barrel on foreign oils; but when the members of the committee said it would precipitate other tariff amendments, I saw the situation and bowed to the will of my leader, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp], and notwithstanding I knew my amendment would have carried, I withdrew it. I withdrew it, knowing it would carry, because I wanted to conform to the wishes of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] to keep strictly tariff matters out of the bill. The little 42 cents a barrel will bring in a revenue of $42,000,000 and will take away some of the big advantage that the Dutch Shell and other monopolies have in importing their foreign oils to America.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CROSS and Mr. RANKIN objected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] the time was limited to 10 minutes. All time has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. But, Mr. Chairman, this is a different amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired under the motion, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 41. GENERAL RULE

The net income shall be computed upon the basis of the tax-payer's annual accounting period (fiscal year or calendar year, as the case may be) in accordance with the method of accounting regularly employed in keeping the books of such taxpayer; but, if no such method of accounting has been so employed, or if the method employed does not clearly reflect the income, the computation shall be made in accordance with such method as in the opinion of the commissioner does clearly reflect the income. If the taxpayer's annual accounting period is other than a fiscal year as defined in section 48, or if the taxpayer has no annual accounting period or does not keep books, the net income shall be computed on the basis of the calendar year. (For use of inventories, see sec. 22 (c).)

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am one who opposed the tariff on oil, and I am going to do everything humanly and honorably possible to get it out of this bill.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] talks about the Ways and Means Committee being unanimous on this proposition. Let me tell some things that happened in the Ways and Means Committee. There were at least four members of that committee who were opposed to this tariff, and those who favored it, or somebody in the Ways and Means Committee, said, "It will get us 40 votes for the sales tax in the House if we will just put it in here."

In the first place, it has no place in a tax bill. This is a bill to raise revenue. This provision is to raise the price of oil and its products to the American people, and the lowest estimate I have heard on its cost to the American people is $250,000,000. In order to gratify a few people who have an interest in oil wells or in oil itself, should I vote a tax of $4,000,000 a year upon the people of my State? No. The truth of the business is, this is just as vicious as any tariff provision ever written into a bill, and it is written into the wrong bill.

If you are going to pass a tariff bill, bring in a tariff bill. I have never voted for a tariff bill, and I did not sign the Raskob telegram in 1928 either, because it was not in conformity with the fundamental principles of the party I am affiliated with, and I was not willing to go with any man who was temporarily in control into the maelstrom of a high protective tariff system.

These two provisions were put in here inadvertently. Men have come to me who walked through that line the other day and said, "We did not realize what we were doing." All this stirring up of this fight against New England, all this row that took place—New England, Kansas, and Oklahoma spitting fire at each other about tariffs—misled some men. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Nelson], who sits before me, knows that he and I never have voted together on a tariff proposition, but I have nothing against him, and certainly would not be prejudiced enough against any section of the country to allow myself to be swept off my feet and stick something in a tax bill that would be absolutely foreign to it—a high protective tariff provision—in order to penalize the American people so that some people or a few interests might reap a profit.

The coal amendment is in the same category. Neither one should ever have gone into the bill. So far as I am personally concerned, I am going to do everything in my power to strike those two provisions out. If you want a tariff on oil, go to the Ways and Means Committee and have that committee report a tariff bill, and let them bring it in here; but do not come here and destroy the tax bill, whereby we are trying to get together and raise revenue for the country, by injecting into it high protective provisions that at least a vast majority of the men on my side of the aisle are opposed to.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, may I not make an earnest appeal to the membership of the House to cooperate in passing this bill? Word has just been brought to me that stocks and other securities in New York are dropping. They dropped last week. It is imperative for the welfare of this country that this House of Representatives determine what it is going to do in trying to balance the Budget. We must stop this acrimonious discussion among ourselves. We have discussed oil, we have discussed almost every subject under the sun since the bill came into the House. I have tried to be patient. I have tried to be liberal in debate, and if this House will stand by me, I shall move to close debate on these amendments. I have not done it before because I knew the House was not with me. In the utmost good faith and sincerity, with a desire to do that which is best for our common country, I appeal to you, my colleagues, to restrain yourselves and let us not continue to discuss time and again, time and again, things that have all been discussed, and that the House will have an opportunity to vote upon.

To simply give the facts, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] is in error when he says that the Ways and Means Committee was unanimous in its support of oil. A number of members of that committee opposed it. But this is a composite bill. Members of that committee, both Democratic and Republican, sat around the board and the bill was the joint product of all of them. The bill was reported out of committee unanimously after it was concluded.

I do not care to say anything more, I do not care to say anything that will bring about an acrimonious discussion. If you love your country, gentlemen, you can show it by refraining from speech making and passing a bill that will balance the Budget.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Sales of Realty and Casual Sales of Personalty.—In the case (1) of a casual sale or other casual disposition of personal property (other than property of a kind which would properly be included in the inventory of the taxpayer if on hand at the close of the taxable year), for a price exceeding $1,000, or (2) of a sale or other disposition of real property, if in either case the initial payments do not exceed 40 per cent of the selling price, the income may, under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, be returned on the basis and in the manner above prescribed in this section. As used in this section, the term "initial payments" means the payments received in cash or property other than evidences of indebtedness of the purchaser during the taxable period in which the sale or other disposition is made.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I heartily agree with my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] in his desire to expedite the legitimate disposition of this bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, its enactment ought not to be expedited at the expense of adequate consideration. The gentleman says he is just in receipt of information that stocks and bonds are dropping on the New York market. Why are they dropping? They are dropping because of just such bills as that we have before us; because of the enactment of just such legislation as is proposed in the paragraph now under debate. And if this provision to place a tariff on oil and coal becomes a law, they will drop still more.

According to no less an authority than the Department of Agriculture, as reported in its agricultural situation, one of the determining causes for the low price of agricultural products is the tariff. And when farm prices decline and the buying power of the farmer is curtailed, the price of everything else must inevitably fall with them.

No one has a higher regard than I have for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Blanton] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKeown], who have just spoken. I am always glad to cooperate with them. But I can not agree with them on injecting oppressive tariffs into this revenue bill.

To place a prohibitive tariff on oil and coal would be a radical departure from the traditions of the Democratic Party. One that can not be justified or condoned. One that adds to the cost of living and places an added burden on those least able to bear it. Furthermore, by such a proposal you are corroborating and substantiating the criticism that has been made repeatedly in the press and on the floor of this House that there are those who are willing to sacrifice the interest of party and country in order to secure advantages for a favored industry or special favors for a particular district. They propose to tax the people of the entire country in order to increase the profits of a few; they propose to increase the costs of production in every other industry for the purpose of increasing dividends of their own pampered industry.

What will be the effect of these two tariffs here sought to be fastened on the country? I will tell you. In the first place, the farmers of the Nation will have to pay more to run their tractors. You are proposing to increase the price of oil and gas when farmers in every State are already having difficulty in financing the operating cost of their tractors and other power machinery. Do you know that the majority of the loans made to farmers by the Government under the credit legislation you have been passing to finance crops are for the purchase of oil and gas? They can patch up their old tractors themselves, but it requires cash to purchase fuel and lubricants. Oil is the crying need on the farm to-day, and yet you now propose to add to its cost and to increase the farmer's cost of production when he is receiving the lowest comparative price for his products ever received by the farmer since Columbus discovered America.

And you propose to put a tariff on coal and increase the cost of the fuel of the poor. The man who buys a bushel of coal at a time will have to pay more for the basket of coal he must have to keep his family from freezing and prepare their frugal meals. And this to enable the coal barons to declare larger dividends.

Mr. Chairman, it is an invitation to every other industry to come in here and ask for similar advantages. And why should they not? If we give these gentlemen a tariff to increase the price of coal and oil, why should we not give every other section of the country a tariff on its particular product? Why should we not grant a tariff on lumber, copper, cotton substitutes, bananas, chemicals, and every other product that enters into the cost of the necessities of life?

There was never a more inappropriate or inopportune time in our economic history to propose to levy tariffs on basic commodities and further weight the costs of production. The country is in the midst of an unparalleled depression, the end of which can not be foretold. We are exhausting every resource in order to get back to normal times. The effect of these tariffs is to retard recovery, to stop the farmer's plow and thresher in the field, and to bank down the fires in the homes of the unemployed. Why? In order that owners of oil wells in Texas and Oklahoma may enjoy larger profits. It is a proposal to confer special privileges by law on the few at the expense of the many; to favor one industry by penalizing every other industry; and it has no place in a revenue bill or in any other bill passed by a Democratic House.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CANNON. I yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is one of the great parliamentarians of the House and one of the great parliamentarians of this country. I would like the gentleman to inform us what we can do until this bill is finished and we get back into the House?

Mr. CANNON. We can express ourselves upon it. [Laughter.] We can indicate the temper of the House and the temper of the country. We can give notice, and we are now giving notice, that when the time comes to vote in the House we are going to strike this economic and political monstrosity from the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "disposition" in line 7, page 39.

The CHAIRMAN. Page 39 has not yet been reached. Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, we have been told by the distinguished acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that the House should cease discussing these political questions. · I want to call to his attention and to the attention of the Democratic Party and the people of the country that what our colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Con-NOR! has stated with reference to the Democratic Party losing ground is correct. You have lost so much ground since you have had control of this House that you will never make it up by the time that the next election rolls around. Why? You have denounced President Hoover and the Republican Party on account of the protective features of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, and you rode many Democrats into congressional seats in the regular and special election contests on that issue alone. You claimed that practically all of the depression, unemployment, and suffering of the world are the result of President Hoover and his Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, and you promised the people that if the Democrats were put in charge of the Government that they would wave the magic wand and put our country and the rest of the world on its feet.

My friends, when your expensive, extravagant Democratic administration, which drove this country into the World War, went into power, we had a national debt of approximately $1,000,000,000. On August 31, 1919, under your Democratic administration, our national debt reached the highest peak in the history of our Nation, the staggering sum of $26,596,000,000. Somebody must pay the interest on that debt and sinking fund. Somebody must pay for the care of the World War veterans, their widows, orphans, and dependents. Over $2,000,000,000 of the present Treasury deficit is the direct result of the last Democratic administration.

The Democratic national campaign committee and your Democratic orators are condemning President Hoover and the Republican Party for the deficit, although almost the entire deficit is traceable to the interest and sinking-fund payments on the national debt resulting from the Democratic administration and to the amounts properly expended to take care of the veterans of the war of the Democratic Party, and their widows, orphans, and dependents.

In the State of Wisconsin demagogic orators who are now running for office on the Democratic ticket, as well as many running on the Republican ticket who supported Democratic candidates in 1928, are now engaged upon a campaign denouncing President Hoover as the author and sponsor of the sales tax. The Ways and Means Committee, composed with a large Democratic majority, is responsible for that iniquitous proposition. Notwithstanding this absolute fact, we find Raskob and the Democratic leaders, as well as their leftwing Republican bedfellows in the 1928 campaign, claiming this Democratic sales-tax baby to be the child of President Hoover and the Republican Party.

You Democrats have control of the House of Representatives, in which body, under the Constitution, revenue and tariff bills must originate. If the alleged iniquitous Hawley-Smoot bill was so terrible and resulted in the present catastrophe confronting this Nation and other nations of the world, why have you not passed legislation to repeal or amend it? Why, since you have control of the Ways and Means Committee and control of the House of Representatives, have you not passed or even reported to the House a bill to cure the ills which you have claimed to have resulted from the Hawley-Smoot bill?

In the past you have denounced the iniquity of the measure. I particularly remember your vitriolic attacks on Andrew Mellon and the tariff on aluminum.

Yet your Democratic majority in the Ways and Means Committee has not up to this moment reported legislation to the House which would reduce any tariff rate now in the law; not even to reduce by as much as one-half of 1 per cent the tariff burden on aluminum pants buttons which you have bitterly denounced in the past. Although you have control of the House of Representatives, the body in which, under the Constitution, tariff legislation must originate, you have not reported or passed one piece of legislation to reduce one of the Hawley-Smoot Republican tariff rates. On the other hand, you reported and passed legislation which practically provides for an embargo on oil and coal at the behest of Democratic Congressmen and Democratic leaders. You can go through the entire Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, which your political demagogues have been denouncing, and can not point to any one particular tariff rate which comes anywhere near an embargo such as the Democratic tariff proposed by Democratic Members and supported by Democratic leaders of the House and voted into the pending revenue

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SCHAFER. I regret that I can not yield now. My time is almost up and I can not get any more.

So, my Democratic brethren, as far as making ground to carry the next election, I believe the gentleman from New York has given you good advice. You have been tried and found wanting. The people can be guided by what you have done when you have had control of the House of Representatives, in which body, under the Constitution, revenue and tariff legislation must originate. They can, without any difficulty, reach a conclusion as to how the country would go to the dogs if they would send a Democrat to the White House and have a Democratic majority on the other side of the Capitol as well as in the House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BANKHEAD). In view of the situation pending before the committee the Chair feels justified in calling to the attention of the members of the committee the rules under which we are proceeding. It is in order on any amendment to have five minutes of discussion for the amendment and five minutes of discussion against it, which closes debate under the rules of the House. The Clerk will

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) Requirement: The following individuals shall each make under oath a return stating specifically the items of his gross income and the deductions and credits allowed under this title—
(1) Every individual having a net income for the taxable year of $1,000 or over, if single, or if married and not living with husband or wife;

(2) Every individual having a net income for the taxable year of $2,500 or over, if married and living with husband or wife; and (3) Every individual having a gross income for the taxable year of $5,000 or over, regardless of the amount of his net income.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Parman: Page 44, line 11, after the period add the following: "Except the following persons shall not be required to file returns and shall not be required to pay income taxes (a) a single person, or if married and not living with husband and wife, whose gross income for the taxable year does not exceed $1,500, and (b) a married person, and living with husband or wife, whose gross income for the taxable year does not exceed

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment on the ground that the committee has already passed upon it. It is res adjudicata, because in a previous part of the bill the exemptions were fixed at $1,000 for a single person and $2,500 for married persons. I have no objection to my friend making a speech, but I am constrained to make that point of order.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order. I do not believe the point of order is well taken for this reason: Section 3 of section 51 provides that where an individual has a gross income for the taxable year of $5,000 or over he shall, in all cases, make an income-tax return. My amendment provides that no individual shall be required to make an income-tax return who is single and whose gross income is $1,500 or less, or if married who has a gross income of $3,500 a year or less. In other words, it is creating a legal presumption that where a single person has an annual gross income of only $1,500 that his net income does not amount to anything and is not taxable. It creates a legal presumption that a married man who is living with his wife and whose gross earnings amount to only $3,500 has sufficient deductions to eliminate the net income and, therefore, has nothing taxable. It will save 2,700,000 people from making income-tax returns. The amount that will be received by the Government if the law is enacted as proposed by the committee will be only $12,000,000 a year. In other words, the Government will get about $4.44, on the average, from the 2,700,000 individuals whom it brings within the terms of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that he would like to hear the gentleman on the matter involved in the point of order.

Mr. CRISP. Will my friend permit me to give him a thought which I think he should have in mind in answering the point of order. The gentleman's amendment provides that those with incomes shall not be required to pay taxes. The part of the bill we have already passed provides that they shall pay taxes. It is well established by the rules of this House that if any part of an amendment is obnoxious to a point of order then the whole amendment falls. I wanted to give the gentleman the benefit of that suggestion.

Mr. PATMAN. I added that part of my amendment which is in ink after talking with the chairman of the committee a while ago. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to eliminate that part from my amendment, and then it will read that no person shall be required to make an income-tax return who is single and whose gross income is $1,500 or less. or a married person whose gross annual income is less than $3,500

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas to modify his amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the portion of the amendment to be eliminated.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And shall not be required to pay income taxes," so that the

"And shall not be required to pay income taxes," so that the amendment as modified will read:

"Except the following persons shall not be required to file returns (a) a single person, or, if married and not living with husband and wife, whose gross income for the taxable year does not exceed $1,500, and (b) a married person, and living with husband or wife, whose gross income for the taxable year does not exceed $3,500."

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would now like to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment as proposed by the committee will bring within the terms of the present income tax law 2,700,000 additional income-tax payers. If my amendment is adopted it will save 2,700,000 people in the United States from the trouble and expense of filing income-tax returns.

My theory is that the amount of money the Government will receive by bringing within the law this large number of taxpayers is entirely too small to put that number of taxpayers to the trouble and expense to which this law would put them. It would only average $4.44 per taxpayer if you brought them within the law, and it takes an expert to file an income-tax return. They must obtain the services of some one who knows how to file an income-tax return. In order to do this, 2,700,000 people must pay for the benefit of expert services and then, when once filed, the amount of tax is so small they can not afford to litigate over it. They can not dispute with the Bureau of Internal Revenue or with the Secretary of the Treasury. In order that you may know that it does require an expert to file an income-tax return, I respectfully invite your attention to the fact that over a period of 8 years, from 1921 to 1928, inclusive, the Secretary of the Treasury, who, I presume, had the benefit of experts in filing his income-tax return, out of the 8 years that the Secretary of the Treasury himself filed such incometax returns 7, of those years he made mistakes; in 4 of those years he obtained refunds later from the Government by reason of his mistakes he made, and in 3 of those years he was later charged by the Government and paid an additional sum for the mistakes he made. So there is the Secretary of the Treasury, who really has charge of this income tax law, who out of eight years, in seven years made mistakes in his income-tax returns. Now, if the Secretary of the Treasury can not file an income-tax return properly, with the aid of all the best experts in the Nation, certainly you should not require these 2,700,000 people who do not have the benefit of the assistance of experts to file an income-tax return. The added expense to them will probably amount to more than the amount of the tax received by the Government.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes, although I realize my time has not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Because a single person now having a net income of $1,000 has to make a return, I can hardly see the point of the gentleman's amendment with respect to a $1,500 gross income, and I want to ask the gentleman if he is really serious in offering this amendment or if he just wanted to tell the story about the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PATMAN. The story was absolutely incidental. I have had all the time I wanted before a committee to talk about the Secretary of the Treasury holding office in violation of the law, and that was not my object at all. I just wanted to point out this case because it is on all fours with the point I am attempting to make.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If this large number of people, 2,700,000, are to be required to pay income taxes on small incomes, is it not possible, either in this body or in the other body, to devise a plan for a single sheet of paper on which to make the return, with one affidavit, where the person with such incomes receives it from one source?

Mr. PATMAN. But there is no effort made in this bill to so simplify income-tax returns, and we must presume this bill will pass in the same condition it is in now with regard to that matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to say, if I may in the gentleman's time, that I have paid an income tax ever since the first income tax law, and I know my return has never been correct, although it has been made with the aid of the experts down here in the Sergeant at Arms' office; and even this year it is wrong, because I forgot to take exemptions to which I was entitled.

Mr. PATMAN. And if the gentleman, with the aid of experts, can not properly prepare an income-tax return, how can we expect these 2,700,000 people who will just pay on the average $4.44 to properly prepare an income-tax return, and let it be said that this is a class that pays the major portion of all the local taxes. They pay every kind of tax on earth, not a tax on what they own, but more often a tax on what they owe. This is the class most of whom buy homes, and on a $5,000 home they will make a $1,000 payment, and then they do not pay local taxes on that $5,000 home as though they had only paid $1,000 on that home, but they are required to pay local taxes as though they owned a $5,000 home, which results in paying taxes not on what they own but a tax on what they owe, and something should certainly be done for them in this bill, in view of the fact the Government would get only $12,000,000 by forcing these 2,700,000 people to file income-tax returns which will average $4.44 to the Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is not the practical effect of the gentleman's amendment to leave the exemptions as they are, $1,500 for a single person and $3,500 for a married person, because if you do not file any return you do not pay any tax?

Mr. PATMAN. It is creating a legal presumption, I will say to the gentleman from New York, that a single man who only earns a gross income of $1,500 has sufficient deductions to enable him to eliminate any net income and thereby not have to pay any tax.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. The bill, as it stands to-day, places a maximum surtax, plus the normal tax, of 72 per cent on the citizens with large income, and surely the lower end of the income-tax brackets should be extended so as to broaden the base and require more of the citizens to contribute to this financial emergency of our Government.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for one ques-

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. I presume the chairman of the committee will admit that my figures are correct—that this will require 2,700,000 additional people to make income-tax returns, and that the amount received by the Government will be $12,-000,000. I received these figures from Mr. Beaman, who is sitting by the gentleman's side, and I presume they are

Mr. CRISP. They are partially correct. I think the number of additional returns is correct. I think the amount of money that will come in is about $12,000,000, but this lowering of the exemption runs all the way through the higher rates, including the richest man in the United States.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is clearly mistaken: the amendment provides that no return shall be

Mr. CRISP. I did not interrupt my friend when he was speaking.

Mr. PATMAN. But the gentleman is clearly mistaken.

Mr. CRISP. I am not mistaken. It is the gentleman from Texas who is mistaken. It runs all the way through the bill, and it will bring in $39,000,000. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] is absolutely correct. If these persons do not make a return, there is no way of collecting the tax on the lower incomes, and the effect is to continue the exemptions just as they are to-day. Now, where a single man with $2,000 net income is given an exemption of $1,000, and pays a tax of only $15 or $16, surely he is not burdened by an income tax.

Now, my friend had much to say, and I agree with him about the complications of making an income-tax return. The tax returns are complicated in the surtax class, but they are not complicated when you have an income under $5,000. There is a simple blank which anyone can fill in. I admit that I could not, without difficulty, fill in a blank if I were in the surtax class, but that is not involved here. I do not believe that this tax is burdensome, and I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Dyer) there were 6 ayes and 94 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 24, after the word "oath," insert "or under penalty of perjury on net income less than $5,000."

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment simply because in the experience of my State of Massachusetts, which has an income tax, there was found that small returns could be made simply under the penalty of perjury and so recited in the return. It prevents the bother and trouble of going before a notary public, when sometimes it is difficult to find one and sometimes the charge is excessive. It simply removes one of the unnecessary annoyances.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Has not Massachusetts some special law that would cover the situation? I am asking for information. It was just so stated to me.

Mr. DYER. Yes; they do.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there may be some special act in Massachusetts. Even so, what of it? Why can we not make this a law or regulation for the Federal Government and sign simply under penalty of perjury and save this added nuisance?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman's suggestion might be well in Massachusetts, if they have a law there covering it, but the Federal Government has no way of covering the matter, and under this act those making an income-tax return to the United States Government throughout the States are required to make oath to their return.

Mr. GIFFORD. The law would still be that all over $5,000 would have to make oath. I tried to offer this in order to save annoyance to the small taxpayer.

Mr. CRISP. Why should not a man with an income under $5,000 make oath to his return as well as a man with an income over $5,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Husband and wife: If a husband and wife living together have an aggregate net income for the taxable year of $2,500 or over, or an aggregate gross income for such year of $5,000 or

(1) Each shall make such a return, or (2) The income of each shall be included in a single joint return, in which case the tax shall be computed on the aggregate

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a brief statement. I had occasion to say a moment ago in the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Parman] that I doubted if I had ever been able with the aid of the experts sent to the National Capital from the Baltimore internal revenue collector's office to get my income-tax report correct. The tax I have paid each year is modest, and I have made every possible effort to have it letter correct. That is hard to do, if one has anything different from a fixed income from one source, or unless an individual literally keeps books on himself. For years past I have talked with many citizens who are employed at salaries above $5,000 up to about $8,000 and whose income is nearly fixed, although the deductions are not. I refer to newspaper editors, artists, railroad passenger and freight agents, district insurance managers, and others in business at fixed salaries which are considered good in these days. I have talked to many lawyers, dentists, and doctors in the little cities and the larger towns who know that their income over bad debts is $6,000 or $7,000, and they have all complained about the income-tax-return rigmarole.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have long thought that an alternative plan could be devised, by which the taxpayer could pay a flat rate without deductions and receive a small bonus for so doing, or he could elect to take the exemptions and send in his report on the big 6-page sheet.

On the short plan, the taxpayer would certify that his whole income was primarily from one source—salary—that he had taken in no boarders, rented no rooms, sold no property, suffered no stock-market or other losses. He would certify that his income was between $5,000 and $6,000 or between $6,000 and $7,000 or between $7,000 and $8,000, and he could thereupon be proportionately assessed, provided he relieved himself of the exemptions for dependents. In other words, an alternative plan. The taxpayer could elect which plan he would use.

It should be that a man who knew his whole income for one year was entirely from one source, was $8,000, could select the average amount between $8,000 and $7,000—which would be $7,500—and sign a 1-sheet affidavit and be relieved of the exemptions for dependents and pay the rate on $7,500. He could be given a small deduction for using the simple plan, provided he waived all exemptions. This plan could be easily brought down to the new low brackets in this bill, which will cause Federal income taxes to be paid by some 2,700,000 citizens who have not paid to Uncle Sam before. I give them a chance on a single sheet and give them a chance to make an honest affidavit which they will know to be absolutely correct.

As the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp] has said, the Treasury Department some years ago devised a simplified blank for those under $5,000. It is simpler than the full report but, nevertheless, it is hard for a great many.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to see this bill recommitted because of the time that would be lost, but I am inclined to think it might well be recommitted before separate votes are demanded on everything that has been placed in the bill the past few days, and if it is recommitted this alternative plan of reporting incomes under $3,000 might well be studied, the tax experts of the Treasury Department might look into it now.

Let them consider the great saving to the Federal Government by the simple alternative plan. Save money, cut red tape.

I went before the Committee on Ways and Means quite a number of years ago with the whole plan outlined, showing how it balanced almost exactly as an equitable tax on those with a single source of income, or with but one or two side items of income, and several minor exemptions. Members of the committee frowned on the plan then on the ground that the present plan had become set, and that the public would soon become used to it. Well, the public is not on to all of the quirks of a major income-tax blank yet, and here come more than 2,000,000 new taxpayers.

I hope that serious attention may be drawn to the matter, so that later either in our own Ways and Means Committee or in another body a plan will be offered to simplify a return blank for those having incomes under $8,000 or under $10,000.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BOYLAN. Would the gentleman make any provision at all for deductions?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The deduction would be on the percentage plan. If a man waived exemptions, he would pay a lower average tax, provided his income is not above $8,000, so that the $500 average allowance would equalize the situation, and he would be relieved of the necessity of claiming any exemptions. Of course, the taxpayer could elect to use either plan.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman would give him a bonus if he waived exemptions?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; a small bonus, and that simplifies the case to the Federal Government again.

Mr. BOYLAN. Where would the taxpayer get off?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The taxpayer who might pay $40 if he did not waive deductions might pay probably $41 or $42 if he waived deductions and would do it on a single affidavit. It would be worth $1 to him to know that he was honestly making his report and that it was correct.

Besides, he would not have to employ lawyers who do not want this work for those paying that small sum.

Mr. BOYLAN. According to the gentleman's plan he would pay 10 per cent more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not necessarily. He could go one bracket higher and play safe in his affidavit and save time and lawyers' fees.

Mr. BOYLAN. He would be compelled to pay more out. Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In my opinion he would not pay one-twentieth of 1 per cent extra, and he would be relieved of what he now pays out in the way of burning extra electric light and the hiring of lawyers.

Mr. BOYLAN. But look at the practice he is getting in mental arithmetic and bookkeeping.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, I know the gentleman is the greatest humorist in the House. He is a so-called wet leader, but his humor is extremely dry but always effective, as many of us have found out, and he is one of the real workers of Congress, always on the job. I wish he would look into the plan in detail. We can make it effective some day between now and the final enactment of this bill into law, some time late this summer. [Applause.]

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. May I ask the chairman of the committee as to whether or not this takes into consideration the community property laws in different States?

Mr. CRISP. They are not changed at all under the bill as reported. The community laws of the different States are not changed.

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) Requirement: Every corporation subject to taxation under this title shall make a return, stating specifically the items of its gross income and the deductions and credits allowed by this title. The return shall be sworn to by the president, vice president, or other principal officer, and by the treasurer or assistant treasurer. In cases where receivers, trustees in bankruptcy, or assignees are operating the property or business of corporations, such receivers, trustees, or assignees shall make returns for such corporations in the same manner and form as corporations are required to make returns. Any tax due on the basis of such returns made by receivers, trustees, or assignees shall be collected in the same manner as if collected from the corporations of whose business or property they have custody and control.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I realize that it would be futile to offer an amendment to this section but would remind the House that all corporation officers, no matter how small the corporation, must make a return under oath from carefully prepared and exact bookkeeping. A simple affidavit should often be all that is necessary.

Officers of those corporations have many annoying experiences, by being forced by Government officials to keep elaborate sets of books. Take any eleemosynary institution, for example, and my own experience on one occasion. I attempted to help a soldier who had controlled and acted as manager and treasurer of a small corporation and been away for three years during the war. We endeavored to make up a return from the disordered books but were forced by the Government to go so thoroughly through several years' activities of this company, which was not organized to make money, that it cost us several hundred dollars. In such a case a simple affidavit by the treasurer should have been sufficient.

There are thousands of small corporations losing money all the time, which are now forced to have accountants and bookkeepers and then are finally obliged to make oath to the faithful and accurate bookkeeping. This is a material and unnecessary cost. The individual does not have to make any return unless he has a net income of a thousand dollars. Why should a corporation be treated differently? Why is it necessary for a corporation to go through such an elaborate performance when only losses are apparent? Some relief should be granted here, but I fully realize that it would be useless to offer an amendment which would allow such small corporations to make simple affidavits as to their losses.

However, I just wanted to bring to the attention of the House that this is another of those nuisances which make the income tax so exceedingly unpopular. I may say to the gentleman from Washington that the other day I placed in the RECORD a statement to the effect that it costs the taxpayers of this country $400,000,000 a year to make their returns. This also indicates that this is a most questionable method of securing revenue.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Consolidated returns: For provision as to consolidated returns of affiliated corporations, see section 141.

Mr. PATMAN offered an amendment, which the Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 19, after the word "returns," add the following: "No affiliated groups of corporations, subject to the provisions of the internal revenue act, shall have the privilege of making a consolidated return."

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. CRISP. I would like to say to the gentleman from Texas that the subcommittee now considering a substitute plan for the manufacturers' sales tax title, which was eliminated, is seriously considering bringing in some amendment dealing with these affiliated and consolidated returns. Therefore I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that we pass over, with the gentleman's amendment pending, the consolidated-returns provisions of this bill until the Ways and Means Committee brings in its amendment. Nobody's rights are deprived thereby.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman include section 141, on page 108 of the bill, in his request?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the request made by the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Georgia is granted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 55. PUBLICITY OF RETURNS

Returns made under this title shall be open to inspection in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as returns made under Title II of the revenue act of 1926.

Mr. LaGUARDIA offered an amendment, which the Clerk reported, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LaGuardia: Page 47, line 18, strike out all of section 55 and insert in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 55. PUBLICITY OF RETURNS

"(a) Returns upon which the tax has been determined by the commissioner shall constitute public records; but they shall be open to inspection only upon order of the President and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary and approved by the President: Provided, That the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Finance of the Senate, or a special committee of the Senate or House shall have the right to call on the Secretary of the Treasury for, and it shall be his duty to furnish, any data of any character contained in or shown by the returns, or any of them, that may be required by the committee; and any such committee shall have the right, acting directly as a committee, or by and through such examiners or agents as it may designate or appoint, to inspect all or any of the returns at such times and in such manner as it may determine; and any relevant or useful information thus obtained may be submitted by the committee obtaining it to the Senate or the be submitted by the committee obtaining it to the Senate or the House, or to both the Senate and House, as the case may be: Provided further, That the proper officers of any State may, upon the request of the governor thereof, have access to the returns of any corporation, or to an abstract thereof showing the name and income of the corporation, at such times and in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe: Provided further, That all bona fide shareholders of record owning 1 per cent or more of the outstanding stock of any corporation shall, upon making request of the commissioner, be allowed to examine the annual income returns of such corporation and of its subsidiaries. Any shareholder who pursuant to the provisions of this section is allowed to examine the return of any corporation, and who makes known in any manner whatever not provided by law the amount or source of income, profits, losses, expenditures, or any particular thereof set forth or disclosed in any such return, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

"(b) The commissioner shall as soon as practicable in each year cause to be prepared and made available to public inspection in such manner as he may determine, in the office of the collector in each internal-revenue district and in such other places as he may determine, lists containing the name and the post-office address of each person making an income-tax return in such district together with the amount of the income tax paid by such person. in such district,

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman kindly state the changes he proposes?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. None of this amendment is new or original. It is all taken from previous acts, particularly the act of 1924, which lasted but one short year and then was repealed. In substance, my first long paragraph, I think, is

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman has not included the right of any joint committee to get these returns?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I believe that is fully covered.

Mr. CRISP. That was put in the 1926 law, I think, so that the gentleman is narrowing it so far as the joint committee is concerned.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. That can be taken care of by a committee amendment. The real meat of my proposed amendment is paragraph (b), which was very wholesome as long as it lasted. Paragraph (b) simply makes public the names and addresses of taxpayers under this law, as well as the amount they pay. In other words, it is the same as the law in every State as to taxes on real property and in many States on income taxes.

After quite a struggle in this House we did enact this section (b) in the act of 1924. It was very wholesome. It was so wholesome that very influential interests got together and had this provision with reference to publicity repealed in the subsequent act.

I want to refer to the splendid fight that was waged on the floor of this House by the now distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. In that fight, if I-remember correctly, he was supported by the present distinguished Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. There was strong opposition to the publicity provision from the Republican side of the House. The Ways and Means Committee at the time was under the control of the Republicans. They brought in an amendment repealing the publicity provision after one short year of trial. The Democrats opposed the repeal.

I offer it at this time because we have had experience with the publicity provision and know that it is necessary. It is productive of revenue, and there is no sound reason that may be urged against it.

Some one may suggest, without reading the amendment and not being familiar with the law, that it would make possible access to a man's private business. It does not. There are no details made public. Only certain authorities can have access to the details of the returns. All this does is to make public the names of the taxpayers and the amount of the taxes they pay under this law.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BACON. It will at least open up all these lists to every panhandler, advertising agency, and competitor of a man in his business.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The lists are to be made public the same as every other tax record is public. Can the gentleman mention taxes in any State that are not a matter of public record? I believe these lists should be a matter of public record, as was the case under the law of 1924. There is nothing novel about it. It has been under discussion for a great many years. It has been resisted for a long time.

I want to recall to the committee the fight that was put up against it. I do not know but what the gentleman from Georgia resisted its repeal. I know there was quite a fight waged on the floor of this House at the time, and if I am not mistaken the repeal was carried by practically a party

I submit that we have learned from experience the benefit of having this publicity provision in the law. There is no reason why it should not be there. I repeat, it does not expose a man's business to the scrutiny of his competitors, as was suggested by my colleague from New York [Mr. BACON ].

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the LaGuardia amendment. I am in hearty agreement with the gentleman from New York and I hope his amendment will be agreed to.

I remember the fight we had in 1924 on this proposition, a very bitter fight. The amendment was opposed on the floor of this House, but at that time we got it through. I remember the fight we had when it was repealed. If I remember correctly, as the gentleman from New York said, the Speaker of this House and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey] made a hard fight to keep it in the law at that time.

I do not see any great dangers, as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Bacon], in regard to panhandlers and the competitors of these concerns. If it were a question of their being able to go in and get all the details of a man's business, I would be inclined to agree with the gentleman; but it seems to me that anything which would shed a little light for the benefit of the American people on the amounts which are paid into the Treasury of the United States, without going into the details, certainly can not do any harm but will give the people an opportunity to determine just where the concentration of wealth in the United States is.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to making all that information public to any committee of the House or Senate.

Mr. CONNERY. Why not the American people?

Mr. BACON. Because it will simply result in a great deal of abuse. People will go in and get lists of everybody who pays any income taxes at all and sell them to charities, fake charities, panhandlers, advertising agencies, and so on.

Mr. CONNERY. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] has said, every State has these records and they are open to panhandlers and organizations and that has not led to any harm.

Mr. BACON. But they do not publish them.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. As the gentleman from New York has said, the Bureau of Internal Revenue annually submits to the Congress a list of those who receive refunds and the amounts of such refunds and they are published in the papers.

Mr. BACON. And they should be published.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is published every year.
Mr. BACON. I have no objection to Congress finding out all such information with respect to a man's return.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Why should the representatives of the Government have the information and the public generally not have it?

Mr. BACON. I want to protect the individual from being pestered.

Mr. CONNERY. I have always believed, even though the rules of the House and the rules of the committees have taken an opposite view, that there should not be such a thing, for instance, as executive sessions in committee. There is a lot of work done behind closed doors about which the American people are entitled to have some knowledge. I have never believed in casting a vote on this floor or saying anything in committee which would not be open to the people. And right along that line I do not see any objection to the people getting all the knowledge about these returns to which they are entitled.

Mr. PEAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. PEAVEY. May I say to the gentleman that we have in our State of Wisconsin an income tax law that was adopted in 1911, with full publicity; and while bitterly contested at the time of its adoption, there is not a particle of opposition to the law in our State to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. And I think we should have the same thing here.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MILLARD. Does not the gentleman think that a matter of such moment should have been taken up in the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. CONNERY. It has been fully discussed on the floor of this House time and time again and on two different tax bills, and once it was put on the bill and then later taken out of the bill after a bitter fight.

I think the committee should adopt the LaGuardia

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I would not have risen, and probably I do so futilely, but I am astounded that there is no opposition to this amendment from the Ways and Means Committee. I do not know any subject that is more familiar to this House than the subject of publicity of income-tax returns. It was tried for one year and was then repealed, and I never imagined it would be advocated again by anybody in any Congress.

The reasons for its repeal were well known at the time. It had served as an instrument, not only for the blackmailers and the preyers on people of means, but it had violated a fundamental principle of America—that there is left some privacy in a man's affairs. That is the big question involved here.

I am not arguing for the man who files a big income-tax return any more than for the little fellow. What business is it of anybody in this country what a man earns, except the Government, for the purpose of collecting taxes? Why should anybody have to disclose his earnings to the world? If you disclose just what a man pays in income taxes, it is easy to compute what he has earned. Is there any privacy left in this country?

Where are the Ways and Means Committee members? Surely, if they did not incorporate this publicity provision in the bill, they can not possibly now approve of it. The subject must have been somewhere in the back of their minds. What are we coming to when, again, we revive a nuisance like this? The gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardial is incorrect when he says it was taken out of the law by a partisan vote. Scores of men on this side of the House, including myself, voted to take it out, after a year's trial.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman is quite right. The gentleman did vote that way.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It had offended all the rights and all the privileges of American citizens when their strictly private affairs were exposed to the public. It is a late hour now to revive a pernicious law like this which was denounced universally throughout the United States. I therefore now call on the members of the Ways and Means Committee to defend this bill against such an additional assault and to stand up for their bill and not further ruin it or further cause its defeat in this body or in another body. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. Was it not shown at that time that such publicity worked to the detriment of some small interests or small businesses?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Surely, it did. The suggestion that you do not disclose in detail the way a man conducts his business is just an evasion of the fundamental question involved. Once you show what a man makes or what he pays in taxes, I repeat, it is easy to compute his earnings; and it is nobody's business, except the Government's, how much money he makes or how much he pays in income taxes. Immediately, when his competitors find out how much money he makes, then every panhandler in America, every soliciting organization in America, every organization looking for a hand-out, even his relatives, are after him, and they know how far they can go with him. I submit it is no fairer to the man with a return of a $10 tax than it is to the man with a $10,000,000 income.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. BACON. As a matter of fact, a man making a small income who has disclosed what he is making may have his credit seriously hurt.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Surely. The only theory that would justify this publicity provision is that it would aid the Government in preventing evasion of taxes. That is the only possible theory. There is no proof that one year of publicity with respect to income-tax returns helped the Government in catching the evaders of taxes. The opposite was demonstrated, and this obnoxious provision was repealed.

Mr. CONNERY. Would the gentleman be in favor of New York State and all other States repealing their law?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I can not let a false impression prevail here. New York does not publish the amount of taxes paid on income-tax returns.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It does on real estate.

Mr. O'CONNOR. On real estate, yes; but these taxes are assessed against the property and not in the name of the individual. I am talking about income-tax returns, and the day will never come when the great State of New York will give publicity to its income-tax returns.

Mr. LAMBETH. I want to say to the gentleman that the State of North Carolina has never published income-tax returns or amounts.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And I am confident never will.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. We have adopted an income-tax system in this country whereby we obtain revenue for Federal purposes. We have no intention of embarrassing business by it, and therefore we do not wish to interfere with business but to make the income-tax returns as profitable to the Government as possible.

In the case of real property there is no question involved as to whether anyone knows how much tax you pay. Everyone knows you pay a certain rate on an assessed valuation, but Government income tax involves the very life of business in many instances. For instance, here is a corporation or a partnership of individuals supposed to be making a considerable amount of money, and the inference is that they should pay a large tax. But in the latter part of the taxable year they suffer reverses, resulting in deductions from their gross income. The amount of income reported fairly and justly is much less than those who follow the course these businesses had anticipated, and consequently the first cry will be from competitors that the corporation is evading taxes. Consequently the credit of the corporation will be attacked. Moreover, it will hurt the credit of the corporation with the banks.

Mr. BACON. And the same might be true of the individual.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; I include the individual with the corporation. We have had this provision for one year. It worked unsatisfactorily. In addition to the things that have been said against it, and which I indorse, an immense amount of detail is necessary to the preparation of the returns. Since the lack of background and information about the several corporations or individuals who pay the tax would cause the public generally to draw incorrect conclusions, such publicity would result in unintended injury. They know nothing of what the business conditions were or what the operations were during the year, and it would be unfair and unjust to these individuals and corporations who are doing an honorable business.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman recall what the Treasury Department had to say about the publicity measure when it was repealed?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; I do not know.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Mellon had a lot to say about it.

Mr. BLANTON. Anybody could wire to the district of the gentleman from Oregon and get the amount of tax that he pays on his real estate and on his personal-property tax and his school taxes, but no information can be obtained about his Federal income taxes.

Mr. HAWLEY. You do not have to wire; you can come to me, and I will show what it is.

Mr. BLANTON. If that is true, why is it not proper to have information about Federal returns?

Mr. HAWLEY. To continue the remarks that I was making a moment ago, we are now passing on to the people of the United States a tremendous burden of taxation, out of a clear sky, as it were, from $184,000,000 surplus to $903,-000,000 deficit in a year. It is a credit crisis for the institutions that will bear the burden that Congress is putting upon them. Now, to come in with this kind of an amendment, which will, under the circumstances, impair their credit, when we are more than doubling the demand, seems to me unjust, unfair, and unwise.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PATMAN: Amend the LaGuardia amendment by inserting at the end of said amendment the following:

"Provided, That when an application for a refund, credit, or abatement is made, the income-tax return upon which such application is made shall become subject to examination by a Member of Congress."

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that when one makes an application for a refund, credit, or abatement of his income tax that he has paid, the application and the return upon which it is based should be open to public inspection; but I do not believe the House would approve an amendment like that. However, I do believe it is reasonable, and the House should seriously consider adopting an amendment that would permit any Member of Congress, a representative of the people elected by the people, to look after the people's business, to examine that application and the tax returns upon which the application is based. There should not be any objection to that. I invite your attention to the fact that during the last 3,000 days our Federal Government has remitted to the taxpayers of this Nation three thousand millions of dollars, on an average of a million dollars a day, in tax refunds, credits, and abatements. A total of $3,000,000,000—more than enough to cover the deficit.

No one can examine those returns. It is true that if the refund amounts to as much as $75,000, a joint committee has the right to pass on the income-tax returns and the applications for refunds, credits, and abatements; but if the amount is less than that, no one has a right to go into those income-tax returns for the purpose of determining whether or not the refund was made in the manner and form required by law, unless, of course, there is some litigation that causes it to go to the Board of Tax Appeals.

I invite further attention to the fact that the city of Chicago has had a secret tax system. An interesting article was written about that secret tax system not long since. The writer of the article warned the American people not to keep their assessments secret. That should apply not only to the city of Chicago but to every State, county, and municipal government, and the Federal Government as well. Here is what happened in Chicago. It was discovered in an investigation that one man would be paying $5 taxes on his home, while the man next door would be paying $50 taxes on a home that had the same value, and the one next to him was paying $500 on a similar home. The reason why the man who was paying $5 on that valuation was because of a political pull that he had and the secrecy of the returns, and it is my understanding that as a result of those fraudulent returns which resulted by reason of a secret tax system, all assessments were declared void. To-day Chicago is very much in the red and trace it back and it all comes from a secret, tax system. Certainly there should be some way that representatives of the people should have the right to examine a tax return when the one who filed that return is making application for public funds to be returned to him. I urge the committee to seriously consider this amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I hope neither one of these amendments will be adopted. I can see no useful purpose to be subserved by making public the amount of the tax the taxpayer pays. I proceed upon the presumption that the Government officials are honorable and honest, and that they will perform their duty. I think the only one who has any concern in an individual taxpayer's return is the Government, to see that the full amount of taxes due by the taxpayer is collected. I can see how publishing the amount might satisfy the curiosity of some of the taxpayer's neighbors, and it opens the matter for his enemies to try to make all sorts of difficulties for him. I can not see any good in making the matter public. Under the law to-day the Committee on Ways and Means and the Finance Committee of the Senate, the two legislative bodies representing the Congress, have the right to examine these returns. Also, under the law which my friend from Texas referred to, where a tax return is over $75,000, the whole income-tax returns of the taxpayer are subject to scrutiny by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and that committee has a staff of experts who review them. For the last seven years the Speaker of this House has been on that joint committee, and the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the two ranking majority Members are on it. That is true of the Senate. Five members of the Senate Committee on Finance are on that committee. I can assure you that the staff of that joint committee, headed by Mr. PARKER, are honest and capable and that they go into all of those returns and submit them to this joint committee.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. It is my understanding that when one concern made application for a refund the application was not passed on, and each year they would make additional applications. Finally one refund was made, and when that refund was authorized and made the Bureau of Internal Revenue turned the case over to the joint committee, and in doing so it furnished the joint committee with six truckloads of papers in connection with that case. If that is true, does the gentleman think it is possible for that joint committee to officially pass on such returns and refunds in cases like that?

Mr. CRISP. I am sure the gentleman refers to the case of the United States Steel Corporation. I answer the gentleman frankly, that no committee is going to consider six carloads of documents, and I am equally confident that no Member of Congress would do it either. [Laughter.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I know I followed along with some of the ablest men in this House in opposition to the repeal of the provision I am offering. Have conditions so changed that support of this policy of publicity has been abandoned?

Mr. CRISP. I know the House is divided as to what is the wisest thing to do in this case, and I accord to each Member sincerity of purpose and desire to serve our country. My own view upon it is that no useful public purpose will be subserved by publishing the amount of the returns. I grant you it would satisfy the curiosity of some of our neighbors and friends.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia be allowed to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Would not the publishing of the amounts paid in taxes under this bill and the names of the taxpayers serve some useful purpose? For instance, if there was published the names and amount of tax paid by Capone and the other racketeers under the brewers' wort-tax provisions, would not material assistance be given to the law-enforcement agencies of this Government?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think so.

Mr. SCHAFER. I believe it would.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. I would like to ask the gentleman if this feature was considered in committee?

Mr. CRISP. It was not.

Mr. KVALE. Is it not true that when this was last considered in 1926 the gentlemen who were members of the Ways and Means Committee upon the chairman's side of the aisle were, to a large degree, favorable to the then existing statute, which we are to-day attempting to reenact?

Mr. CRISP. I do not have sufficient information to answer the gentleman. I do not know.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, if I could secure recognition, which I can not at the moment, I would like to state that there is ample evidence in the RECORD of the debates at that time, and to cite from it.

Mr. CRISP. That is much more satisfactory than any recollection I might have.

Mr. HADLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. HADLEY. Is it not a fact that the present law, passed in 1926, is a compromise between the two schools of thought, one for no publicity and one for vexatious and unnecessary publicity, and that that trial, under the act of 1926, has been so satisfactory that the Ways and Means Committee has had no protests, no appearance has been made upon hearing, and no demand made for this amendment or any similar amendment?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman's statement is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia be allowed to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. May I suggest to the gentleman that in the case of the United States Steel Co., they delivered six truckloads of papers, and it is true the committee could not look over those papers in the allotted time. Neither could a Member of Congress; but if there had been a law which provided that the minute an application was filed it would permit a Member of Congress to look into the case, possibly this case would have been looked into many years before the final refund was granted.

Mr. CRISP. That is possible. But under the law then either the Ways and Means Committee of the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate, the committees which deal with internal-revenue taxation, had the right to review it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Would the gentleman regard it as a good definition of his word "curiosity," when I tell him that the morning after the law was in effect relating to publicity of tax returns, in my State of Massachusetts the first ones whom the newspapers carried in their columns were 16 Congressmen from Massachusetts.

Mr. CRISP. I am willing to have them examine my returns.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Peavey] has said that we have this law in effect in Wisconsin and that there has not been any protest whatsoever against it. I call the gentleman's attention and the attention of the House to the fact that only recently the private affairs, the private income of every taxpayer in Wisconsin was featured in the public press, to the humilitation of those taxpayers great and small. This amendment does not affect me, because we have this "snooping" amendment into our private affairs in the State of Wisconsin, and I suppose that character of "snooping" will continue for years and years, as long as the present administration is in control of the affairs of that State. But I am calling upon you to rise up here and protest against this "snooping" amendment, especially at this time. It has only one purpose, and that is to increase discontent against those who fortunately have some little income. The gentleman from New York cites the instance that real-estate taxes and personal-property taxes are public. They are not public, not listed as to total amounts paid by an individual in my State nor in any other State, but a "snooper," a sniper may go and collect them. They may collect the amount of taxes for personal property and for real-estate taxes that any one person pays by going through the entire tax rolls if their curiosity impels them to that extreme.

Now, I have heard the prune-box orators on the streets of Detroit call upon the unemployed to rise up en masse and confiscate the fortunes and wealth of those who have estates. That was within the last six months, and within a month they marched out to the gates of Dearborn in the guise of trying to bring relief to the unemployed, with the obvious purpose to tear down the pillars of our Government. If there was ever a time when we should hold our senses and not add fuel to the flames of discontent, to those who are alien to the sentiments of our civilization, it is now. [Applause.] The very purpose of this amendment is to stir up sedition, to arouse discontent against existing order. Of what other avail will it be? That is the purpose, the covert purpose of this amendment, and I hope it is voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

This bill may add no money to the Public Treasury. It may not help balance the Budget, but it is certainly going to add to the vocabulary, and may balance the vocabulary.

I predict that the gentleman from Wisconsin will never be known for the many points of order he makes, but surely, after to-day, he is going to get eternal fame for coining the word "snoozer." [Laughter.]

This bill, instead of being called an act for raising revenue, should be called an act for raising hell, and the amendment offered by my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] is certainly accommodating in that respect.

I think a proper amendment, along the line of publicity, would be an amendment to the effect that the collector of internal revenue post the names of the people in his community who do not pay any taxes. If taxation without representation is tyranny, what is representation without taxation?

For the last two or three weeks in the House we have had squawking and squealing from various parts of the country because at last the Congress had a plan by which some people who never pay any taxes might be called upon to pay a modicum of taxes, and that proposition was defeated.

In addition to making the people who pay taxes pay their taxes we now insist on this publicity. We all know about the unanimous wave of protest that rose all over the country when the newspapers featured the prominent people of the community who happened to be in a position to pay income taxes. The protest was almost universal throughout this land.

You have bedeviled this bill in as many ways as possible. You have done everything you could to keep the country from approving this tax bill—the Democrats by troubles among themselves, the Republicans by sitting back and jeering, and the White House by being silent. This kind of an amendment to the administrative feature of the bill is just another step in the direction of not passing any tax bill in the near future.

I do not believe this amendment—not in the interest of the United States Government, not in the interest of the American taxpayers, but in the interest of the great curiosity bloc—should pass. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I believe this amendment instead of turning on the light will merely turn on the keyhole. (Laughter and ap-especially at this time. It has only one purpose, and that is to increase discontent against those who fortunately have some little income. The gentleman from New York cites the increase that real-estate taxes and personal-property taxes Wisconsin?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the word I intended to use. I know the gentleman knew the word I intended to use.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I knew that. When the provision was passed placing a tax of 65 per cent on incomes of $5,000,000 I felt heartbroken. I felt like the old lady who sat near the fireplace when a brick fell down the chimney. She wept. Neighbors came in and asked her why she cried. She said, "Well, if I had a daughter and that daughter had a child, and that poor little baby was sitting in the chimney place where that brick fell down the brick might have killed it." [Laughter.] Of course, I will never have an income affected by that unfair tax. Now, when they want to publish what I have got I am moved to real tears. I am moved to tears for all my friends mourning over the remains of golden days.

When the publication took place years ago nobody knew what losses a man had; nobody knew what credits he had; nobody knew in what kind of business enterprises his investments were made; and yet because he was known as a man who made, for instance, $25,000 he was looked upon as an absolute thief if he had not reported an income to the Government of $25,000. Could anything be more unfair?

We are dealing with one of the most intricate, complex, and technical things in the world when we are dealing with the income tax. We are not dealing with an appraisal of a piece of real estate made by public authorities and published in public books, but we are dealing with the most private thing a man has. A man and his wife may report joint income taxes. How do we know but what the lady might have lost something and it was deducted from her husband's income? Must we invite all America to cross-examine her? Must we spy and snipe and snoop into the private affairs of our people? This Government is invading private business and invading the homes, and the way to stop it from invading the privacy of a man's credit and the privacy of his business is by defeating an amendment such as this. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Staffosd) there were—ayes 18, noes 123.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) Time of payment: The total amount of tax imposed by this title shall be paid on the 15th day of March following the close of the calendar year, or, if the return should be made on the basis of a fiscal year, then on the 15th day of the third month following the close of the fiscal year.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I can readily understand the nervousness of certain gentlemen when even remote mention is made about public scrutiny of the records of the incomes of public officials. We have had many instances of the value of income-tax publicity.

In my city at this time the people are receiving a very liberal education about the necessity of publicity on incomes. I am not surprised at that opposition at all, but I am surprised at some of my Republican Members from New York State joining in this kissing party with their colleagues from Tammany Hall.

Mr. BOYLAN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOYLAN. I would like to know if, under the rules, post mortems are allowed. The gentleman's amendment was defeated and I do not think time should be consumed in holding a post mortem.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. BOYLAN. My point of order is that it is against the rules of the House to deliver post mortems.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, you can only make a proper diagnosis, sometimes, by a post mortem.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I am talking about the close of the fiscal year, and the close of the year is going to come very soon for certain people.

Why, not even in the days of the absolute power of Andrew Mellon were such statements made as were made today in opposition to a provision in our revenue law which every Member of the House should know is absolutely necessary. I was quite surprised to see the distinguished floor leader of the majority party, from whom I learned all about the necessity of tax publicity, vote in opposition to this amendment. I sat here as a young Member listening to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey], to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Garner], and to other distinguished members of the Ways and Means Committee on the Democratic side urging the necessity for such return publicity.

Oh, gentlemen, this fight on publicity is not over—not by any means. I am confident that before this bill leaves the Capitol there will be a proper publicity provision in the law, because it is necessary.

So much was said, Mr. Chairman, about the corporation or the individual that has no credit and has no income. Is it the purpose of the law to help misinformation and misstatements on a financial statement? What argument is that? Is it the purpose of the law to help evasion of the law? Every one of us will remember that following the act of 1924 we had the greatest number of returns, and accurate returns, because of the publicity provision. It was so wholesome that one of the most powerful lobbies, which the gentleman from Illinois at the time described here on the floor of the House, was busy until Congress repealed it. I am quite sure it was almost a party vote. I voted to retain the publicity provision and against its repeal. Perhaps my colleague from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] did vote to eliminate it: I would not be surprised if he did. In the days of Boss Tweed, of New York fame, Mr. Chairman, when our taxes on realty in New York were secret, conditions became so rotten as to create national scandal. It resulted in a change in our law in New York State, and such records are now public. There is real necessity for a publicity provision in all tax laws.

In the days of Tweed one of the chief sources of the many sources of graft was from evasion of taxes by owners of property through favoritism in assessments.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And after an investigation was had, first, a private investigation by the property owners themselves—the House will recall history—and then by the legislature, there was established the system we have now where all tax records are public.

I submit that this provision was tried but one short year, and it was so effective, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey] at the time, as to bring down here this powerful lobby and cause its repeal. I am confident, before long there will be a publicity provision written into the law.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that if we are going to make any headway with this bill, we ought to proceed, and the only way to proceed is to proceed. If every Member who proposes an amendment, after the amendment has been discussed, debated, and a vote taken on it, is dissatisfied with the vote of the House, is going to deliver a post mortem on why his amendment was lost, is going to lecture the House as to why they voted a certain way, I do not think we are going to make much headway with the bill.

I believe in a full discussion. I respect every man's opinion, and I would like him to have respect for mine. But there must be an end somewhere. If, after a proper debate, after intelligent discussion, the House takes a vote on a proposition, to my mind that orderly procedure should settle the matter.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. BOYLAN. Then, why get up and deliver such a sad speech, because you lost your amendment? You had a fair discussion, you received the verdict of the House; why not take it like a sportsman, why get up and squeal and holler, when struck by the harpoon? [Laughter.] Of course, the gentleman can not win all the time. Even the greatest leader has to meet temporary reverses. [Laughter.]

I find in life that we should be satisfied to achieve the mean average of things. The gentleman can not sit in the sun all the time; he has to be in the shade and the shadow occasionally. Last week the gentleman was basking in the sun, but to-day it fails to shine on him. [Laughter.]

Why not strike an average? Say 50-50. The gentleman is better off than 50 to-day. [Laughter.] Why doth he protest so vehemently when victory fails to perch on his banner. [Laughter.]

Of course, if the gentleman won all the time, the House would be lopsided. [Laughter.] I am sure the gentleman does not want that to happen, because the gentleman—and I have known him for many years, and I respect him—I know he would be the most disappointed man in the world if everything always went on quietly and peacefully. [Laughter.] It is not in his nature, and I respect him for it. If the gentleman presents a proposition and fortune fails to smile on him, why not smile it off and be goodnatured and try again? Mr. Chairman, I merely make this interpolation in order to expedite the passage of this bill. [Laughter and applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

As soon as practicable after the return is filed the commissioner shall examine it and shall determine the correct amount of the tax.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I rise to call the attention of the chairman and the members of the Ways and Means Committee, and especially the Democratic members, to a matter, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, that they are going to consider the question of striking out section 141, page 108, line 19, in regard to consolidated returns.

I want to call attention to the fact that in the Seventieth Congress our able Speaker at that time offered an amendment, when the control of the House was in the hands of Republicans, and the Democratic minority, assisted by a number of Republicans, voted to strike this section out, and the Speaker at that time contended it would save $24,000,000. I trust that the members of the Committee on Ways and Means will go back and refer to page 601 of the Record of the Seventieth Congress, first session, and they will see for themselves the argument made at that time. On page 605 of that Record will be found the vote by tellers, and it was agreed to. It was finally put back by the Senate. I hope that the Committee on Ways and Means will consider and strike that out.

Mr. CRISP. The committee is giving that attention.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, when in committee the surtaxes were increased to 72 per cent on the larger incomes, I stated to the committee that I would undertake to compile data as to the income taxes in various States and what the combined income taxes of the State imposing an income tax and the Federal income tax would mean. At my request, Mr. Parker, chief of staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, has made that compilation. There are 28 States which have income taxes in some form. In a majority of the States the maximum rate is not high, but the tax has a broad base and reaches down to single persons with net incomes of about $1,000 and married people with a net income of about $2,000. In a majority of the cases the rate of taxes is about 5 per cent on net incomes of over $15,000. If a man lives in one of these States, which Mr. Parker calls average States, and happens to have an income of over $5,000,000, he will pay 77 cents in income taxes out of every dollar that he makes, leaving him only 23 cents out of his earned dollar. The highest tax is in Wisconsin, and if a man living in the State of Wisconsin is fortunate enough to have an income of over $5,000,000, he will pay a maximum tax of 72 cents on the dollar to the Federal Government and 15 cents to the State of Wisconsin, making a grand total income tax of 87 cents on the dollar. I ask unanimous consent to print this data in the RECORD so that Members of the House may study it and consider it, because when the bill comes back into the House I am going to ask for a separate vote on that amendment to see whether the House really wants it or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert the matter referred to in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION, Washington, March 22, 1932.

Washington, March 22, 1932.

Hon. Henry T. Rainey,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Congressman: In accordance with the request from your office in regard to State income taxes and the maximum burden which would result from these taxes in conjunction with the surtax amendment agreed to by the Committee of the Whole House, the following information is submitted:

Twenty-eight States have income taxes of some form, and therefore the citizens of over one-half of the States have to pay income taxes not only to the Federal Government but also to the State governments.

In the majority of the States the maximum rate of tax is fairly low, but the tax has a broad base, reaching down to single persons with net income of about $1,000 and to married persons with net income of about $2,000. It is roughly estimated that in the majority of cases the maximum rate of tax is about 5 per cent on majority of cases the maximum rate of tax is about 5 per cent on net incomes of over $15.000.

If a man lives in one of these average States and happens to have an income over $5,000,000, he will pay 77 cents in income tax out of every dollar he makes in excess of that amount, leaving him only 23 cents out of his earned dollar.

There is attached hereto a résumé of the individual income-tax rates in 20 States, these being all we could secure in the time available. The following comments are supported by the data given in this résumé. given in this résumé:

If a man living in the State of Wisconsin is fortunate enough to have an income of over $5.000,000, he will pay a maximum tax of 72 cents on the dollar to the Federal Government and 15 cents to Wisconsin, making a grand total income tax of 87 cents on the

A man with a similar income in New York, Illinois, Massachusetts, North Carolina, and North Dakota will pay a maximum tax of 72 cents on the dollar to the Federal Government and 6 cents on the dollar to the States. making a grand total of 78 cents on the dollar.

In the case of Arkansas, Georgia, Oklahoma, and South Carolina, the maximum combined rate of tax will be 77 cents on the

In view of the financial difficulties facing the States, it would not be surprising if the income-tax rates in the various States were substantially increased in the near future.

Trusting the above will meet your requirements,

Very respectfully,

L. H. PARKER, Chief of Stuff.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) In determining the period for which the taxpayer has held (d) In determining the period for which the taxpayer has held stock or securities the acquisition of which (or the contract or option to acquire which) resulted in the nondeductibility (under section 118 of this act or the revenue act of 1928, relating to wash sales) of the loss from the sale or other disposition of substantially identical stock or securities, there shall be included the period for which he held the stock or securities the loss from the sale or other disposition of which was not deductible.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of having the gentleman, tired though as he may be, explain this change in the administrative features, so far as the capital net gain or loss provision is concerned. There have been abuses in the way individuals, and in some instances corporations, have sold stocks that have depreciated in price and repurchased them. We have read subsection (d), which is the only change to correct the evil that is acknowledged generally to have existed ever since the capital net gain or loss provision was incorporated in the law. I think it would be informing to the committee to have some member of the Ways and Means Committee explain as to what is sought to be effected by this

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the important provisions of the administrative features. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Vinson] was on that subcommittee, and I shall ask him to make reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph fills a gap in the wash-sales provision. To illustrate, a person who owns $50,000 stock in a corporation and has held it for more than two years; it has depreciated in value, say, to $25,000; he sells the stock at the market price and buys same amount of stock same day. Under a former law he could take advantage of the total $25,000 loss. That gap was filled up by prior legislation. After that law was passed the taxpayer, or some shrewd counsel, conceived the idea that he could sell the stock a second time and buy same amount of stock a second time. After he sold this stock for $25,000 he would go into the market again and buy the same kind of stock back for $25,000. Under prevailing law he can take credit for $25,000 loss on his gross income. This new provision says that if he sells the second time, as his shrewd counsel advised him to do, he can not deduct the net loss of $25,000 from the gross income. All he can do under this subsection (d) is to take credit for 121/2 per cent of that loss from his gross income.

Mr. STAFFORD. In all other particulars, however, any person who has suffered a loss in a stock transaction and sells the stock in a bona fide way may deduct that loss from his income-tax return.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee seeks to strengthen what was intended formerly in respect to these wash-sales provisions by preventing a man from taking a loss a second time.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. When a man sells the same stock a second time and buys it back for same price, this law prevents him from getting a complete credit for the original loss and limits it to 121/2 per cent of the loss. In the fiscal year of 1933, $7,500,000 will be saved to the Treasury—$12,000,000 for 1934.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) If any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its shareholders through the medium of permitting surtax upon its shareholders through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 50 per cent of the amount thereof, which shall be in addition to the tax imposed by section 13 and shall be computed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner and subject for the same provides and in the same manner and subject to the same provides and in the same manner. ject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as that tax.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I am going to move to strike out of the section, and if it is adopted, I serve notice that I will move to strike out each succeeding paragraph of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LaGuardia offered the following amendment: Strike out, beginning line 20, page 62, and ending line 6, page 64, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Tax on personal holding companies: If any personal holding company permits more than 30 per cent of its net income for the taxable year to accumulate instead of being distributed to its stockholders, there shall be imposed an additional tax of 25 per cent of the net income (decreased in the amount of Federal taxes paid for the preceding taxable year), of such company for such year.

"(b) Tax on companies other than personal holding companies: If any corporation other than a personal holding company permits more than 60 per cent of its net income for the taxable year to accumulate instead of being distributed to its stockholders, there shall be imposed an additional tax of 10 per cent of the net income (decreased in the amount of Federal taxes paid for the preceding taxable year) of such company for such year. This subsection shall not apply (1) to any corporation during the first three years of its existence, or (2) to any corporation having a net income of less than $10,000 for the taxable year, or (3) any banking or insurance corporation. insurance corporation.

"(c) Definitions. As used in this section: (1) The term 'personal holding company' means any holding or investment company if (A) 80 per cent or more of its voting stock is owned or controlled, directly or indirectly, by not more than 50 individuals and (B) at least 80 per cent of its gross income for the taxable year is derived from rents, royalties, dividends, interest (excluding tax-exempt interest), and (except in the case of regular dealers in securities) gain from the sale of securities or other assets producing such income. Such term shell not include any tenking or ducing such income. Such term shall not include any banking or ducing such income. Such term shall not include any banking or insurance corporation.

"(2) The term 'net income' means net income as defined in section 21 plus the amount of the dividend deduction and interest upon obligations of the United States.

"(3) The term 'dividend deduction' means the deduction specified in section 23 (p).

"(4) The term 'interest upon obligations of the United States' means interest upon obligations of the United States issued after September 1, 1917, which would be subject to tax in whole or in part in the hands of an individual owner.

"(d) Collection and payment: The tax imposed by subsections 9 (a) and (b) shall be assessed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as the tax imposed by section 13."

Mr. CRISP. May I say to the gentleman from New York that a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means is considering some administrative changes, and I am not certain whether this is one of them or not, because I have been so occupied that I could not sit in with the subcommittee. But, in any event, the gentleman from New York will readily agree that this is a complicated amendment. It is impossible for me, having heard it read, and it is impossible for the committee, to intelligently construe it. Therefore, I am going to ask the gentleman from New York if he will not be willing to have this section passed over, to be called up later, with all of the gentleman's rights reserved, which will give the committee a chance to consider it, whether the subcommittee is considering making a recommendation for a change or not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, I shall be very happy to have the section passed at this time. I simply want to state that I can readily understand that the provisions of this section are somewhat involved from just hearing it read. It is very simple in its application, and my surprise is that we have been unable to get the Treasury Department to take the simple provision of section 220, which is now section 104, and apply it as Congress intended.

I simply want to remind the House, and I am sure the distinguished gentleman from Georgia will recall, that a former distinguished chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Green, now Judge Green, labored long and hard on this particular provision.

Section 220 of the revenue act of 1926, which with some slight modifications became section 104 of the revenue act of 1928, was originated by our former distinguished colleague, Representative William R. Green. He did not draft the language. This was done by the legislative counsel of the House, but Representative Green gave them the plan Representative Green had much controversy with the Treasury over this provision, because for a long time the Bureau of Internal Revenue did nothing in the way of enforcing it. Finally he threatened to bring their failure to enforce the law before Congress, and as a result some assessments were made in accordance with its provisions, and the understanding now is that somewhere between five and ten million dollars in taxes have been collected under the provisions of section 220.

It must be admitted that section 220 is somewhat difficult of enforcement against a manufacturing corporation and some other corporations as to which the matter of the amount of capital needed is difficult to prove. The same difficulty, however, does not arise with reference to mere holding companies, or companies organized principally for the purpose of holding stock of other companies. For some reason or other the bureau apparently took the position that section 220 did not apply to holding companies-or at least the course they took would indicate this. The cases against holding companies would manifestly be the easiest to prosecute, but none was ever begun. Judge Green proposed an amendment to the 1928 act substantially in the form of the amendment which I now offer. He thought he would make the law so clear and plain that the revenue officials who were manifestly unwilling to act under it could not avoid proceeding against the holding companies at least, of which there were thousands in the country plainly formed for the purpose of evading the tax and subject to the prosecution.

The amendment went through the House without any trouble, but in the Senate it encountered a powerful opposition from organized wealth which was engaged in evading the surtaxes. Possibly if Representative Green had remained in the House he could have saved it. I am inclined to think that the conferees as organized after he left were not heartily in favor of it and it went by the board in conference.

My purpose is simply to further clarify the section as to remove all possibility of its evasion or lack of enforcement. That is all there is to it.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I yield. Mr. GOSS. As I heard the amendment read, it would appear to me that it would attack surpluses in companies, because undivided profits in a corporation might be construed and are construed as surplus. Is that correct?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. GOSS. It will not in any way tax surplus?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It will tax profits that should have been divided. It will only tax profits which should be taxed.

Mr. GOSS. But the gentleman is making a distinction, and we passed upon this point the other day when the committee was considering the 2 per cent tax on surpluses. The amendment which the gentleman has offered would get around the point of actually taxing surpluses by considering the undivided portion of that which the gentleman says should have been divided. So in reality it is a tax up to a certain point-

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Up to a certain amount.

Mr. GOSS. On surpluses.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not at all.

Mr. GOSS. I consider a surplus that portion of undivided profits up to a certain point. It depends on where you draw the line.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Up to a certain point it is profit, but beyond that, in the discretion of the company, it may be considered | words "basis (unadjusted) of property" the clause "aca surplus, and that is the surplus which was discussed in the committee the other day as being used so advantageously in helping get an exemption, in time of stress, on that amount of money.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. All my amendment does is to clarify section 220 of existing law.

Mr. CRISP. If we are going to pass this over all of this will be debated later.

Mr. GOSS. I wanted to call attention to the fact that it really had the effect of taxing surpluses.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. It has the effect of taxing profits that are not divided for the purpose of evading the tax. That is all. That is the law now.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to debate this at this time. I have the Treasury Department's explanation of this and why at first they could not operate under it, but recently how they have used it and collected $6,000,000 or $7,000,000. But there is no use of debating this now. It is coming up later. I can assure the gentleman from New York that I know the importance of this subject, and the committee is going to consider it. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we pass over this section, with the amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLAND). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 113. ADJUSTED BASIS FOR DETERMINING GAIN OR LOSS

(a) Basis (unadjusted) of property: The basis of property shall be the cost of such property; except that-

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that for the first time in the history of the income tax law you are changing the basis of the value at which property should be taken in determining gain or loss. Ever since we enacted the first income tax law the basis of value has always been understood to be that of February 28, 1913. In the pending paragraph you strike out all limitations as to the date and merely state that the basis of property shall be the cost of such property. As this amendment is rather important I thought we should pause for some explanation as to the reason for the departure by the committee from the established basis of all these years. the date when the value should be determined.

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend that there is no change in the law at all as to the value of the property before March, 1913. This amendment seeks to correct this state of facts: Where a person has held property for several years and has taken depreciation on it, when he trades it to some one else, the person accepting that property in lieu of other property must take the value less the depreciation which the preceding owner had taken for the property.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says he must take the depreciation which the previous owner has taken, regardless of the price he has given for it.

Mr. CRISP. No. That is just where there is an exchange of property. If I had an apartment house and the gentleman had an apartment house and we made an exchange, then when the gentleman determines the amount of the tax he must pay he returns the apartment house he has received at what it has stood me, the original cost, less the depreciation. The same thing would apply to my return for the property I had taken from him.

These matters, of course, are very technical, and they are rather hard to explain by one who is not a tax expert, and I am not that. However, the report covers the matter fully and explains it. If it will be satisfactory to my friend, I will ask leave to extend my remarks by putting in the RECORD the report dealing with this change. I know how diligent and able my friend is. He will read it, and then later, if he desires to ask any questions, he may do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I accept the compliment of the gentleman, but I have not the time. I do not read the RECORD, but I follow the proceedings in the House and get my information in that way. The reason for my inquiry was the fact that in the bill, as reported, you strike out after the quired after February 28, 1913," and I was led to believe that you were seeking a different method of computation because of the elimination of that clause.

Mr. CRISP. None whatever. That was dealing with the exchange of property since then. It does not change the law as to the value of property acquired before 1913.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Paragraph 113, subsection (b), sets forth very clearly what is meant by this basis.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am in full sympathy with the purpose sought to be attained in the exchange of property. I was laboring under the impression that this referred to other transactions besides exchanges.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the gentleman has referred to the report, he need not burden the RECORD for my benefit. I shall read the report as to this matter.

Mr. CRISP. I thank the gentleman.

The Clerk read down to and including line 3, on page 80.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the Ways and Means Committee, the majority members and the minority members, are going to have some conferences relative to an amendment to the bill levying additional taxes. Therefore I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill, had come to no reso-Intion thereon.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

The Chair laid before the House the following communication from the State of Virginia:

Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Delegates of Virginia:

JNO. W. WILLIAMS,

Clerk of the House of Delegates.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to-Mr. MILLER (at the request of Mr. DRIVER), on account of illness.

Mr. Parks, for to-day, on account of death in his family. EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made this afternoon by inserting a short article relating to secrecy of tax returns.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a statement setting forth the policy of the New Orleans chapter of the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States as it relates to the national defense.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly make that request to-morrow morning when the gentleman from Massachusetts is here? For the time being I object, Mr. Speaker.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 29, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

TUESDAY, MARCH 29, 1932

(Legislative day of Wednesday, March 23, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Costigan Couzens Kean Kendrick Ashurst Schall Sheppard Shipstead Shortridge Bailey Bankhead Davis Dickinson Keyes King Barbour Barkley Bingham Black Borah Lewis Fess Fletcher Logan McGill McKellar Steiwer Thomas, Idaho Thomas, Okla. Mr. GEORGE. My colleague the senior Senator from Georgia IMr. HARRISI is still detained from the Senate because of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GLASS. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson] is absent in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva.

Mr. BYRNES. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] is necessarily detained by serious illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

E. F. CREEKMORE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, some days ago, when the proceedings of the Federal Farm Board having relation to the salary received by the general manager of the American Cotton Cooperative Association were under discussion in the Senate, I stated to the Senate that Mr. E. F. Creekmore, general manager of that cooperative association, was domiciled in or a resident of Oklahoma; that he had formerly lived at Fort Smith, Ark., implying a change of residence.

That statement was incorrect. Mr. Creekmore was born in the State of Arkansas, and at the time of his acceptance of the position he now holds he was prominently connected in business there, having been president of the chamber of commerce and having also connections with other important | business and charitable organizations. He was an honored and highly respected citizen of Fort Smith, Ark., and a recognized authority on cotton marketing.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have received so many telegrams with regard to the situation in the Committee on Foreign Relations relative to our adherence to the World Court and particularly relative to a resolution which I introduced and which is there pending that I feel it will probably save me some trouble if I have placed in the RECORD at this point a copy of a letter relating to the whole matter which I have written to a lady in my State in answer to her

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, March 28, 1932.

Mrs. Helen T. Belford, 240 Court Street, Reno, Nev. My Dear Mrs. Belford: I am in receipt of your telegram of the 27th, reading as follows:

27th, reading as follows:

"Will not your resolution to defer action on World Court practically end any action until the next session of Congress?"

The adoption of the resolution might, of course, delay action at this session of Congress, although it is intended to facilitate action at this session of Congress.

Former Senator Elihu Root, who participated in the framing of the so-called Root protocol for the adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice (World Court), and Secretary of State Mr. Stimson in his recent letter to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate have given it as their opinion that the protocol prohibits the Court of International Justice from rendering any opinion touching any question in which the United States has or claims an interest if the United States makes objections to the rendering of such an opinion. rendering of such an opinion.

Each and every member of the Foreign Relations Committee disagrees with the construction placed upon the protocol by Mr. Root and the Secretary of State. In view of this disagreement the Foreign Relations Committee has unanimously amended the protocol by setting out in the protocol the original fifth reservation, which expressly states that the court shall have no jurisdiction to render an advisory opinion on any question in which the United States has or claims an interest and which it objects to the court rendering. court rendering.

The committee will also adopt a resolution that the President shall not be authorized to sign the protocol on behalf of the United States unless the other world signatories to the protocol will accept the protocol as thus amended. In my opinion, with this amendment, it presents exactly the same question which the signatories have heretofore refused to agree to. Unless the signatories have heretofore refused to agree to.

signatories have heretofore refused to agree to. Unless the signatories agree with the construction of the protocol as submitted to the committee, then they will refuse to agree to the protocol as amended. If they give the same construction to the protocol as given to it by Mr. Root and by the Secretary of State, then the amendment by the committee as adopted will be unnecessary.

It would seem to be better and more expeditious for the President, through diplomatic channels, to ask the signatories if they agree with the construction placed upon the protocol by Mr. Root and the Secretary of State. If they answer in the affirmative, then the amendment to the protocol will be eliminated and the Senate can ratify the protocol knowing exactly what will be its future construction.

If, on the contrary, the signatories do not agree with the con-construction.

If, on the contrary, the signatories do not agree with the construction placed upon the protocol by Mr. Root and the Secretary of State, then it is useless for the protocol as amended to be submitted to them after adoption by the Senate, because it would be rejected by the signatories as it has been in the past.

I believe that the President could get the information desired by cable in a very short time and that then the committee and the Senate could act intelligently on the matter with full knowledge as to the future construction of the protocol. I see no reason why this information could not be obtained in ample time to allow the Senate to act on the matter before we adjourn. Another rejection by the signatories of the protocol as heretofore ratified by the Senate will end the question of our adherence to the Court of International Justice for a long time, and probably permanently.

John Bassett Moore, one of the ablest international lawyers in John Bassett Moore, one of the ablest international lawyers in the United States, at one time Under Secretary of State and a former member of the Court of International Justice, agrees that the construction to be placed upon the protocol by the signatories should be obtained in advance rather than to be left to future misunderstandings and disputes.

While we are granted the privilege under the protocol of with-drawing from the court if the court attempts to render an advisory opinion to which we object, such withdrawal would be very un-fortunate and would greatly injure the prestige and power of the court. It is unfortunate that enthusiastic advocates of adherence to the court do not understand the question at issue before the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate.

I trust that you will give this explanation to your group in Nevada

Sincerely.

KEY PITTMAN.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for S. 3377, the so-called Hawes-Cutting bill, as it affects Philippine independence. I ask that the amendment may be printed and lie on the table. For the information of the Senate, I ask that a summary of the difference between the two measures may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The summary is as follows:

The principal differences between the so-called Hawes-Cutting bill, which has been reported to the Senate Calendar, and Senator Vandenberg's new proposal, which will be offered on the floor as a substitute, are as follows:

a substitute, are as follows:

1. The Hawes-Cutting formula is built on a 15-year base. The Vandenberg formula is built on a 20-year base. But both lead to the unequivocal option of ultimate independence.

2. The Hawes-Cutting bill provides a native constitution and native government at the inception of the probationary period. The Vandenberg bill provides for the constitution at the end of the period on the theory (1) that American authority must continue as long as American responsibility continues; and (2) that the native constitution is logical only as the climax rather than as the inception of the probation. The Vandenberg bill, however, increases native autonomy under the existing order by providing a complete legislative cabinet. Both bills limit immigration immediately.

3. The Hawes-Cutting bill provides for limitations upon free

3. The Hawes-Cutting bill provides for limitations upon free American markets for sugar and hemp products and coconut products for 10 years on the basis of present Philippine exports to the United States; thereafter it switches to straight tariffs with an annual step-up in rates. The Vandenberg bill provides these same initial limitations for 5 instead of 10 years, and then progressively reduces these limitations in each subsequent 3-year period.

4. The Hawes-Cutting bill provides no opportunity for the Filipinos to change their minds when once the 15-year program is launched if its economic burdens should become too heavy. The Vandenberg bill permits the Filipino Legislature to pass upon the proposition at each 3-year interval, if it so desires. It transfers entire responsibility to the Filipinos to make these subsequent decisions.

5. The Hawes-Cutting bill permits the ultimate American re-5. The Hawes-Cutting bill permits the ultimate American retention of existing American Army and naval bases. The Vandenberg bill requires a final survey by the President and Congress at the end of the probation and permits the United States to make whatever final disposition may be advisable, even to the possible extent of moving military and naval bases to other islands.

6. The Vandenberg bill makes more specific commitments to assure the retirement of the Philippine public debt for which the United States has a moral responsibility. It differs in other structural details. In many respects the two bills are practically the same. Often the provisions are verbatim.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

RELIEF OF STORM-STRICKEN AREAS IN THE SOUTH

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. If there is any objection or if it is apparent that it will take any time, I shall withdraw my request until the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] has completed his remarks.

I desire to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 130) to provide assistance in the rehabilitation of certain stormstricken areas in the United States and in relieving unemployment in such areas, which is the joint resolution introduced by me on yesterday and which I asked should lie over until this morning. It is for the relief of the storm-stricken areas of the Southeastern States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MOSES. This being a joint resolution, is it not necessary that it shall follow the usual course and go to a committee? If it were a simple Senate resolution, the Senator might ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration without reference to a committee.

reference, but it has been the practice to have all joint resolutions referred to a committee. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a joint resolution, which will be stated for the information of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before consent is granted, may I state that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], who is interested in this matter, should be present if the joint resolution is to be considered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to say that I am going to object. The joint resolution ought to go to a committee. Time will be saved by sending it to a committee. If it had been sent to a committee yesterday, time would have been saved and it would have been reported out to-day without question. There may not be any question about the phraseology of it, or anything of the kind; I am not objecting to the joint resolution itself, but I am opposed to its consideration without its reference to a committee and a report upon it by a committee.

Mr. BLACK. I withdraw my request at this time and I shall submit it again and explain the joint resolution as soon as I can get the floor after the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] shall have completed his remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn.

Mr. BLACK subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago a request was made for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 130, but the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] objected to its being taken up without going to a committee. I have discussed the matter with the Senator from Washington and have reached the conclusion that it would be well to ask that the joint resolution may be sent to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which is satisfactory to the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

EMERGENCY OFFICERS' RETIREMENT LAW

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have no intention of speaking in the time of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin], who is entitled to the floor at this time, but I understand that every Senator has received a very large number of telegrams criticizing the action of the Committee on Military Affairs in reporting a bill introduced by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. King] to modify the emergency officers' retirement law. At the first opportunity, when I am not trespassing upon the time of some colleague, I would like to explain briefly what we have done. I only ask the Senate to reserve judgment for the moment. I assure the Senate that the action taken is entirely fair.

REPORT OF THE NEAR EAST RELIEF

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the executive secretary of the Near East Relief, submitting, pursuant to law, the report of the Near East relief for the year ended December 31, 1931, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PROPOSED PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of resolutions relative to Philippine independence recently received in the War Department from the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, as follows:

Resolution No. 10, adopted January 6, 1932, by the Provincial Board of Ilocos Norte, with its inclosure consisting of a resolution of the Municipal Council of Batac, Ilocos Resolution No. 38, adopted January 30, 1932, by the Municipal Council of Umingan, Pangasinan; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Robert F. Jones, of Washington, D. C., suggesting the issuance of "prosperity stamps" in denominations of 3 and 5 cents for first-class mail, and the use of the proceeds derived from the sale thereof to balance the Budget by voluntary action of the people, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from H. W. McLeod, general manager of the Hammond Lumber Co., of Los Angeles, Calif., praying for the making of adequate appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a resolution adopted by Bloomfield Post, No. 20, the American Legion, of Bloomfield, N. J., opposing the payment of World War adjusted-compensation certificates (bonus) at this time, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented the petition of members of Fern Allen Post, the American Legion, of O'Donnell, Tex., praying that Congress provide for the immediate cash payment at full face value of adjusted-compensation certificates, with a refund of all interest charged on loans pending against the certificates (bonus), which was referred to the Committee on Finance

Mr. CAPPER presented resolutions adopted by Byron H. Mehl Post, No. 23, the American Legion, of Leavenworth, and the Sixth Army Corps of the United Spanish War Veterans, of Topeka, both in the State of Kansas, favoring the immediate payment in cash of adjusted-service certificates (bonus), which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Rotary Club of Herington and the Chamber of Commerce of Osawatomie, both in the State of Kansas, favoring the interstate regulation of bus and truck traffic, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JONES presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bellingham, Wash., praying for the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, and protesting against any measure looking toward its modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Mount Pleasant Auxiliary and Enterprise Chapter (Young Married Women's Union), both of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in the District of Columbia, protesting against the proposed resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to the States, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which were referred to the Committee on the

Mr. BROOKHART presented a petition of sundry citizens of Odebolt, Iowa, praying for the passage of legislation known as the widows and orphans pension bill, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Odebolt, Iowa, praying for the passage of legislation to aid the national defense, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Iowa, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 2487) to establish a bimetallic system of currency employing gold and silver, to fix the relative value of gold and silver, to provide for the free coinage of silver as well as gold, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Eldon,

EXEMPTION FROM TAX OF FOOD PRODUCTS MADE FROM COTTONSEED

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented the following memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Joint Memorial No. 1

To the Arkansas Members of the United States Congress:
Whereas it appears that all basic food commodities are exempt Whereas it appears that all basic food commodities are exempt from the provisions of the sales tax provided in the revenue bill now pending in the National Congress, except vegetable-oil shortenings or cottonseed-oil shortening; and

Whereas this is one of the principal foods used by the Nation's housewives and is made of farmers' cottonseed; and

Whereas at the present price of cottonseed the food product made therefrom can be had at a great saving to the masses of people: Therefore be it

USE OF ASSETS OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have two telegrams from prominent bankers in my State, gentlemen whom I know and whose judgment is entitled to very great weight. They relate to the so-called Glass banking bill. I present them for the RECORD and ask that they may be referred to the appropriate committee.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., March 26, 1932.

Hon. Wesley L. Jones, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:
Have been studying Glass bank bill, and believe it contains number of objectionable items, principally section 8, attempting control, artificially, volume of loans on collateral; section 11, penalizing banks' borrowings; section 13, increased reserves on time deposits, which would force reduction in rates paid to small savings depositors and interfering in relations between banks and brokers. There are other objectionable clauses, but those mentioned should unquestionably be rejected. Hope you will concur with these views and set accordingly. with these views and act accordingly.

WILLIAM CALVERT.

SEATTLE, WASH., March 26, 1932.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:
We are cordially favorable to restrictive, constructive, and conservative bank legislation, but believe revised Glass bill will result servative bank legislation, but believe revised Glass bill will result in drastic liquidation, impose unnecessary requirements on banks, and complicate, rather than relieve, present distressing conditions. The bill makes no proper distinction between loans collateraled by stocks and bonds and loans on other collateral. This includes section 8, as well as other sections relating to collateral loans, and those provisions are generally undesirable. Section 11 is so onerous that it should be stricken out; section 13 provides for objectionable and unnecessary increases in reserves. Provisions relating to divorcing affiliates, while sound in principle, would work great hardship on national banks located in State of Washington, as well as other States whose statutes prohibit branch banking, and the measure should provide for branch banking within State border irrespective of State statutes upon the subject.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-COMPENSATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. SCHALL presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wabasha, Minn., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures after the first, as follows:

We, the undersigned, respectfully petition the President and Congress of the United States to provide immediate cash payment, at full face value, of the adjusted-compensation (bonus) certificates created by the World War adjusted compensation act of 1924, with

EARL N. STEARNS. American Legion, Wabasha, Minn. (And others.)

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. SCHALL also presented a resolution adopted by Local No. 139, the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, of Rosewood, Minn., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Inasmuch as there is need of an expansion of currency in our country, and also to facilitate trade with other nations, we, the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, Rosewood Local, No. 139, do place ourselves on record as favoring Senate bill No. 2487.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SCHALL also presented the following resolutions adopted by the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, Local No. 139, of Rosewood, Minn., which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Inasmuch as farmers have sold for less than cost of production all of the major commodities produced, in order to correct this system of marketing, we, the Farmers Educational and Coopera-system of marketing, we, the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, Rosewood Local, No. 139, do place ourselves on record as favoring House bill No. 7797.

Inasmuch as all avenues of credit to farmers have been closed and every help has been extended to other nations and private interests, we, the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, Rosewood Local, No. 139, do place ourselves on record as favoring the very moderate means provided to refinance the farmer as provided in Senate bill No. 1197.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Denton, Mont.; a resolution adopted by the Prairie County Farmers Union, of Terry, Mont.; and copy of a letter addressed to William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, by W. P. Harrison, of Great Falls, Mont., favoring the passage of the legislation known as the Wheeler bill, being the bill (S. 2487) to establish a bimetallic system of currency, employing gold and silver, to fix the relative value of gold and silver, to provide for the free coinage of silver as well as gold, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DENTON, MONT., February 29, 1932.

Senate bill 2487, or silver bill

To the honorable Senatorial Body, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned farmers, landowners, and qualified voters, do hereby ask your serious consideration in support of the above Senate bill No. 2487, believing that it will materially relieve the present scarcity, raise the price of our raw products, furnish more jobs for our jobless, and furnish widespread relief in the present critics.

J. W. RUSSELL W. J. CLAYTON. OTTO POSER. HAROLD POSER.
THOS. E. METZNER.
E. S. BOLLER.

TERRY, MONT., March 4, 1932.

There is before Congress a bill known as the Wheeler bill, S.

There is before Congress a bill known as the Wheeler bill, S. 2487, for the monetization of silver in a just proportion to gold.

Silver is one of the resources of the West, and we believe that this metal should be used in the monetary system of the United States, because it would increase the per capita wealth of every citizen of the country and would be the first step out of our present depression: Therefore be it Resolved by this body, That our Representatives and Senators in the National Congress be requested to support this bill.

PRARIE COUNTY FARMERS' UNION,

BY WEST ALLERS Secretary

By WM. ALLARD, Secretary.

GREAT FALLS, MONT., March 11, 1932.

President American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GREEN: I am writing you in the interest of the silver remonetization bill introduced in the Senate by Senator B. K. Wheeler, of Montana.

In my opinion, this is the greatest and most important piece of legislation before Congress, and the only one that tends to put prosperity on a permanent basis. The rest are merely temporary relief measures which will increase taxes in order to pay interest on the bonds issued.

on the bonds issued.

Senator Wheeler has always been an outstanding friend and champion of labor and labor interests, and he is entitled to and should have the whole-hearted support of labor in his difficult task of forcing this bill through Congress. In view of the direct bearing of this issue on labor particularly, I believe the American Federation of Labor and every union affiliated with it should use every means at the disposal of its mighty organization and get behind Senator Wheeler in this, his great effort for the permanent relief of industry, farming, and labor.

I could write at length on the merits of this bill, but Senator Wheeler has so ably covered those points that I only want to say that the main opponents are representatives of the great banking interests, who, through their unwarranted loans to foreign nations and floating of foreign securities, have done so much to bring about the present deplorable condition in this country. Their records are certainly no recommendation as to their knowledge of economics or ability as financiers, except as far as their own selfish interests are concerned. They have done nothing constructive in the present financial crisis except collect interest and commissions, advise salary and wage cuts, and make other recommendations tending to cut the standard of living of the American people.

Thanking you and hoping to hear of your early indovement American people.

Thanking you and hoping to hear of your early indorsement of this great issue, I am,
Respectfully yours,

W. P. HARRISON.

TELEPHONE SERVICE ON PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE STATIONS

Mr. JOHNSON introduced a bill (S. 4252) to authorize telephone service in Government-controlled buildings on Public Health Service stations, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 7 of the act of August 23, 1912 (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 679), or any other law prohibiting the expenditure of public money for telephone services installed in private residences shall not be construed to apply to such telephones in Government-controlled buildings as the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service may certify to be necessary for the prosecution of Government business, and as the Secretary of the Treasury may authorize in connection with the operation of Public Health Service stations.

The accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Treasury was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, Washington, March 24, 1932.

The President of the Senate.

Sir: I have the honor to request the enactment of legislation as set forth in the attached draft of proposed bill, which is considered necessary as a result of a recent decision of the Comptroller General.

For a number of years the quarters of doctors and other em-ployees of the Public Health Service in Government owned or controlled buildings have been connected by extensions to the switchboards of the hospitals and quarantine stations in order that switchboards of the hospitals and quarantine stations in order that such employees may be available at all times in cases of emergency. A number of hospitals and stations have telephone switchboard service for only a part of the 24 hours and in such cases when the operator leaves for the day the station line is plugged into the extension of the officer in charge, who must take all routine calls. The Government very properly has assumed the expense of operating these extensions, because they are used exclusively for Government husbases. ment business.

ment business.

Owing to a recent interpretation by the General Accounting Office of section 679, title 31, of the United States Code, which provides that no money appropriated by Congress shall be expended for telephone service installed in any private residence or private apartment, payment may not be made by the Government for telephones installed in residences of medical officers quartered in Government buildings on duty at marine hospitals and quarantine stations, and it is, therefore, necessary either to discontinue this service or require employees concerned to reimburse the Government for the cost of such service.

It is highly important that marine hospitals and quarantine stations shall be able at all times to keep in touch with doctors, nurses, and other employees. It is essential, therefore, that telephone extensions from the hospital or station be connected with the quarters of such employees. Since they are used exclusively in the conduct of Government business (the regulations prohibit their use for private purposes), it is unjust to require employees to reimburse the Government for the cost of the service. It may be stated that persons having these telephone extensions connected with the hospital or station usually maintain at their own expense a private telephone, which is connected with the public exchange. Relief from the provisions of section 679, title 31, of the United States Code, has already been obtained by the War Department with respect to telephone service installed in private residences which is certified as necessary for the prosecution of Government business by the Chief Engineer of the United States Army and authorized by the Secretary of War (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 630).

Respectfully,

Ogden L. Mills, phone extensions from the hospital or station be connected with OGDEN L. MILLS, Secretary of the Treasury.

"BALANCING THE BUDGET"-ADDRESS BY SENATOR DAVID A. REED

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, last evening the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed] addressed a radio audience on the subject of "Balancing the Budget." I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

dered.

The address is as follows:

In recent weeks the newspapers and the radio addresses have been full of references to this mysterious subject called "Balancing the Budget." In the time that is allotted to me to-night I want to describe the situation just as plainly as possible, leaving out the jargon and the long words that we politicians use so often. I will try to talk about it just as if we were sitting in front of the fire together, and then I want to show quite simply how this question affects you and me and every other person in this land. I am not going to make a political speech at all, and I believe that what I will say would be indorsed by most Republican and Democratic leaders regardless of party.

Since the war we have been depending very largely on the income tax to furnish the money to run the National Government. After the slump hit us, everybody's income was reduced, and consequently the income tax has fallen off fearfully. Our tobacco tax and our customs duties have kept up quite steadily, but the income tax has shrunk to a pitiful fraction of what it was two years ago. As a result of this the United States Government has been running into the hole since last summer at the rate of $7,000,000 a day, which in itself is too big an amount for the average mind to grasp. It is easier to understand how serious it all is if we remember that that means $5,000 per minute. Let me say that again. Since last July the National Government has been spending over and above its income at the rate of $5,000 for every minute of the day and night. Stated that way we get some idea of the seriousness of the situation. Our deficit in the last nine months amounts to the terrifying total of $1,800,000,000.

I can hear somebody say, "What reckless extravagance that is, and why don't we quit spending so much?" and that is a proper question. If the whole trouble came from the extravagance of Congress to stop its extravagance at once. There are some savings that can be made, but they are only a drop in the bucket compa to the veterans of the last war. It is not within our power to make any economies on expenses of that character. Nevertheless, as I said before, it is the duty of Congress to economize at every possible point. When that is done, however, there remains the question of what we are going to do with this huge deficit. It is a tough problem that is to be decided, and it is not pleasant to contemplate what is going to happen to you and to me if we decide wrong. Everybody who knows the facts is vividly aware that something has to be done and done quickly.

There are three sorts of remedies suggested. One group says we can let things slide and horrow money to make up the short-to contemplate what is going to happen to you and to me if we decide wrong. Everybody who knows the facts is vividly aware that something has to be done and done quickly.

There are three sorts of remedies suggested. One group says we can let things slide and borrow money to make up the shortage. But the plain truth is that we can't sell Government bonds in sufficient amount. Furthermore, Congress is talking about putting out two billions of bonds to pay in advance the balance of the soldiers' bonus, and there seems to be a very real danger that this bill will pass. I want to tell you solemnly that if we try to float two billions of bonds for that purpose and another two billions to pay this year's deficit we are going to meet the disaster of our lifetime. Who will buy those bonds? I can't; I venture to think that you can't; my bank can't, and I don't believe that your bank can. What is worse is that the effort to sell these bonds will knock the bottom out of the market for the bonds now outstanding. We have passed the panic stage of this slump, but we must take care that we do not bring on another by unwise action. If we try to keep this Government going by constantly increased borrowing, we are going onto the rocks just the same as any private person who tries that course. The next group says, "Don't go on borrowing—that's fatal. Don't put up taxes—that's hateful. Cut down expenses. That's the way out!" Well, let's look at it. Since 1923, when President Coolidge was here, when economy was stylish, our expenses have risen about two hundred and fifty million. But in that time Congress has increased the amounts payable to veterans by two hundred and fifty million and on top of that has ordered some three hundred and sixteen million to be put into public buildings this year to relieve unemployment. In other words, our ordinary government is costing us about $300,000,000 less than in the last year of President Coolidge's administration. Now I'm not arguing against governmental economy—I think that there are a whol

September.
The dollar would decline in the foreign exchange market, and

The dollar would decline in the foreign exchange market, and consequently we would have to pay more for everything we import from abroad. For example, the prices of rubber, of coffee, and of tea would instantly rise throughout America. Presently the prices of all other objects would begin to rise in the same way and we would begin to talk of the terrible rise in the cost of living. The faster our printing presses worked, the faster the inflation of our currency went on, just so much faster would the dollar sink in its buying power. We saw all that happen in Germany, in France, in Italy, in Great Britain, in practically every country in Europe.

Now, what happens to you and me in all this? If we are working for money wages, as most of us are, we find that we have suffered an invisible wage reduction. We may receive just as many dollars per day, but they are depreciated dollars that won't buy as much. When England went off the gold standard last year, every workman in that country had his wages cut 30 per cent in buying power. It is a truthful statement that the greatest sufferer by that action was the British workingman. Some one may try to argue that wages will go up as the value of the dollar goes down, but that is only partly true. In every country that has resorted to inflation the rise in wages has never kept pace with the rise in living costs, and there is no reason to expect that it would be different here.

Then let us suppose that you and I have been thrifty, and that we seek have a little savings hap account as well as come.

Then let us suppose that you and I have been thrifty, and that we each have a little savings-bank account as well as some life insurance. If America leaves off the gold standard, the value of that bank account and of that insurance policy instantly shrinks, for each of them will be payable only in depreciated dollars. It is as if some invisible hand reached out and struck from us 30 or 50 or 80 per cent of the value of our savings. We saw that happen eight years ago in France, for example, where the savings of the whole people were sacrificed 80 per cent when the gold value of the franc was cut from 19 cents to less than 4 cents. Think of the suffering that meant. I certainly don't want to see th happen here.

And what of the farmer in all this? The burden of his taxation to-day is very heavy indeed—almost too heavy to be borne. Inflation would increase his taxes to the breaking point, because the debts of his county and his State are payable in gold dollars, and he will be taxed many more of the deflated dollars to keep up payments of interest and principal of those public debts. Just as in the case of the workingman of the cities, his income will not increase in proportion to the increase in taxes and in cost of living.

So there is our problem, my friends—the problem that confronts your Senators and your Congressmen at this minute. Shall we take the weak and easy course of refusing to balance the Budget, of letting America fall away from her standard of sound money? I have tried to point out the consequences to you and me of doing that. Or shall we try to protect our working people by maintaining the value of their wages and their savings? It will take courage, for it means new taxation, but the amount of that taxation will be much less than the sacrifices resulting from inflation that taxation will be much less than the sacrinces resulting from inflation.

A sales tax has been suggested, applying to practically all articles except food and clothing. Apply it to your own case. If the rate were fixed at 2½ per cent, as suggested by the Democratic leaders in the House of Representatives, how much would you have to pay? Remember that food and clothing would be exempt, that there would be no tax on rent and no additional tax on tobacco. I think you will find that the most that you would be likely to pay would be five or six dollars a year. Contrast that with the disadvantages to you of a depreciated dollar in its effect on the value of wages and of all savings, and I think you will agree with me that no sane man should hesitate in his decision. Now, there is just one way for you to make that decision felt. Let your Congressman and your two Senators know what you think, and do it now. The verdict is trembling in the balance, and America is truly at the crossroads. Don't allow yourself to be put off with the statement that the trouble can be cured by raising taxes on the big incomes. I myself am in favor of doing that, but I know that it will no begin to yield the necessary revenue. In the tax bill now pending in the House of Representatives the Ways and Means Committee recommended a maximum tax of 46 per cent on the largest incomes. The House itself raised that rate ways and Means Committee recommended a maximum tax of 40 per cent on the largest incomes. The House itself raised that rate to 72 per cent, whereupon we were told by the experts that only twenty millions of additional revenue would result from the change. I am not pleading for the rich man, but I am trying to make clear that the extra twenty millions that we get from him is only a beginning toward raising the twelve hundred millions that we need that we need.

that we need.

There is the picture, and it's not a pretty one. I can not exaggerate its importance. Unless the National Government remains solvent, very few States or cities or counties can be solvent. Unless the finances of the Nation are sound, business will revive very slowly, if at all. But if America's national credit is kept good, we can reasonably expect this country to be one of the very first to emerge from this world-wide depression.

LOAN BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION TO MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILROAD

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article appearing in the Macon Telegraph and News, of Sunday, March 27, 1932, entitled "The Reluctant Loan," a discussion of the decision made by the Interstate Commerce Commission on the Missouri Pacific Railroad loan recently referred to in the Senate.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RELUCTANT LOAN

The Interstate Commerce Commission's "reluctant" agreement to the loan of approximately $6,000,000 to the Missouri Pacific Railroad by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to pay half of a loan due a syndicate of bankers, composed of J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the Guaranty Trust Co., serves to bring sharply into relief for the consideration of all of us what is happening in the country. If we have sense enough to see actualities a lot of illusions will be shattered.

In October, when the situation was getting steadily worse, President Hoover sought to do something about the railroads, the banks, and the insurance companies. Continued runs on banks would spread the panic; the failure of railroads to meet their funded debts would mean receiverships for numbers of them, and receiverships would potentially endanger the safety of insurance companies which invested heavily in railroad bonds. The President induced a group of bankers to form the National Credit Corporation to meet the situation. That corporation did little or nothing; and when Congress met, the President recommended the formation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with purposes identical. That corporation is actively at work, with the avowed purpose of saving the railroads and helping the banks, and, consequently, the insurance companies, all to the end that normalcy in finance may be restored.

It was not contemplated by the public, at least, that loans would be made to railroads save where they had long-term obliwas not contemplated by the public, at least, that loans would be made to railroads save where they had long-term obligations maturing which they could not renew or refund because of the condition of the market. It was not contemplated by the public that that corporation would have to take over the loans that bankers have made to the railroads—that the Government should step into the shoes of bankers and lend money for current operating expenses of the railroads and other business. Yet that is what has happened in the Missouri Pacific case. The $12,000,000 which was owed to the three banks was not bond money; it was a commercial loan. While the Government is straining every resource to induce banks to stretch their credit; while it has, in the Glass-Steagall bill, made it possible for banks to discount much more paper than they ever have before, we have in the Missouri Pacific case an instance in which the biggest banks and banking houses are contracting, rather than extending loans. Under pressure, no doubt, they did extend half of the loan; but perhaps to save the railroad, the Government had to step in and act as banking agent for the Missouri Pacific.

It is to be hoped that the Missouri Pacific case is not a precedent and that it is not representative of the attitude of the banks throughout the country. The Beconstruction Figures (Corporation Figures)

It is to be hoped that the Missouri Pacific case is not a precedent and that it is not representative of the attitude of the banks throughout the country. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was not set up as a superbank; it was set up to take the place, for the time being, of a panicky public which had gone on a securities-buying strike and to tide the railroads and other corporations which depend heavily upon public financing over a stormy period. The banks which have been making money in the millions by financing railroads are stepping out now when they can give the Government the short end of the rope. If the Missouri Pacific case becomes a precedent, what we shall be doing is simply this: While maintaining the value of railroad securities for the benefit of their present owners, we Government taxpayers shall be buying the railroads by paying off their loans and indebtednesses. If we are going to have to take them over in the long run, it would be much cheaper to let Morgan & Co., and the Guaranty Trust Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and others who have been selling the public their securities and reaping big commissions by doing so, throw them into receiverships and explain their action to those to whom they have sold securities. It would be much cheaper for the taxpayers to buy them out of receiverships than it would be to buy them from the New York bankers.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF ACT OF 1930

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. AUSTIN resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. His speech follows entire.

Monday, March 28, 1932

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am opposed to the substitute submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] for House bill 6662 for the reasons which were so eloquently and persuasively stated by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] and by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg]. I must admit also that I am opposed to the substitute because of some of the reasons advanced in its behalf by the distinguished Democratic Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh].

OPPOSES HARRISON SUBSTITUTE

I am in hearty favor of any effort to secure justice in the administration of government in any of its departments, and particularly with respect to so important a function of government as that of regulating commerce between the nations, by the imposition of tariff duties. I am also in full sympathy with the sentiment so forcefully expressed by the senior Senator from Massachusetts against logrolling in the fixing of tariff rates. Therefore, what I myself have to say relating to the substitute can be understood to be in full harmony with that objective.

As a first objection to the proposed substitute for the House bill, which itself is a proposed substitute for section 336 of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, I claim that the substitute is entirely unnecessary to accomplish the objectives mentioned by its proponent and by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. The substitute is unnecessary because Congress already possesses all the powers, the granting of which both of these distinguished Democratic Senators allege as a reason why the substitute should be adopted.

PROPOSALS NO CURE FOR LOGROLLING

Moreover, the proposed substitute is not a cure for log-rolling. It is obviously, frankly, and plainly a cause for logrolling. Its main feature is to take out of the business of fixing tariff rates the only scientific element now in it, absolutely to cancel it, and in place of that to return the determination of the exact amount of tariff rates to the log-rolling process of Congress. Senators on the other side of the aisle have the power to do that this instant. In the House the Democratic Party is in control, and, therefore, it has the opportunity to express itself upon any item in the tariff act and begin instantly to do what Democratic Senators say they do not want to have take place but which is the very objective they seek by this substitute, namely, an opportunity to begin the logrolling process on any item contained in the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. The fact that they have not seen fit to do that, the fact that they have utterly failed to name a single item there which they claim is too high and should be reduced, or a single item that bears a tariff to-day that should be put on the free list, is extremely significant. It is not mere silence. It is silence weighted with the significant statement to all the world that there is no such item and that this bill, H. R. 6662, and its substitute, are gestures made for the purpose of satisfying a political expedient at this particular moment of our history.

CONGRESS ALREADY HAS AUTHORITY TO REVISE TARIFF

The proponent of this substitute made the following statement:

Mr. President, the object of this legislation is to restore to Congress the power designed by the fathers of laying taxes upon the American people.

Is not that an astonishing objective to assert with respect to this substitute? Congress does not lift itself by its own bootstraps. Congress never has parted with that power. Congress possesses it to-day, and it can not be restored to Congress by any action of Congress. In other words, for that specific objective of this bill there is no cause to pass this substitute. Congress has that power. The proponent of this substitute bill stated as the principal objects of the bill, and as significant differences between the bill and H. R. 6662, and this substitute as follows-and I call your attention in passing to the fact that this statement, taken all together, and construed as it must be as an entire statement, reveals a consciousness of the fact that the fixing of tariff duties is a national objective, and that the national interests should be attained, even at the sacrifice of local interests. It is a recognition of the fact that in ascertaining interests regarding and touching the tariff we find that some Democrats located in certain places desire and struggle for a tariff on certain commodities as a matter of local interest, and some Republicans in other places desire and strive for a low tariff on certain commodities. That is local; and it shows how much the two great parties of this country have approached an understanding upon this economic problem and how much they really pull together when they get at the business of creating a tariff.

Here in this great sounding board for the Nation Senators on both sides of the aisle represent the extreme conflicting views for certain purposes; but I venture the suggestion, as coming from one who has but recently entered this great Chamber and one who has recently come from a community that is striving to uplift humanity by proper means of manufacture and proper means of protection of the wage earner and the farmer, that the real interest that must be considered in creating tariff rates is the national interest and not the local interest, and that both parties will work for that objective.

The senior Senator from Mississippi said:

One of the differences between the Senate substitute offered by the minority of the Finance Committee and the House bill is this, and it is most important.

And thereupon he states how the commission goes to work to ascertain the difference between cost of production at home and cost of production abroad and makes its report in order that the difference may be equalized. Then he names five points constituting the particulars in which I claim that the proponent of this bill has shown to Congress and to all the world that this substitute is wholly unnecessary, and a mere gesture. He says, telling of the various things that this substitute provides that the commission shall ascertain and report to Congress—

THE TARIFF COMMISSION'S AUTHORITY UNDER 1930 ACT

(1) The efficiency and economic operation and location of the domestic industry under consideration.

I call the attention of the Senate to the Smoot-Hawley bill upon that subject, the statement of which, I think, and I respectfully submit to the Senate, is much more effective than his statement of the matter, because it is much more broad and gives more power, namely-I am reading from section 332, clause (d) (6):

Information for President and Congress: In order that the President and the Congress may secure information and assistance, it shall be the duty of the commission to * *.

(6) Ascertain all other facts which will show the differences in or which affect competition between articles of the United States and imported articles in the principal markets of the United

Under that provision of the present law, the Tariff Commission can do exactly what section 1 of the statement of the proponent of this bill says the Tariff Commission is vested with the power to do under his substitute; namely, investigate "the efficiency and economic operation and location of the domestic industry under consideration."

(2) The conditions of such domestic industry with respect to profits and losses, the extent to which productive capacity is uti-lized, and the extent of unemployment.

I call attention to the Smoot-Hawley law, section 332 (a): It shall be the duty of the commission-

Senators, understand that I am condensing these sections in reading them, so as to get to the very point under con-

* in general to investigate the operation of customs laws, including their relation to the Federal revenues, their effect upon the industries and labor of the country.

There is a much broader power than that specified in the proposed substitute, because it does not point the finger at unemployment and does point the finger to all conditions of labor, whether of employment or unemployment, of prosperity or of depression.

Now take the third. Of course, the two features to which I have now called your attention, which are already contained in the present law, were commented upon by the proponent of this bill as "very splendid factors to be considered in determining what rates should be imposed upon importations from this country." We agree, but we say they are wholly unnecessary, because the law carries them already. Now take the third one:

(3) The extent to which adverse conditions of production may be due to foreign competition or to other specified factors.

I refer to section 332 (b) of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law.

Investigations of tariff relations: The commission shall have power to investigate * * * conditions, causes, and effects relating to competition of foreign industries with those of the United States.

Another statement of the matter, a better statement of the matter because it is more comprehensive and gives more power instead of less power. In other words, it ascertains the simple facts stated here, namely, stated by the proponent of this substitute, the extent of which adverse conditions of production may be due to foreign competition and to other specified factors.

Understand that in passing over these specifications of merit alleged as reasons why this substitute should be passed here it is my objective to make the point that not only does Congress possess all these powers, but that the Tariff Commission possesses these powers to-day, and much more and better powers, under the Smoot-Hawley law, in sections thereof which are not questioned by the proposed substitute.

(4) The extent to which adverse conditions of production may be remedied by adjustments in the tariff law, taking into con-sideration the substitution of articles used for the same purposes as the articles under consideration, and taking into consideration any other pertinent competitive factors.

I call your attention to section 332 (d) (3) of the Smoot-Hawley law:

Information for President and Congress.

This is what the present law does for the commission and for the people of the United States in respect to a scientific and a just ascertainment and fixing of tariff duties:

(3) Select and describe articles which are representative of the classes or kinds of articles imported into the United States and which are similar to or comparable with articles of the United States; select and describe articles of the United States similar to or comparable with such imported articles; and obtain and file samples of articles so selected, whenever the commission deems it advisable.

I respectfully submit that therein is given the power of substitution in a more scientific manner and in a manner calculated to effect the very thing specified in the fourth item of the specification of the proponent in respect to this measure.

Now, fifth. The learned Senator from Mississippi said that one of these important differences, and therefore one of these causes for enacting this substitute into law, is this:

(5) The effects of any proposed increase or decrease in rates of duties on other domestic industries and on the export trade of the United States.

Of course, any Senator will at once reflect that his experience at all times has been to do that very thing in framing a tariff bill whenever one has come up for consideration, or in fixing a single item when it has come up for consideration. But let us see whether it is expressly provided for in the Smoot-Hawley law. Section 332 (a), the first subdivision, provides:

INVESTIGATIONS AND REPORTS

It shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the administration and fiscal and industrial effects of the customs laws of this country now in force or which may hereafter be enacted, the relations between the rates of duty on raw materials and finished or partly finished products, the effects of ad valorem and specific duties and of compound specific and ad valorem duties, all ques-tions relative to the arrangement of schedules and classification of articles in the several schedules of the customs law.

I respectfully submit that that is a broader, a more extensive, a more effective grant of power for the same purpose than this section 5 in the substitute proposed therefor, namely, "The effects of any proposed increase or decrease in rates of duties on other domestic industries and on the export trade of the United States."

That is the full bill of particulars; that is the reason why the Congress is asked to strike out of this important law section 336, which had a specific objective, namely, the scientific correction of errors which may occur from the logrolling process in Congress, and substitute a paragraph for it which has no flexibility whatever, and which perpetuates completely the logrolling process.

Not one of the things specified in these five items can be said not to be possessed by the Tariff Commission to-day under the law as it is. Yet the great Senator from Mississippi, who has my respect and very high regard, remarks, after making this specification:

Mr. President, a tariff commission as it is to-day, by law charged with the duty of ascertaining the difference in cost, with broad discretionary powers given to it as to what factors shall enter into the ascertainment of those cost differences without the power to consider, as it does not consider, the amount of importations that come into this country or the amount of exportations that we send abroad, without considering the efficiency and the economic operation of the industry, can not ascertain the right rates to put on a commodity.

I call special attention to the following:

I would say "amen" to that general statement, but does it apply in support of this substitute for section 336, for this substitute is a substitute for the House bill, which is a substitute for section 336? We say no. We say that when you subject it to that test you find it does not fit at all, is not according to fact.

On the contrary, the Tariff Commission does consider, the Tariff Commission does have the power to consider, the amount of the importations and the amount of the exportations, and the present law provides that those facts shall be considered.

I now call attention to section 332 (b).

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator, since we are trying to arrive at the same proposition, whether I understood him to say that under the flexible provision of the Smoot-Hawley law the Tariff Commission takes into consideration, in making its findings, the exportations and importations of a particular product being submitted?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; that was not my statement.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to get the Senator's correction, because I had the impression that in criticizing this substitute and analyzing the two measures he was making the statement that under the so-called flexible provision of the law they did take into consideration exportations and importations. When they make their findings they file a report, and in their supplemental report they state the importations and exportations, but that is not a controlling factor at all. That is why in the amendment we have drafted, which is now being considered, we provide that the Tariff Commission should make investigations of these various propositions and that the Congress then will consider whether or not they will put in a particular rate, taking into consideration, among other things, the exportations and importations of the particular product.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, there can be no confusion about what I have said. Perhaps there might be confusion about the application of what I stated, and I will try to clear

Every time I have charged that the things stated in this substitute as powers to be given to the Tariff Commission are already given to the Tariff Commission by the present law, I have been careful to call attention to the section and subsection of the law where it is stated, and I have not claimed that it was in the flexible part of the tariff law. I repeat now that this matter of investigating exports and imports is provided for by the Smoot-Hawley tariff law in another section, which is not the flexible section of the law, and it is considered whenever Congress creates a rate.

I call attention not only to section 332 (a) and (d) (6). but also to section 334, relating to cooperation with other agencies. It reads as follows:

The commission shall in appropriate matters act in conjunction and cooperation with the Treasury Department, the Department of Commerce, the Federal Trade Commission, or any other departments or independent establishments of the Government, and such departments and independent establishments of the Government shall cooperate fully with the commission for the purposes of aiding and assisting in its work, and, when directed by the President, shall furnish to the commission on its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any of the subjects of investigation by the commission and shall detail, from time to time, such officials and employees to said commission as he may direct.

Just think of the scope of the investigation which can be made by the Tariff Commission already.

There are many other provisions in the Smoot-Hawley tariff law which augment the resources of the Tariff Commission to gain information beyond the limits of that specifically drawn substitute, which does not grant power but limits power and cripples this organ of the Government, which should be rendered more efficient daily instead of being hampered and limited. Certainly its powers should not be reduced under the guise and representation of giving powers which it now does not possess.

We claim that the argument that you can not fool some of the people some of the time and all the people all the time, made by the learned Senator from Mississippi in his opening, is not applied on this side of this question, but it may well apply to this supposed substitute for section 336. for there is not one single power named in that substitute which is not already granted by some other section of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, which is in effect to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator please turn to the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act-I see he has a copy of it before him-and call our attention to the provision in it where the commission takes into consideration efficiently operated and economically located plants?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will call the attention of the Senate to three different places where that subject is taken care ofsection 332 (b) (6), page 122; also section 336 (e) (2) (c), page 125; and section 336 (h) (4), on page 126.

All of those sections we claim are broader, better stated, more comprehensive, and give more efficiency to the commission than this particular one, which draws down and narrows the consideration to a mere fact, namely, the effi- | tion about it. The Senator is absolutely correct.

ciency and economical operation and location of the domestic industry under consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator object to putting in his remarks at this place the provision to which he has called attention, so that we can see for ourselves, and so that those who may read his remarks may see, whether or not the provisions mean the same thing?

Mr. AUSTIN. I read from page 122, section 332, subsection (d) (6). We should consider the beginning of the paragraph in order to get the connection. It is headed "Investigations and Reports." Subsection (b) is headed, "Investigations of Tariff Relations," and provides that "the commission shall have power to investigate," and so on.

Now I turn to subsection (6), which reads:

Ascertain all other facts * * * which affect competition.

That is one of the most general powers that could possibly be given to a commission of this character with respect to the limitations and outline of the things which it can ascertain. It can "ascertain all other facts which affect competition between articles of the United States and imported articles in the principal markets of the United States."

I will read from page 125, now. This is part of the present flexible feature of the Smoot-Hawley law. Section 336 (e) (1) (c) provides that-

In ascertaining under this section the differences in costs of production the commission shall take into consideration in so far as it finds it practicable-

(1) In the case of a domestic article-

Senators will observe that in the specifications the foreign article was not included, as it was in the item I have previously read, but it was limited to the domestic article, and that is how the Smoot-Hawley bill is limited in this particular phrase:

In the case of a domestic article: (c) Other relevant factors that constitute an advantage or disadvantage in competition.

Mr. HARRISON rose.

Mr. AUSTIN. I see the learned Senator from Mississippi on his feet. I should like to ask him a question, if he will

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I will answer the Senator's question if I can. If I understand the Senator, he has quoted the general provision that in the discretion of the commission they might interpret the provision carried in the sub-"economically located and efficiently operated plant," as included in the definitions of the general terms of those provisions; that is, I understand the Senator's interpretation to be that that language is broad enough in the present law to give to the commission, as they see fit to exercise it, the power to take into consideration efficiently operated and economically located plants. But I do not understand the Senator to say that specifically it points out in terms plain and clear so they can not be misunderstood, as it does in this report, that the commission shall investigate the "efficient and economic operation and location of the domestic industry under consideration." In other words, nowhere in the present law is such language employed as that, but only in general terms. Is not that true?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to answer the question of the Senator from Mississippi before I yield to the Senator from Utah, which I shall be glad to do in just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. All I want to do is to say-

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator from Utah wish to answer the question of the Senator from Mississippi? If so, I yield now for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to call attention to the fact that in the existing law it is mandatory. There is no ques-

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says it is mandatory. Can the Senator, except in the case of glass, in which a decision was recently handed down by the commission, point to a single case where they have considered the question of economic location or efficiently operated plants in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any doubt that I can.

Mr. HARRISON. Only in the report I have read with reference to glass where they pointed out that the tariff, which was put so high the last time, was not applicable because certain industries in this country, notably the Libbey-Owen people, were making the products under the foreign process and the other industries that wanted the higher protection were making them under the old process. Only in that report have I ever found where the commission hinted at any "economically located and efficiently operated plant." It is said that they can take into consideration all of those factors, but it does not name specifically that authority. What I propose to do is to point out clearly that even though the Senator from Utah himself was on the commission he could not get away from it and he would have to bring in the right kind of a report.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that if I was on the commission I would follow the law, and the provision is in the law as I have stated it. In all three cases referred to by the Senator the words "shall take into consideration" are there. It is not provided that they "may" take into consideration in ascertaining the difference in cost of production. That is exactly the position the Senator from Vermont is taking. All three references are "shall" and not "may."

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the discussion of this matter by both the learned Senator from Mississippi and the learned Senator from Utah. I think all of us will arrive at the same conclusion in the end, though we may differ on the way. I think the very next section I shall read in response to the request of the proponent of the substitute will show that there is no possibility of detour and that the method, the very language spoken of herethat is, "economical operation and location of the domestic industry under consideration "-defined in the Smoot-Hawley law as "method of manufacturing," must be taken into consideration. That is found on page 126 of the act in subsection H-4 of section 336. A part of it reads as follows:

The term "cost of production," when applied with respect to either a domestic article or a foreign article, includes for a period which is representative of conditions in production of the

Note the situation there, "a period which is representative of conditions in production of the article." I continue;

(a) The price or cost of materials, labor costs, and other direct charges incurred in the production of the article and in the processes or methods employed in its production.

That is a specific direction which can not be detoured or evaded in any way.

But, Mr. President, let it not be overlooked that I am employing these references to the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act in order to show that there is nothing, absolutely nothing, in the first six pages of the substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi which gives now or which adds any power or does anything excepting to reflect the shadow, and a broken shadow at that, of the Smoot-Hawley Act. To be sure, it deletes some things completely, and for that reason I am opposed to it.

But before passing to that I wish to call attention to the effect of the provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act in respect to investigating along all the lines mentioned in the substitute bill. Take the provision for the cooperation and coordination of other branches of the Government which brings in many of the things mentioned in the substitute. namely, the amount of exports, the amount of imports, the conditions of labor, the conditions of investment of capital. the economic manner or method in which the product is produced both at home and abroad, and let us see how it is worked out.

TREASURY ATTACHÉS AND THEIR WORK

Have we ever heard of Treasury attachés? we have ever been to Congress and appeared before the Finance Committee of the Senate or the Ways and Means Committee of the House endeavoring to get the phraseology of an item changed or its classification changed or the amount raised, as I have done, and encountered the evidence of Treasury employees abroad. This I am taking from an authority. This is an extract from the address of Capt. F. X. A. Eble, United States Commissioner of Customs. He said with respect to Treasury employees and Foreign Service as it bears upon the powers and efficiency of our Tariff

In addition to our bureau in Washington and the field service throughout the United States, the Customs Service maintains a foreign force, whose headquarters are located in the capitals of principal European countries. There are also two offices in the Orient. The officials in charge are known as Treasury attaches. These officers are a branch of the investigative unit of the bureau in Washington. This unit, which is the directing office of the customs agency service, constitutes the eyes and ears of the commissioner, and assists him materially in the detection and prevention of frauds upon the revenue. tion of frauds upon the revenue.

I will skip a portion of the statement and proceed:

It is in the establishment of foreign values that the agents of the customs foreign service render very valuable assistance to our appraising officers. If any United States appraising officer is uncertain as to the real or market value of any imported foreign commodity, he sends a request to the department that an investigation be made and this, in turn, is forwarded to the Treasury attaché stationed in the country from which the merchandise was exported to the United States.

Mr. President, so far as it is practicable to ascertain the facts abroad with respect to the economic conditions of production there, with respect to the difference in the cost of production there and at home, we now have adequate laws to do that, and we do not need anything that can be found in the substitute in order to exercise that necessary function.

It seems to me, that I heard the Tariff Commission attacked by the learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh], who asked what it had done and what good it has accomplished. I, therefore, feel impelled to invite attention to the fact, also taken from the high authority of the United States Commissioner of Customs, that-

HISTORY OF TARIFF COMMISSIONS

Historically, our experience with tariff commissions goes back to 1882, with the appointment by the Congress of the commission to accumulate and prepare data for the tariff revision of 1883. After a lapse of a quarter century, the commission principle was again revived with the appointment of the so-called Taft Tariff Board, which continued to function as an investigatory branch of the Government until 1912, when it became defunct due to the failure of the Congress to provide funds for its continuance.

The present Tariff Commission was established in 1916 under a

The present Tariff Commission was established in 1916 under a revenue law of that year, and it, too, was originally established as an investigatory body to provide the Congress with data for use during congressional revisions of the tariff.

The Tariff Commission from time to time made investigations and reported a certain amount of definite information to the Congress when it went to work on tariff measures; that is to say, for years it did all and everything that was provided for it to do in the substitute bill, and if we should adopt the substitute we would be going back to conditions of years ago and surrendering and giving up, without consideration or any benefit received, that which has been developed by experience, the benefit of progress, the benefit of adaptation to the changing business conditions in the world as well as in the United States.

This story of the Tariff Commission goes on to say:

The commission is a bipartisan body made up of 6 man, 3 Republicans and 3 Democrats.

With the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922, the commission was given a new and very important function-

And that is the function that this substitute measure seeks which has been continued under the present Smoot-Hawley law. This is the so-called flexible feature of the law, by which the commission is authorized to determine such changes in existing rates of duty as may be necessary to equalize the difference between foreign and domestic costs of production. The commission reports its findings to the President, who makes them effective by presidential proclamation, adjusting, either up or down within a 50 per cent limitation, the rates of duty in the law in accordance with the cost-of-production formula.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF FLEXIBLE CLAUSE

Mr. President, let me digress to consider for a moment another argument made here to-day, and that is that the flexible feature of the tariff law is unconstitutional and that it has been determined by a customs court to be unconstitutional.

Of course, it is not our function here to undertake to pass upon the constitutionality of any specific provision of law, and I would not have the temerity to stand before any tribunal engaged in seriously considering the subject and undertake to talk about a specific case concerning which I am informed only by what I hear on the floor of the Senate or what I read in the public press; but, as near as I can understand from what I have heard here to-day and what I have seen in the newspapers, in a particular case on a particular item, that is, wire fencing or netting, certain customs officials undertook the great function of declaring this provision of the law to be unconstitutional.

We know that if there is any one distinguishing characteristic of the Government of the United States which makes it stand out superior to any other form of government ever created in all the world and in all time it is the Supreme Court of the United States, which is invested with exclusive power and the exclusive sovereign right of saying what acts passed by the Congress of the United States are and what are not constitutional. No other body in all the world exercises any such power as that; no other body in all the world can, with any effect whatever, undertake to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, and yet a customs officer, a customs court, assumes that attitude.

On close examination it would probably be found that the decision was rendered for the sole purpose of raising the question and getting it to the Supreme Court, and not with any view of having any effect upon the act either in legislation here that may be reflected by that decision or in any judgment that may flow from it. Of course, it is an act of temerity for a Senator to stand here and controvert the court and say that he believes the law is constitutional notwithstanding that judgment, but I am going to be so hardy as to do that, and to declare that I am firmly persuaded, as a Senator, that this law is sound and is constitutional or I would not be on my feet supporting it.

The fact is, so far as I can see, that what the Tariff Commission did in the case of woven wire was to give it a different tariff rate. One may call that any name he pleases, but, as I see it, it was the exercise of the right to change the classification of an item of trade. The Tariff Commission merely lifted woven-wire fencing out of a basket provision, as it is called, a general provision, including many items; it lifted this one item out of the basket clause and said, "We will, within the 50 per cent limitation, increase the rate on this one item out of a whole basketful." I believe that is what was done. If that be the case, that change of classification, if it is such a change, that change of rate, is not legislation; it is not fixing rates. When Congress put a maximum and a minimum limit upon the flexibility of the rate it legislated, the legislative act was complete and finished; and an increase of the rate within the limitation was a mere administrative function under the law. When, under their power, the commission lifted that item out of the basket clause, it did what it was specifically granted the power to do as an administrative act, and not as a legislative function.

When it comes to hearings before the committees of either House of Congress with respect to the imposition of a tariff on an item that is free, or with respect to the change in the rate of duty on the item or with respect to putting it among its proper associates and taking it out of bad company, the committees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to-day have the benefit of the advice of the Tariff Commission. It is not necessary to destroy the flexible feature of the tariff law in order to continue to enjoy all the advice, support, and assistance of the Tariff Commission which has been heretofore enjoyed and is enjoyed to-day and is not created by this substitute bill.

I have spoken somewhat from my own observation in respect to this matter, but I do not like to rely upon that. Therefore I cite authority for this proposition in general. I quote from the Commissioner of Customs, who says:

In the hearings before the Senate and House committees, everyone is given an opportunity to be heard and to present his case; and you will get an idea of the extent to which this is done when I tell you that the record of the hearings before the two committees covers some 18,000 printed pages.

He was referring to the very tariff bill to which an amendment is now proposed.

I might add at this point that in our recent revision there has been a decided tendency for the Congress to rely less and less on the data submitted at these hearings and to frame the bill in consultation with the Government experts of the Tariff Commission and of the Treasury Department.

Anyone who has gone to the Tariff Commission in an attempt to secure an increase in a tariff rate or a change in a schedule in any way has encountered the vast amount of information and scientific data gathered at home and abroad affecting the subject which really puts his own information completely in the shadow.

I should like to refer to the subject later in discussing the second feature of this tariff measure, but it is getting late, and I am sure the Senate has been very generous listening to me so patiently after a long day. So I will conclude the first proposition which I desire to make here and will be glad—

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator desire to conclude tomorrow?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will be very glad to complete my remarks to-morrow, if I may then be recognized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will be recognized.

Tuesday, March 29, 1932 RÉSUMÉ OF ADEQUACY OF LAW

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, on yesterday we suspended the discussion of reasons why the Harrison substitute to the pending measure (H. R. 6662) ought not to pass with the claim that the substitute is unnecessary to effect the purposes stated by the proponents of that measure. It is alleged that Congress has and exercises the power which the proponents claim the substitute would return to Congress. It exercises those powers under and by virtue of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution in vesting Congress with the power to "lay and collect duties, taxes, imposts, and excises."

Again, the proposed substitute, we claim, ought not to be enacted, because it is not necessary to invest the Tariff Commission with the powers claimed by the proponents to be invested by the substitute. The commission already has and enjoys these powers by virtue of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act and by virtue of sections not objected to and not suggested to be changed in any manner by this proposed amendment.

Again, the substitute is inadequate and deficient for the purposes stated by its proponents, because it omits very essential elements that are found in section 336 of the present tariff act.

Again, it is destructive and not constructive, because it removes the only effectual plan for correcting errors in rates. It ought not to be adopted, as we urge justly, because it eliminates consideration of the national interests and magnifies the consideration of local interests by turning back to the ancient and discarded method of logrolling for the proposed correction of errors, the very abuse against which section 336 was aimed, and aimed effectually.

THE MAPLE SUGAR INVESTIGATION

Furthermore, it destroys the beneficial element of speed in securing a remedy. I call the attention of the Senate to the speed with which the flexible feature of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law was employed against the farmers of 21 States in this Union which produce maple sugar, and particularly against the farmers of the State of Vermont. With the permission of the Senate, I will read a short paragraph from a letter from A. H. Packard, president of the Vermont State Farm Bureau, written to me, dated January 21, 1932:

Pleased to receive your letter of January 14 regarding the tariff on maple sirup, and will say that the deflation of Canadian currency takes away part of the protection which we had even after the Tariff Commission got through with us. You will recall that our tariff from 1920 to 1930 was approximately 30 cents per gallon; that Congress, on June 8, 1930, gave us approximately 60 cents per gallon protection; and that fall some one got the Tariff Commission started, and when the sky cleared we had approximately 44 cents protection. A 20 per cent discount on money reduces this 44 cents quite a way back toward the old 30, and practically opens up the door so that Canada can again send sirup in with very little hesitation.

I have ascertained that what took place to which this Vermont farmer alludes was the following: Of course, we start from the point that the tariff act of 1930—the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act—became a law, on June 17, 1930. On July 2 the senior Senator from New York [Mr. Copeland] asked unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate resolution 313, which proposed an investigation by the Tariff Commission, under the flexible clause of the tariff act, of certain specified commodities.

HISTORY OF TARIFF RATES ON MAPLE PRODUCTS

There was no debate in regard to the resolution, but it was objected to by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Thomas] and went over until July 3, when it was again brought up, and agreed to. Before the last-mentioned action was taken, the senior and distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] offered an amendment to include maple sirup and maple sugar among the commodities to be investigated under the resolution. No objection was raised to that amendment. Following its investigation of maple sugar and maple sirup under the terms of the Copeland resolution, the Tariff Commission submitted its report to the President on February 2, 1931, recommending a decrease of the rate on maple sugar from 8 cents to 6 cents, and a decrease of the rate of duty on maple sirup from 51/2 cents per pound to 4 cents per pound. The President subsequently issued a proclamation changing the rate in accordance with the recommendations of the Tariff Commission.

I call the attention of the Senate now to the element of time involved in this proceeding in order that there may be impressed unforgetably the fact that section 336 of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law creates speed in the correction of any error, if such there has been, in fixing the rate of duty upon any single commodity by the Congress. Speed! This change in the rates on maple sirup and maple sugar, whether right or wrong-and I am not debating that question, it will be understood, for it will be soon enough to take it up if we can persuade this body to do so-whether right or wrong, I say those rates were changed even before the law had an opportunity to be applied to maple sugar and maple sirup. Before ever the farmers of Vermont and other States could produce a single crop to benefit by the rate in the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act some interest caused a resolution of the Senate of the United States to excite the action of the Tariff Commission, and all the machinery which is provided by the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was actuated into motion. The entire investigation completed; the proclamation by the President issued; and the beneficial effect of the action of Congress in raising the rate on maple sugar entirely destroyed before the farmer could even try it out.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is not what the Senator says an argument in favor of the Harrison proposal that before a change shall actually be made, after the Tariff Commission has acted, it shall be brought to Congress for its opinion?

I am in the fullest sympathy with the Senator regarding the rates of duty on maple sugar and maple sirup, because they are produced in my State as well as in his; but this action was taken by the President under the present act without any opportunity on the part of the Congress to be heard regarding its wishes in the matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the answer to that question in a word is "no," and the explanation of the answer is as follows: There is no more logic or sense, even, in saying that the Tariff Commission should be abolished because it has rendered an adverse judgment to some interest than there is in saying that the Senate should be abolished for exciting the action of the Tariff Commission. It is not a question of whether the action taken was right or wrong; it is not a question of who is responsible for doing this thing; the question to-day for us is-and it is a serious question for the people of the State of Vermont, because onethird of our population is engaged in agriculture, and the making of maple sugar is a very important prop and support to their humble lives—the question to-day is, Shall we have an equal privilege with those who started this attack upon maple sugar to recover and have restored to maple sugar its rights and to the farmers of Vermont their rights, if they have them? I would as soon think of saying we should abolish a court which renders judgment against me as to think of abolishing the Tariff Commission because its action in the case of maple sugar was unfortunate and harmed the interest of the farmers of my State.

The substitute of the Senator from Mississippi, if enacted into law, would strike from under the farmers of Vermont and every other State where maple sugar is produced the privilege of presenting the case to a board which can act scientifically, which can take into consideration facts which were not previously presented to them, can take into consideration changed conditions, and render a judgment as of to-day, and render it with speed; because, if the substitute is adopted, the element of speed is gone, and gone forever, until we restored, if we ever should, to the tariff measure some flexible feature that will provide for an immediate correction of errors committed in the logrolling process in Congress.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. It seems to me the Senator is unfortunate in his particular example of the efficiency of the present system, because if, under the proposed substitute, we had the report of the Tariff Commission on maple sirup and maple sugar, we could here bring our own individual views to bear upon the decision. I have no doubt that the able Senator from Vermont could bring material here to bolster his thought that there should be greater protection upon this commodity, but at present, when the recommendation of the Tariff Commission goes to the President and the President acts, then we are foreclosed until we have a general tariff revision. I think that it was very unfortunate that these particular items, maple sugar and maple sirup, received the treatment they did at the hands of the Tariff Commission and at the hands of the President. I doubt exceedingly if it would have happened had the Harrison law been in effect and had the report of the commission been brought back here. Even though there might have been a few months' delay, there would have been greater justice done to the farmers of Vermont and the farmers of New York than under the particular action which was taken by the Tariff Commission and by the President.

Mr. AUSTIN. The argument of the learned senior Senator from New York brings out in fine relief the very thing we are contending for, and that is this matter of speed, which can be preserved if we preserve the flexible feature of the tariff law, and which can be destroyed if we destroy the flexible feature of the tariff law.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Fess in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. AUSTIN. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand that the Senator is criticizing the Tariff Commission for showing too much speed in reducing the rate on maple sugar and maple sirup?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the Senator was not criticizing the Tariff Commission for anything. The Senator was praising section 336 of the Smoot-Hawley tariff law because it permitted immediate, prompt change, within the limits of the act, of the amount of the tariff on a certain commodity. I intend to follow this with a statement of the general record of achievement of the Tariff Commission and to make the claim that if the commission were wiped out and it became necessary to go to Congress in place of going to the Executive for the purpose of making a proclamation, you could go only at stated times of the year. You would deal with three or four hundred individuals instead of with one individual. You would excite the cupidity, the selfish interests of all the different localities that wished to do some logrolling for their benefit the moment you stepped into Congress with this matter; and instead of having the comprehensive and broadvisioned and special expert knowledge of the Chief Executive, with his staff, you would have the specialized, diversified, and expert knowledge of really hundreds of different experts trying to deal with that matter. So that in every respect I praise, and do not criticize, the Tariff Commission.

Mr. HARRISON. Then the Senator praises the Tariff Commission for having reduced the tariff on maple sugar and maple sirun?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; that is not a conclusion that can logically follow my remarks.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator mind telling me whether he agrees with the Tariff Commission in that find-

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I prefer not to state. Mr. HARRISON. Why does the Senator refuse to tell us that?

Mr. AUSTIN. Because it is entirely irrelevant and not germane to my argument.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not a fact that the reason why the Senator does not want to tell us is because his State is very much interested in maple sugar and maple sirup, and the Tariff Commission has reduced this duty perceptibly, and the Senator does not feel like getting into a controversy with anyone in his State with reference to his

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I will answer that question. The Senator does not feel that way about the matter. For the present, in this body, and on the substitute which is under consideration, the Senator views the situation to Whatever may have been the facts which moved the Tariff Commission to reduce the rates on maple sugar and maple sirup, the Senator from Vermont has no doubt of the good faith and the intent of the Tariff Commission to do justice and is not going to stand in this body and undertake to criticize the judgment of that commission.

Looked at from the point of view of the learned Senator from Mississippi-namely, political interest-I should say that it appears to me like this: It is quite a significant picture. Apparently the advocate of the interest of the man who makes a rich, juicy, sweet chew of tobacco to obtain a nice, fine profit from the sweetener that is obtained from the green hills of Vermont is at least more powerful than the advocate of the interest of the hardy farmer up there, slushing around the melting snows of the mountains in his rubber boots, who manufactures that sweetener. I am for that farmer, and when the time comes the Senator will hear from me on this tariff question. But I am not debating an item of the tariff; I am dealing with a principle-namely, Shall we remove the only means we have of restoring that tariff if it is correct that it should be restored?

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator permit me to congratulate him on the clarity of his answer to my question? Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator. I appreciate his generosity, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. It is just as clear as mud.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator a further question without desiring to get him into a controversy with his constituents, as to whether or not he approves of the Tariff Commission's finding reducing the tariff duty on maple sugar and maple sirup. He says he favors the present plan because of its flexibility, and that there would have been delay if we had not had such a law. That is right, as I understand. Then, the Senator says that if this recommendation had come back to Congress there would be some logrolling and swapping, and that is a thing we want to get away from.

The Senator has studied this substitute and the House bill. Under the present law, of course, a tariff bill comes in here. We have seen some swapping, some logrolling; but we prevent that in this substitute by saying that no subject shall be considered that is not germane to the particular subject matter of the bill. Now, I want to ask the Senator this question: Suppose this report had come in on maple sugar and maple sirup. If this bill were being considered then in the Senate, does he know of any other amendment that might have been offered as to any other product that would be germane to the particular subject matter?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I will try to answer that question. I tried to answer the other question. Perhaps my answer was not complete enough, and after answering the pending question I will go back and add to my former answer.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will just answer the last question as to what amendment would be germane to the consideration of any other question, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will try to do that.

It would make no difference whatever whether it were germane or not upon the question of "back scratching" in Congress. It would make no difference whether any other amendment were pending than the single one spoken of by the learned Senator from Mississippi, for this reason: There is nothing to prevent the genial Senator from Mississippi from saying to the genial Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], "You help us in that bill and we will help you by and by with such and such a thing in which you are interested."

The measure does not have to be immediately pending in Congress in order to have the wildest sort of back scratching and logrolling; and it is that very thing which both the great parties have declared against and which they have sought to obviate in their platforms when they have declared for a scientific method of adjusting rates. It is really an astonishing thing to see the leaders of the Democratic Party standing up here to-day against the solemn declaration of their entire organization in their last national convention upon this subject.

Now, returning, as I intended to do before finishing, to the former question of the Senator from Mississippi, I will add something. I thought I had completely answered him; but if it interests him more to know what my constituents think about this matter than I appeared to understand, I will read this telegram from W. L. McKee, president of Associated Industries of Vermont. This is dated January 5 and addressed to me:

Newspaper reports Representative Garner is proposing a change in administrative section of tariff bill requiring Tariff Commission report to Congress instead of to the President, and that such bill is expected to pass this week. The prosperity of Vermont farmers and industry is absolutely dependent upon tariff protection. Canadian farm products and manufactured articles are now injur-Canadian farm products and manufactured articles are now injuring Vermont industries more than people realize under present tariff. The proposed change apparently places this question in politics and would practically nullify the workings of the flexible section of the tariff act and render impossible adjustments necessary to protect Vermont industry against changing Canadian conditions. Firmly of belief that the administration of this act should not be subject to political quarrels or delay. Hope that your judgment and knowledge of Vermont conditions will lead you to oppose this strenuously and completely. Believe our association would oppose change almost 100 per cent.

W. L. McKee.

President Associated Industries of Vermont.

Mr. President, that is some evidence that the constituency which I represent is being represented in respect to the preservation of the flexible feature of the tariff law.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to get back to the question I asked the Senator. He cited the illustration that if a bill reducing the tariff on maple sugar and maple sirup were here, nothing would prevent me from going over to the Senator from Massachusetts or some other Senator and saying, "You vote with me on this bill, and I will vote with you on some other bill." Of course, that could be done if we would be guilty of such nefarious conduct; but will the Senator now admit that if a report under this substitute for the House bill should come before the Senate for consideration, the subject being merely the reduction of the tariff on maple sugar and maple sirup, an amendment to put a tariff on some other commodity in that particular bill would be subject to a point of order, and would not be germane? Will he admit that?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will not admit that. The question of what is germane will prove to be one of the most troublesome questions the Senate will have to deal with if this act ever becomes a law.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, I will ask the Senator, what product he would suggest as the subject of an amendment touching the tariff that would be germane to the tariff on maple sugar and maple sirup?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think I do not understand the question.

Will the Senator state it again?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Vermont says that other matters could be offered as amendments that would be germane. I am asking him to state one that would be germane in the consideration of the tariff on maple sugar and maple sirup.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from Vermont did not so state; and, so far as he is informed at the present moment, he would feel great hesitancy in undertaking to define what is germane, and to make an example of a germane item.

That was not the point, in any event.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what I am asking the Senator—to state one product that would be germane in the consideration of the tariff on maple sugar and maple sirup.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should be glad to do so, but it is entirely irrelevant to anything I am debating here. I am not here for the purpose of answering questions of that character. I think it would be just as sensible to ask me what I know about white mice as to ask me a question like that, when I do not claim and have not claimed that any action could be taken by the Senate which would not be germane, or which would be germane, to a pending bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, with all deference to the Senator, I know that he wants to debate this question in a very fair way, and I am trying to reach the same result. The difference in the viewpoint of the Senator and myself and others is that he is arguing that the substitute will not clarify the matter of writing a tariff bill from past procedure. He has condemned the logrolling and the swapping-of-votes process which we have seen in tariff legislation. We contend that under the substitute no amendment that is not germane to a particular subject matter would be considered. I am asking the Senator if he can state a single proposition, when we were considering a report of the Tariff Commission on maple sugar and maple sirup, that would be germane, and he does not tell me, he does not answer the question. Yet he says that that has nothing to do with the question. It has a great deal to do with it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I will be pleased to accord to the Senator from Mississippi the privilege of allowing his statement just made to stand without contest, for I am making no argument based upon the thing he is talking about, none whatever. The point I am trying to make-perhaps I am doing it so abstrusely that I am misrepresenting my own thought—is that this substitute should not be agreed to because of the fact that it would destroy the speed with which correction of errors could be made, because it would destroy the flexibility of the present law.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question, on the question of speed?

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator goes on to the question of speed, I want to ask something pertaining to this par-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will be very grateful to the Senator. Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Mississippi asks what would be offered as an amendment that would be germane. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that an amendment putting a tariff on tooth paste made out of maple wood would be germane. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I might agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. NORRIS. It comes from maple.

Mr. HARRISON. Getting back to the question of speed, I want to ask the Senator from Vermont a question. As I understand him, he is arguing that we get more speed by leaving to the Tariff Commission the power to fix rates, to reduce them or increase them. That is right, is it not?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is correct. I do not know that is the whole question I would want to assent to.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will recall that under the Fordney-McCumber law the tariff on maple sugar and maple sirup, getting back to the matter the Senator is discussing, was 4 cents a pound, and the Tariff Commission, while President Coolidge was President, recommended a reduction of the tariff on maple sirup to 31/2 cents and an increase to 5.3 cents on maple sugar. Instead of getting speed, you did not get it. The President, who came from the State represented by the Senator, refused to ratify or proclaim the rates promulgated by the Tariff Commission, and you did not get any speed at all. You did not get a reduction on the maple sirup and you did not get any increase on the maple sugar. What has the Senator to say about the speed of that incident?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have this to say, that section 336 of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, which we are discussing and which is the only thing we are discussing, was not in existence at that time. We are not dealing with the same things whatever, and the endeavors to drag me out of a discussion of the pending question will not be suc-

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator does not want to fall into error that way. The Tariff Commission had practically the same power under the Fordney-Mc-Cumber law, which was the law when Mr. Coolidge refused to accept the findings of the Tariff Commission, as under the Smoot-Hawley law. Will not the Senator go back in his recollection and agree with me in that statement?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am not discussing the law as it stood before the Smoot-Hawley tariff law was enacted. We are not dealing with anything here but section 336, for which the Senator has offered a substitute, and the question before the Senate is not what the condition of the law was before the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was passed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not care to yield further if we are going off the pending question.

Mr. HARRISON. I just wanted to correct an error the Senator has gotten into. Under the Fordney-McCumber law, passed in 1922, the power of the Tariff Commission under the flexible provision was practically the same as under the Smoot-Hawley law, and I think my friend the Senator from Utah will nod his head in assent to that proposition. I just want to keep the Senator straight on that matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I understand the very fine intentions of the senior Senator from Mississippi, and thank him fully, as much as the occasion deserves. I now wish to proceed with my argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield further.

RECORD OF TARIFF COMMISSION

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I might call attention at this moment, in passing, briefly to the achievements of this Federal commission which is under attack here. Since its reorganization, in September, 1930, the commission has disposed of 113 cases, with increases in duties on 12 commodities, decreases on 17 commodities, and no change recommended in 39 other cases. Four cases were returned to the commission by the President for further investigation. Eight investigations ordered by the Senate were dismissed by that body. Five applications were withdrawn by proponents, and 20 applications were dismissed by the commission itself after careful preliminary investigation.

It seems to me that when we consider the period involved, namely, from September, 1930, to January 1, 1931, when this report was made, the record of action of the Tariff Commission is a voucher of its usefulness and an argument for its maintenance and preservation for the benefit of the wage earner, for the benefit of labor, and for the benefit of the employer, and the man who is forced in this depression to seek out new avenues for enterprise, in order that we may maintain or restore that degree of prosperity which tends to the high standard of living to which our people are educated and to which they aspire.

It seems to me—and I will make this brief—that this is the poorest time when any such attack as this could be offered against the tariff act known as the Smoot-Hawley tariff law. When, in all the experience of the American people, could it be more inappropriate to offer in Congress a measure which is replete with promises of concessions, tariff concessions, mutual concessions to our competitors; replete with promises of taking out of the taxable list and putting on the free list other commodities; replete with suggestions of reductions of tariff rates? When in all our history could such a proposition be more injurious to the wage earner than it is to-day?

We see labor all over the United States, organized and unorganized, standing up in solid ranks against this substitute, because labor sees that if the tariff wall in this emergency is broken down, if foreign competition is admitted to a greater extent than we have it to-day, our depression will be given a further impetus downward; and those who are at the bottom of the scale will suffer the most when that takes place.

THE VERMONT FARMER

Of course, in my own State the farmers, about whom I have talked, feel it keenly. Ask one of them about the human side of the tariff law, and you will get a picture. You will see something that will stand out in your imagination with more persuasive eloquence than all the reasoning that could be indulged in here by anybody. Live in a border town on the Canadian line, spend you boyhood there, back and forth from Canada into Vermont, and witness what we have witnessed there, the difference in the standards and conditions of living between the American farmer and the Canadian farmer.

We have seen the day when there was not a range in a dwelling house north of the line, and the bread was baked in an outdoor oven. We have seen water taken with a well sweep for lack of a pump. We have seen their fields tilled with old-fashioned machinery. We have seen their grain garnered with the scythe operated by hand. We have seen their pigs and their cattle and horses, their sheep and poultry, all pastured together in the front-door yard and We have seen every member of the family having to go into the fields and work and toil by hand-mother, sons, and daughters-in order to eke out a living on those rich farms, whose opportunity, however, was as different as you can possibly imagine from the opportunity of those sturdy farmers just across that imaginary line in the State of Vermont, who enjoyed modern machinery, whose housewives had a range, whose well contained a pump, whose farms were tilled by men, whose cows were milked by milking machines and men, not by the girls of the household.

Then we saw a thing take place. The Canadian farmers began to move out of Canada across the line and pay huge prices for farms in Vermont, and the value of land in Vermont went up. Not only did we see the standard of living better, the luxuries and comforts of life taken to the farmer on the hillside there, but we saw values go up, and to-day you will find the Canadian Frenchmen—a mighty fine type of humanity, let me say in his praise and to the glory of truth-extending all the way through the State of Vermont, and occupying and tilling our farms." That is what you find there to-day. You see the human effect of a protective tariff. In the early days there was $4 a ton on hay. It is now $6, made so because of the changed value of hay. But I want to state that the tariff on hay alone had the greatest reflex on the people on both sides of that line, and could be known and observed by every boy who was growing up on the line. Perhaps that is one reason why Vermont is Republican. The Republican tariff came from Vermont. Justin S. Morrill, that great statesman, the founder of the land-grant colleges, which are enjoyed by every State in this Union, wrote the first Republican tariff act. He received his high inspiration from his experience on the border, and that had been quite a varied experience which taught those Republicans to believe that they were opposed to an embargo, that a tariff that was so high as to amount to an embargo was bad. They saw that also from their lives and experience there.

During the administration of Thomas Jefferson the Vermonters organized a rebellion against the Jefferson embargo of 1808 which resulted in armed force and the shedding of human blood and the loss of human lives. Vermonters do not insist upon an embargo or rates high enough to prevent the proper exchange of business between countries, but they have learned from experience the indispensable value of a tariff that does protect in order to raise up and keep raised up the standard of living for them and their posterity.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am in the greatest sympathy with what the Senator said about the value of the tariff. I am one of those on this side of the aisle who believe in it. properly applied. But I want to ask the Senator if it is not possible at least that the Tariff Commission, dealing with matters as it does under the present law, is excluded from taking into consideration the human element mentioned by the Senator? On the other hand, if we could bring here the subject about which the Senator spoke a little while ago. the maple-sugar tariff, after the commission had considered it thoroughly from the legalistic or statistical standpoint, we could have the human side presented here. But as I understand the Senator, he is satisfied to have it as it is now because, he says, we get immediate action and we do not have all the possibility of logrolling. I could have answered the question a little while ago propounded by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison] about subjects germane to it. We might have brought in the subject of chewing tobacco, which is sweetened, and of cheap sugar and refined sugar. I could have brought in, too, the matter of saccharin. Those matters might properly be considered as germane, but there could not be brought in all of the 21,000 items embraced in the tariff act.

As I said, it would be much better, if I may say so with all courtesy to the Senator, to adopt the plan proposed in the Harrison substitute because after the Tariff Commission had developed the legal side and the statistical side, the matter would come here for consideration of the human side. I honor the Senator for what he has said about that side of the question. I was born on a farm and know something about farm conditions. I know how trying they are. But the Tariff Commission does not consider that element. I think really the Senator, if I may say it, is mistaken in his opposition to this particular feature of the bill. I think it would be far better to have the report brought to us from the Tariff Commission in order that we might inject into it the human element and make it a human thing instead of just simply a statistical thing as it is under the present law.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I appreciate the point of view of the distinguished senior Senator from New York and his very excellent statement of his attitude toward the pending legislation. It is natural, since the proponent of the measure is a leader in the great Democratic Party and the senior Senator from New York is likewise such a leader. But we differ, and we differ with respect for each other. I may comment, however, upon what the distinguished Senator said in this way. He said, "Why not bring the human problem into Congress where we have a flow of the milk of human kindness and have action upon it here?" I say, do so, by all means do so, but do not destroy the other agency of speedy remedy.

I do not need to repeat what I have stated several times yesterday and to-day that Congress still enjoys its constitutional right to entertain the tariff on maple sugar, even though the Tariff Commission made a decree yesterday. That is just the point. We may bring the human problem to Congress whatever the judgment of the Tariff Commission may be, and we may bring it here at any time. We may bring it while they are considering, we may bring it before they consider, or we may bring it after they have considered the matter. Under the Constitution of the United States this is the place where we can bring the human problem and bring it many times, whether it bear upon the tariff question or not. We enjoy that privilege, and I would join the Senator from New York any time that I thought a project of his involved justice or humanity, even though it did run counter to the judgment of the Tariff

So the point I discuss is, Why lose this valuable machine, why wreck it in its infancy, as it were, and while it has just begun to get its stride? Preserve it. It is a benefit to us all the time. We do not have to ask the Tariff Commission to change a rate to have it benefit us. It is at work all the time, and when next we come to review the general tariff law, we will have the benefit of its special skill and knowledge and experience, and we will also have the human side of the question as we always do when we have hearings on a tariff measure.

Mr. President, I shall pass from this phase of the subject and take up the second feature of the proposed measure.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before the Senator does that will he yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. Very well; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is very patient, and I have such high respect for him that I do not want to interrupt him unduly, as he knows. But I feel really that the Senator has a misconception of the purpose of the bill, or else I do not understand it myself. As I understand it, the bill preserves the Tariff Commission with all the functions it has now. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator is wrong, in my opinion.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi whether I am in error about it?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr: HARRISON. What the substitute does, as I tried to point out in detail the other day, is this: We have taken away from the Tariff Commission very few powers. The major power we have taken away from them is the right to write rates. We have divested them of that power and placed it in the Congress.

We lay down specifically—not in general language as in the present law, but specifically—the factors the Tariff Commission must consider in ascertaining the cost of production. For instance, we give a definition of transportation. While the Senator from Vermont says in a general way they can study the economic location and efficiency of a particular plant, we say specifically that they shall do it—and so on down through the list. In other words, we particularize wherein the present law is general. We have not divested the Tariff Commission of any power they have now except the power of fixing rates finally.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President-

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I should like to continue, but I will yield in a moment. However, before yielding again to the learned Senator from New York, I wish to invite attention to an error in the statement of the proponent of the subject. One of the important and eventual requirements in section 336 which will be abolished, wiped out by the substitute, is that which deals with the wages of capital. Is not that so? That is washed out and destroyed entirely.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont declines to yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to prove my statement. I have only made the statement, and before yielding I want to prove it.

On page 126 of the present law, section 336, paragraph (h), subsection (4) (b) reads as follows, and it is washed out very quietly, with no discussion of it at all:

(4) The term "cost of production," when applied with respect to either a domestic article or a foreign article, includes, for a period which is representative of conditions in production of the article.

* * * (b) The usual general expenses, including charges for depreciation or depletion which are representative of the equipment and property employed in the production of the article and charges for rent or interest which are representative of the cost of obtaining capital or instruments of production.

I submit that when we strike out a section which includes that provision and replace it by a section which does not include it, we have struck out of the law one of the most important protections that the wage earner and the farmer can possibly have. Why? The American wage earner and the American farmer have that differential to overcome. A tariff that does not take into consideration the wages of capital is a tremendous burden and hardship upon the wages of labor, because it is labor that has to compete in the end. Over there the price is fixed by the cost of production, and it takes into account overhead and the wages of capital, for capital will not work without its wages. But over here we must not, we can not, after this measure becomes a law, take into account the wages of capital in fixing the protection which our wage earners shall get from the products of that capital or the instruments of labor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator, of course, has read, on page 3, subsection 1, as follows:

The differences in conditions of production, including wages, costs of materials, and other items in cost of production of like or similar articles in the United States and in competing foreign countries; costs of transportation; other costs including the cost of containers—

And reference is then made to numerous other items that must enter into the cost of production.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, all those features are in the Hawley-Smoot Act as well as the feature which takes care of the wages of capital. Now I should like to pass on. I fear I am wearying the Senate with this prolonged debate, and I should like to conclude.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I hesitate to interrupt the Senator, but I am just as anxious to ascertain the true inwardness of this bill as is he. I did not write it; I never saw it until it came on the floor; but I have gone through a general tariff revision, I want to say to the Senator, and I never want to do it again. That is not the way to make a tariff law. It keeps us here for months at a time, and unquestionably logrolling enters into a general revision of the tariff; but, as I see it, if, as to a given item, we could have from a scientific body, an impartial body, a nonpartian body, such as is the Tariff Commission, the facts regarding the cost of production here contrasted with the cost of production abroad, then we could honestly and calmly determine a proper tariff rate.

I can not see what there is in the Harrison proposal that | is in the least dangerous. It proposes to bring to us all the information on maple sugar, for instance, and then we shall be as well qualified, with that information before us, as are the tariff experts themselves to determine what the rate shall be. Then, as I said a little while ago, we can add to it the human element, involving the interests of the people. I may be wrong, and I am usually convinced by everything the Senator says, but, frankly, I remain unconvinced in this particular matter.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the learned Senator from New York is not convinced by what I have said to-day. Perhaps if he had been here yesterday and had then heard my discussion of the very questions mentioned to-day, he might be convinced.

Mr. COPELAND. I shall read the RECORD, so that I may know what the Senator said on yesterday.

Mr. AUSTIN. On yesterday I tried to dissect the measures and show the fact that Congress, under the present law, can do exactly the thing which the learned Senator from New York wants to do, and that the substitute is not necessary for that purpose. One may now call on the Tariff Commission-

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to finish my statement, but I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. But that is not the way we do it. A tariff bill is brought in here with 21,000 items. I can get an increased rate on crin vegetal if I will agree to an increased rate on cottonseed oil. That is the way it is done. I do not want to be personal about it, and perhaps that is a bad example, but, after all, that is what happens when we have a general revision of the tariff. However, under this proposed plan there would be brought before us one item at a time.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, my observation, of course, has not been so great and my experience has not been so ample as has that of the senior Senator from New York; but I will say, from such observation as I have had of the working out of the great tariff measures such as the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, that every item that was controverted was singled out and thrashed out, and evidence afforded, and the helpful contributions of the Tariff Commission and the Treasury attachés and the departments which were interested in the particular item were all brought in. As the result of that process, the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, which represents the wisdom and the probity of a great number of experts, and which has not yet been assailed in any single item by Congress, was passed. And the Smoot-Hawley tariff law permits to be done just the thing which the great Senator from New York, whose heart always reaches out to the needy and who is always looking out for the humanities, desires to have done. He may have confidence that he can bring into Congress by his own act at any time any item of the tariff measure and have the entire force and skill and knowledge and special information which this proposed substitute undertakes to tell us that it gives us, but does not give us, and which gives less than section 336 and other provisions of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill give.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield just this once, and then I shall stop asking him to yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from New York need not stop asking me to yield. I am glad to yield to him.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I feel that the Senator from Vermont is wrong in one respect at least. He is right, of course, when he says that any tariff item may be presented at any time, but the minute it is presented additions may be made to it. Suggestions may be made to add pig iron and wool and cotton textiles. That is the trouble. The proposal of the Senator from Mississippi is that when a report comes in oh maple sugar, nothing else may be considered except some subject absolutely germane to that particular item. So the Senator is quite wrong, if I may be permitted to say so, when he says that single items may be brought before Congress and given consideration, because that is not possible. In the case of maple sugar, I was given the credit in the Senator's State and mine of having instituted the hearing before the Tariff Commission. As a matter of fact, I asked for a hearing on pig iron, but on motion of the Senator from Mississippi my resolution was amended so as to include maple sugar. The RECORD, therefore, shows that I asked for a hearing on maple sugar, although I would have been the last man in the Senate to ask for it, but by reason of the fact that my resolution was thus amended I was given credit for the investigation of the rate of duty on that item.

I should like to have an increased rate on refined sugar; but if I were to bring that question up, there would be a hundred amendments offered to it relating to other subjects, and then we would have a general revision of the tariff, or at least a discussion of the tariff. Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Utah. Mr. SMOOT. The closing statement of the Senator from New York perhaps is correct. However, under the proposal of the Senator from Mississippi the question of germaneness is raised. Maple sugar as an item, as the Senator from New York has said, was not germane to the resolution he originally introduced in regard to pig iron, but maple sugar was put in the resolution on motion of the Senator from Mississippi. Maple sugar, however, is used in connection with a number of commodities; it is used, for instance, in the manufacture of tobacco; it is used in certain candies; it is used in frosting; it is used in connection with many other items, perhaps, which would be germane under the provisions of the pending substitute to the items of maple sugar and maple Pig iron, to which the Senator from New York referred, goes through the whole metal schedule. There is hardly anything in the metal schedule that would not be germane to pig iron.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. SMOOT. I yield if I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Mississippi? Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I agree with the Senator from Utah that, in the case of certain kinds of tobacco, maple sirup enters into its manufacture, and so an amendment regarding tobacco might be germane. Germaneness, however, would depend upon whether a commodity was a substantial part of the original item. Of course, no one would contend that pig iron would be germane to maple sugar or maple sirup.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. But the point is—and the Senator from Utah will agree with me, I think—that the provision as to germaneness would restrict amendments to a limited number

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, it would restrict the action of the Senate, in that it would prevent the Senate going into every item in a tariff bill; there is no doubt about that; but there are hundreds of items in the tariff bill which are germane to other items.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And all those would be open. I suppose the Senator from Mississippi will agree to that statement.

Mr. HARRISON. If a certain commodity were a substantial part of another commodity or a principal ingredient, it would be germane; otherwise it would not be.

Mr. SMOOT. I think no one could claim that if one commodity was even a relatively small proportion of another commodity the rate on which it was proposed to change that it would not be germane.

Mr. HARRISON. In the case of leather, for instance, I think boots and shoes would be considered as being germane to leather, and in the case of pig iron, of course, the big cylinders into which pig iron goes would be germane.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am very reluctant to stop this interesting debate between the learned Senators; but I decline to be lured into a strange field on the subject of germaneness, which I consider entirely irrelevant to the point I am trying to make.

CONSUMERS' COUNSEL

Now, I should like to pass on and consider that feature of the pending bill which provides for a consumers' counsel. That is not such a terrible thing. The creation of a consumers' counsel, with all his retinue, with all his assistants, with all his activities, involving a duplication of the work of the investigatorial body, would not be so terrible except that in this great depression, when we are trying to prevent the creation of additional bureaus, when we are trying, in fact, to cut down bureaus and to reduce expenses, anything that would add to the expense of government in an unnecessary way ought to be frowned upon.

I do not care to spend much time upon this objection to the proposed substitute. It is, however, an objection to the substitute that this feature of the consumers' counsel is in it. We know perfectly well from experience that the consumer is always there, always represented when there is a controverted item before the Tariff Commission. We have heard allusions to the World Trade League of the United States, an organization or association which has great resources to influence legislation with respect to the tariff; and we know if we define the consumer as the importer or the man who sells the foreign product in competition with the domestic product, that he does not need subsidizing by the United States Treasury; he does not need a force of trained investigators to go abroad and to go about America to furnish him facts with which to come in and beat down the protection of the wage earner, the farmer, the manufacturer, and the private individual whose enterprise and capital have tended to improve the standard of living. I venture to say that once this new bureau were well established we would find this strange situation—a jealousy, a rivalry, a conflict between that new bureau and the old bureau, which has been doing the same thing for the benefit of the people, with disastrous effect upon the wage earner, upon the farmer, and upon the man who provides for the overhead.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield. Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator read the findings of the Tariff Commission on cement?

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator has not.

Mr. GEORGE. I wanted to ask the Senator where the consumers' counsel appeared in that hearing. If the Senator is not familiar with the hearing, or the findings based upon the hearing, of course I will not pursue my question; but he had just made the rather broad and sweeping statement that in all instances the consumer was always present and always represented at the hearings on the question of rates before the commission. The Senator is not able to tell me, is he, who represented the consumer in the cement hearing before the commission?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think I answered that question a moment ago, and I think the learned Senator from Georgia is not quoting me correctly. The record will show that I made no such general statement. The statement I made, and which I repeat, is that in every contested item you find the consumers' counsel figuratively represented. That is, the interest of the consumer is represented; and then I want to ask, Mr. President, who is the consumer? Is he the man down in Mississippi or Virginia who makes a nice plug of chewing tobacco, the most desirable constituent of which came from the rock maple of Vermont? Is he the person who has moved over from Canada into the United States and erected a packing concern, and who takes maple sirup and adulterates it with water and with other things and puts a label on it which deceptively represents it to the public? Are these consumers? And yet they are the men who besiege the Senate for a resolution to excite the Tariff Commission to review the tariff on maple sugar. Are they not represented? Do they need any counsel provided by the Government of the United States? No; and every dollar spent for that purpose is a wasted dollar, and, worse than that, it is a destructive dollar, because it immediately creates a competing interest, a great jealousy, and upsets the smooth working of an investigatory body, and sets up a parallel bureau to spy upon and to create the impression that this great Tariff Commission, which is designed to be a nonpartisan body, is not really a nonpartisan body, and that its findings are not findings, but are fabrications. The idea of our setting loose any such warfare as that seems extraordinary.

Now I pass on to the last feature of this bill.

In a sort of apologetic manner, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh] referred to this international economic conference by saying, "What harm can come from foreign commissions sitting in on our tariff policy?" Mr. President, I fear that nothing but harm could follow such a practice.

This last feature of the Harrison amendment provides:

That the President is respectfully requested to initiate a movement for an international economic conference with a view to (a) lowering excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair trade practices, and other economic barriers affecting international trade, (b) preventing retallatory tariff measures and economic wars, and (c) promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations; but with the understanding that any expression treaty or expression which standing that any agreement, treaty, or arrangement which changes any tariff then in existence, or in any way affects the revenue of the United States, must first be approved by the Congress of the United States.

AMERICAN TARIFF AUTONOMY

There is another section to which I will refer later.

Mr. President, the reason why that ought not to be made law, the reason why that ought not to be substituted for section 336 of the Smoot-Hawley law, is that it tends to destroy American tariff autonomy, and that it tends to a complete departure from our ancient and traditional foreign policy. Other reasons could be set forth, but those two reasons are sufficient. They are fatal, it seems to me, to that provision.

Would not this provision tend to destroy our tariff autonomy? Think of it for a moment-creating a bureau which shall go out into the rest of the world and confer with all of the great trading nations of the world who are our competitors, and submit to them "concessions"-" mutual concessions "-" tariff concessions." Think of Americans doing that! The instant we step out with any such general organization and policy as that, we have departed from American independence; we have sold our peculiar privilege of protecting our own people with an American tariff, and we have entered upon an international tariff. which, of course, means this: That whenever we face the foreigner, whether he is Great Britain, France, Germany, or any of the Scandinavian countries, and a proposal is made to us that we reduce the tariff on iron or any other thing. we must be prepared, if we are going to carry out the spirit of this thing, to say "yes"; and, if we do, that means the destruction of the American tariff and the establishment of the European tariff, the American tariff being molded and dictated and animated by the wage earner, for the wage earner, and for the uplifting of ordinary people, whereas the foreign tariff is dictated by a ruling class, an entirely different type of government, and has the effect of maintaining there a lower standard of wages and a lower standard of living.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President-

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator was inveighing against this section of the substitute on the ground that it was a departure from the traditional policy of the United States with reference to its dealings with foreign countries regarding tariffs and trade. Does the Senator know how many treaties we now have in force with foreign countries relating to commercial practices, trade, most-favored-nation clauses | relating to tariffs, and other matters?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President. I hope the learned Senator in asking this question is qualified to answer it himself. I will say that I do not know, and that although I have studied diligently I can not find out how many such there are. I do know, however, that from earliest times this country has monkeyed with reciprocal tariff treaties and has learned the fallacy of them, and that the only one that was preserved by the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was the reciprocal treaty with Cuba, and there was a special reason for sustaining that.

It is an old practice. It is out of date. It is not beneficial; and the Smoot-Hawley tariff law has a command in it that the Tariff Commission shall investigate and find out how many we have and what ought to be done about them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont further yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. How does the Senator reconcile his statement now that the country has indulged for many, many years in that sort of thing, and now it is a worn-out practice and ought to be discarded, with his statement a while ago that this was a departure from the policy in the past?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I will try to explain that. The old practice had to do with nothing but reciprocity treaties. Never in all our history has anybody undertaken such a sweeping proposition as this which is embodied in the Harrison amendment—that is, that we shall undertake, by this international economic conference not only the lowering of tariff rates and elimination of certain trade practices but that we shall start out to prevent retaliatory measures and economic wars, and to promote a certain attitude in foreign relations, fair, equal, friendly trade and commercial relations with nations, and that we shall engage in the removal of any other economic barriers to trade.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to my friend the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I understood the Senator to say a while ago that any concessions that might be made to foreign countries would be greatly detrimental to the interests of the wage earners in the United States. If I recall correctly, President Hoover two or three years ago made the statement that the production of goods sold in foreign markets gave employment to more than 2,000,000 wage earners in the United States. If the concessions would build up our foreign markets, would not that help the wage earners somewhat?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that is true. I would say "yes" to that question; and, of course, that is an objective. We always, I believe, try to build up the foreign market to take care of surplus here; but the primary objective, and therefore the primary concern of any tariff law and therefore of any subsection of it such as we are considering, is the domestic market; and the question and the test of the efficiency of such a provision as this international economic conference is, Does it tend to the destruction or greater harm of our domestic market than it tends to the upbuilding of a foreign market?

Mr. LOGAN. Would not that be a question to be determined by some body similar to that which is created by this bill? And do we not have new conditions that require a departure?

We have a tariff war on now. Retaliatory rates have been put up against us. How are we going to build up our foreign trade unless we can reach some agreement with foreign countries about those rates?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I am obliged to accept the statement of the learned Senator from Kentucky that we have a tariff war. Such study as I have made does not convince me of that; but I am not willing to contradict the Senator. Assuming, however, that what he says is sound and true in every particular, and that we have on our hands a tariff war, what we say is that it would be the height of cowardice, it would be a forsaking of American principles, it would be a forsaking of the women and children of the wage earner of America to go out and say, "Now, in order to pacify you and in order to get you not to fight us any more we will let down our tariff so that it will be no longer protective, and you can push your goods into our market." I think that would be the height of injustice to our people and would be a particularly wrong thing to do in the midst of depression.

Mr. LOGAN. Does not the Senator believe that there is some point which might be reached by agreement where it would be for the best interests of the American people, although it might be a concession on our part, in order to obtain a concession from the other countries?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I would answer that question in the negative. There is no point for agreement. There is a point which the learned Senator has in mind, undoubtedly, to which a reduction of the tariff could be made in some instances with advantage to the foreigner, which might attract him to make similar concessions to us. But the thing which we object to is a law which binds to enter into any such agreement.

We object to the surrender of the American right and the American duty of making our own concessions for the American people, after we have learned what that point is, and making them unilateral, without any agreement, without any trade and upstanding, as a great, dignified, leading Nation of the world which says, "This is a domestic concern, this is not an international concern. We are captains of our own fate. We will decide for ourselves what tariff wall shall be erected against you, but we will make it so-and-so." That is the difference. I think there may be a point, just as the Senator from Kentucky suggests.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I want to find out just what the Senator has in mind. As I understand him, he adheres to the doctrine of national economic self-sufficiency, with our foreign business merely an incident to our national life. Is that the Senator's view of economic matters?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, that is a very fine statement, a better statement than I have ever contemplated for our position. I do not know that I have ever put it in such crystallized, beautiful English as that. It is so complete and so significant that I would hesitate on my feet to make an offhand answer one way or the other to that question. That is a very fine question.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator.

TARIFF A DOMESTIC PROBLEM

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I need only remind the Senate of the discussion on the League of Nations to prove the assertion I have made that the tariff is not an international matter but is a domestic question.

In the Sixty-sixth Congress the tariff was dealt with in connection with reservation 5, proposed and discussed in connection with the consideration of the protocol for the League of Nations, connected with the treaty of peace with Germany. We find the following:

RESERVATION 5

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children, in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

Again, on the fact that the tariff is a domestic and not an international question, and that it should be kept strictly within the control of the United States and not submitted to the chiseling down of our competitors and other great trading nations is the following. Reservation No. 5 was agreed to, and then an amendment was proposed. This

That no member nation is required to submit to the league, its council, or its assembly, for decision, report, or recommendation, any matter which it considers to be in international law a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matter relating to its internal or coastwise affairs.

Many other such citations could be referred to, but they are unnecessary. For the purpose it is sufficient in passing, it seems to me, to say that it is proposed that we utterly transform our foreign policy, that we enter upon a new venture, and not merely a question of reciprocity agreements about the tariff, but the whole field of our economic relations is involved in that resolution. Any economic barrier can be considered and must be considered if this bill should be passed; our monetary standard, a very controversial question. There are Senators in the Chamber who hold very positive views on that subject, and yet that would be one of the things which would be involved. Immigration would be another; foreign loans in the future; world debts. This is not merely a reciprocity arrangement on the tariff. This would open up the whole matter of our foreign relations and start us out on a new policy, in which we would no longer adhere to the principle of independence, though not isolation.

In this year, when we are celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the father of our country, it will not do us any harm to remember three lines of his precept to us. The outstanding thought in the farewell message of the father of our country was the element in this policy which might be regarded as a negation. He

'Tis our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world.

Thomas Jefferson, another great authority, wrote to his friend President Monroe:

Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe; our second never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs.

We set right about it here with a Democratic proposition to invite Europe to the American table, to invite Europe to meddle with cis-Atlantic affairs, to meddle with one of the most fundamental things affecting our prosperity and our safety.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I take it that the Senator is opposed to importations of any character coming into this country where similar articles are raised or produced here. Is that Mr. AUSTIN. I could not hear the Senator's question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I take it that the Senator is opposed to importations from foreign countries coming into the United States?

Mr. AUSTIN. If the Senator had been present during my remarks, he would not be asking that question, for it is so entirely inconsistent and contrary to what I have stated here over and over again that it is not necessary to do more than refer the Senator to the RECORD.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then I take it for granted that the Senator is in favor of importations coming into the United States. Certainly he is on either one side or the other of the question. I think my question is a courteous one, and susceptible of an answer.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR MORRILL

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, for the sake of the use of the Senator from Maryland-for I judge he wants to make use of it in some way at this time-I will say to him that I have stated that I am in full sympathy with my constituents in their being opposed to an embargo; that our ancestors entered into an armed rebellion against the Jefferson embargo, and thereby we put upon the record an ineffaceable page of our objection; and we brought into this Congress, through our great Senator, Justin S. Morrill, the first Republican was the amendment proposed as a substitute for reserva- | tariff. This was not an embargo but a protective tariff. We have always been against an embargo, and we are now.

Mr. FESS and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, as long as the Senator has uttered such a fine encomium on Justin S. Morrill, I hope he will permit me to read a eulogy pronounced here in the Senate by a famous Senator from Massachusetts, George F.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I will very much appreciate the reading of that encomium.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, speaking of Justin S. Morrill, Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, said:

He never committed himself to the popular currents, nor studied the vanes to see how the winds were blowing, nor sounded the depths and the shallows before he decided on his own course.

Mr. Morrill was a brave man—an independent man. He never flinched from uttering his thought. He was never afraid to vote alone. He never troubled himself about majorities or administrations: alone. He never troubled himself about majorities of administra-tions; still less about crowds or mobs or spasms of popular ex-citement. His standard of excellence was high. He was severe, almost austere, in his judgments of other men. And yet, with all this, everybody liked him.

Further:

Neither ambition nor hatred, nor the love of ease nor the greed of gain, nor the desire of popularity, nor the love of praise, nor the fear of unpopularity found a place in that simple and brave heart.

If we do not speak of him as a man of genius, he had that absolute probity and that sound common sense which are safer and better guides than genius. These gifts are the highest ornaments of a noble and beautiful character; they are surer guides to success and lofter elements of true greatness than what is commonly called genius.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Vermont a short time ago paid a beautiful tribute to Justin Morrill, these words, which I read years ago, came to my memory, and I sent to the Library for the volume containing the eulogy in order that I might add it to his address.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I am interested in ascertaining in my first question is preliminary to my second question. Suppose America produces through her industries and on the farm more than she can consume, and if protection carried on to the extent provided by the Smoot-Hawley bill will curtail our imports, where will we find a market for our exports?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I suppose the learned Senator from Maryland will tell us about that when he has the floor. For my part I am content with the observation which any man who resides near the Canadian line will make. that the rates now fixed on agricultural products do not keep out farm products of Canada from the United States, and it is not necessary to have an international treaty in order to try to get from Canada or any other country on earth a market for our surplus of agricultural products. Our theory is, and it differs from the Democratic theory, and one of its merits is, that its objective is not the development of a foreign market so much as it is the development of the domestic market. That is the great support of prosperity in this country, as history, speaking with venerable accent, has proven to us; and we adhere to our experience upon that subject.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I judge from the discussion by the Senator of the international economic conference and the reciprocal trade agreement proposal that he is opposed to a reciprocal trade agreement?

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE PROPOSAL

Mr. AUSTIN. That was not my discussion and that is not what the substitute provides. The substitute provides for an international economic conference, which goes far beyond reciprocal-trade agreements and involves fundamental relationship between the nations of the world, and invites to America our competitors to sit down at our table and tell us what our tariff rates shall be. That is what I have been arguing and it is that to which I object. Whether I might object to a particular reciprocity treaty would depend upon the terms of that treaty and upon the conditions which formed its setting. I would not have the boldness to stand here in the Senate and make a sweeping declaration that I am for or that I am against reciprocity treaties. Such a treaty when under consideration might appeal to my sense of what is right and what is expedient, and then I would be for it.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to get the Senator's viewpoint on that matter. Of course, all of us would want to see the treaty before we voted for it. Then I understand the Senator is not opposed to that provision in the substitute, which provides:

That the President is respectfully requested to initiate a movement for an international economic conference, * * but with the understanding that any agreement, treaty, or arrangement which changes any tariff then in existence, or in any way affects the revenue of the United States, must first be approved by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am opposed to it. I have tried to say that I am opposed to the entire measure, that there is no virtue in it which I wish to have implanted in the Smoot-Hawley law, not one thing.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator to say that he is not opposed to the policy of reciprocal trade agreements, but that he would want to consider the particular trade agreement after it came to the Senate. Now, I understand him to say that he is against the policy and that he is against any such agreement.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have been misinterpreted, if I understand the Senator from Mississippi. I think I declared very positively that I would not like to state that I was for or against such a treaty, and that I reserve the right to be for or against it, according to the specific circumstances of the proposal. This idea of saying I am for or against reciprocity agreements is entirely irrelevant and has nothing to do with the discussion of the pending measure. In fact, whether I am for or against it should not influence a single Member of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator must realize that the proposal I have urged in the substitute, if it has anything to do with the discussion of the question, is now before the Senate for discussion, and if that question is to be raised at all it is relevant to the discussion now proceeding.

Mr. AUSTIN. As the measure is framed, I have stated repeatedly that I am against every part of it and all of it, jointly and separately. That ought to be clear.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is against it, and that is all. Does the Senator think that provision is un-Republican?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think it is fairly Chinese. [Laughter.] Mr. HARRISON. All right.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, Mr. President, let me occupy the floor if I may.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield for one more question?

CHINA'S EXPERIENCE WITH TARIFF

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I want to finish my answer to the other question first.

I recall that in 1842 the British Empire reached around the world and throttled China. After the opium war she throttled China and said, "You can not fix your own tariff rates hereafter. We must be consulted respecting your tariff rates." Ever since 1842 that poor benighted but great country of China has been enslaved to the great treaty powers and the great trading nations of the earth. To-day there is no appeal which comes to the heart with more urgency than the appeal of the Chinese people to the American people to do what can be done to relieve them from the thraldom of international treaties to regulate tariffs. I say that when we start out with this thing in the manner that we are asked to do by the proposed substitute we are doing a Chinese thing; we are voluntarily submitting ourselves to that which China suffers because she was a conquered country.

In 1925, after the Washington conference, 15 powers went to China and examined that situation for nine months with the hope of getting themselves and China out of that entangling situation and freeing China and putting her in the place which America occupies to-day. It could not be done. Once we launch upon the policy of letting all our competitors in the world come in and have something to say about the tariff which we shall erect as a protection to the industry, the agriculture, and the wage earning of this Nation, we have launched upon a policy from which we will have great difficulty in retreating, and we will have started upon an objective which seems exceedingly strange in the face of history.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. AUSTIN. Very well; I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Let us get back from China for a moment. The Senator has said that the provision asking the President to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements for the purpose of building up our trade is Chinese and the Senator has condemned it in strong language. Would the Senator say that it was Chinese upon the part of the Republican organization of the House in 1922 when Mr. Fordney, a very distinguished Republican and very illustrious citizen, was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and they brought in and passed a provision, section 301 of the Fordney-McCumber bill, which authorized the President, with the approval of Congress, to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with foreign countries? Would he think that was Chinese?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is rather a catechism than an interrogatory affecting the debate here. That is just a question to try to disqualify me as a witness. I am not posing as a witness. I am making claims here and arguing them as a Senator representing the Republican view of this Democratic proposal here. I would not be so foolish as to answer that question, although I am but a newcomer to the Senate and have great inferiority to the senior Senator from Mississippi, whose dignity, whose frankness, whose seniority excite most considerate responses from me to most of his questions. Being a newcomer and admiring him so greatly, yet even I, a novice, would not answer that question.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator can see how badly I would feel when in a tariff measure that was written by the Republicans there is incorporated a provision that should be called Chinese.

I want to ask the Senator another question. Would the Senator say it was Chinese upon the part of his Republican colleagues in 1922, when Mr. Fordney was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, to have written another section in the bill, section 303, authorizing the President to conclude trade agreements with foreign countries within a period of three years, the approval of Congress not being required? In my proposed substitute we require the approval of Congress, but there was a case where the Senator's Republican colleagues wanted to give the President the right to do it for three years without any approval of Congress. Were they Chinese?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I think it will be possible for the learned Senator from Mississippi to talk about the Fordney-McCumber law if he wishes to do so by taking the floor and discussing it. I am not talking about that law. It is not pertinent to this discussion. I respectfully suggest that an effort to drag me out into a discussion of that matter will not be successful.

But assuming that we have returned to America from China, as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, I wish to conclude my remarks upon the measure, which I hope may furnish for the record some very sound reasons why the substitute should not be adopted, with this suggestion: With the machinery provided by the Smoot-Hawley Act and specifically by section 336 of that act, the American Congress in an American way can establish American rates of tariff for the protection of the American people much better and to the far greater benefit of American wage earners and farmers than can an economic international council under the proposed substitute.

Mr. HAYDEN obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to a reference made by the Senator from Mississippi to a provision incorporated in the 1922 bill by Congressman Fordney. Mr. Fordney having passed away, perhaps I ought not to do it, but as long as the question came up I may say that it was done in the House with no idea whatever that it would remain in the bill. There was a certain element in the House that wanted it. Business was in a crowded condition in the House, and the provision was put in the bill. When it came to the Senate of the United States, the Senator from Mississippi and I agreed that it never ought to be retained in the bill and

Mr. HARRISON. Now. Mr. President, that is the trouble! [Laughter.] The distinguished Senator from Utah and his colleagues over here in charge of the Republican tariff measure, with Chairman Fordney in the House, were "playing both ends against the middle," a species of duplicity and hypocrisy for which the American people condemn them in the writing of tariff bills. The Senator from Utah says on the floor of the Senate to-day that when the provision was offered in the House and adopted by the House, they knew that over here we would not permit it to stay in the bill, but that it was offered over there for a purpose. How can anyone expect the American people to have any faith in gentlemen in charge of the Government who will adopt such methods as that in dealing with them?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants to go into detail-Mr. HARRISON. No: I do not. I take the Senator's own

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator desires to go into detail I will assure him of one thing, that the Democratic side of the House was just as much responsible for it as the Republican side of the House. The Senator knows it, and there is no doubt about it. The Senator also knows very well that it did not stand a show when it reached the Senate, and it went

Mr. HARRISON. I am merely taking the record of the report of Mr. Fordney on the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking back of the report.

Mr. HARRISON. I never talked about the Republican organization of the House as my friend talks about it. I have too much respect for them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows, just as well as I do, that it never was intended to become a law, and it was never thought that it would become a law when the bill came to the Senate

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from New Mexico? Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think probably we have as many present as there will be after the quorum call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona declines to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield. Mr. NORRIS. I merely wish to suggest that hereafter we ought to have a committee of some kind appointed to see what provisions in various proposals that pass the House or the Senate are intended to remain in and what are put in just for the purpose of deception.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me just to make a statement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona vield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield. Mr. WATSON. Referring to the act of 1922, of which my friend the Senator from Mississippi speaks, I happen to know something about it. Having been a Member of the House for a good while and a member of the Ways and Means Committee when I was in the House, and having been very intimately associated with Chairman Fordney of that committee, I know something about the motives that impelled him to insert that clause in the tariff bill in the House. At that time there was a tremendous outcry against the rates in the Fordney bill; there was a great clamor, as there always is, whenever a Republican tariff measure is up for consideration and action. The Senator from Mississippi then, as whenever a Republican tariff act is being considered, denounced it volubly, eloquently, and with great vehemence as "the most iniquitous and the most illogical and the most monstrous tariff bill " that had ever been " foisted on the people," using those adjectives, with which he is so well acquainted and which he has so frequently employed in the discussion of Republican tariff measures.

At that time it was seriously considered in the House whether or not attention should be paid to this outcry of the opponents of the tariff, and finally, after much discussion, it was concluded that it would be all right to insert a provision for reciprocity treaties. That came, if my friend from Arizona will tolerate me a moment further, from the old Blaine idea of reciprocity.

James G. Blaine was the great originator of the idea of reciprocity in modern tariff legislation, but his conception of reciprocity was nearly altogether reciprocity with South American countries; that is to say, they produce what we do not and yet what we ought to have, while we produce what they do not and yet what we are anxious to have them obtain. There was a field for reciprocity as between North and South America, but manifestly where two countries produce the same products it is not a question of reciprocity there; it is a question of straight, square-way competition. So, when the whole matter was considered on the House side it was thought best to insert that clause providing for reciprocity treaties in cases where they could properly be made.

I favored it, so far as the proposition theoretically was concerned; but when the bill came to the Senate, and it looked as if the proposal was going to involve us in straight competition with the people with whom we were competing and ceased to be genuine reciprocity, in the Committee of Finance we voted it out without a question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD in the chair). The Senator from Arizona has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield. Mr. NORRIS. I take it, then, the Senator from Indiana, as a Member of the House of Representatives, was in favor of it, but as a Member of the Senate he was against it?

Mr. WATSON. I was not a Member of the House of Representatives at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator to say he was on the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. WATSON. No; at that time I was a Member of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator concede, then, referring to this particular item, that the House ought to be for it and the Senate ought to be against it?

Mr. WATSON. I do not.

Mr. NORRIS. Who was right about it-the House or the Senate?

Mr. WATSON. I think, under all the circumstances surrounding the case at that time, the Senate was right about it: although originally I had been as devout a follower of Blaine as any man in the country, and I recall that when he was beaten I thought the end of the Republic was in

Mr. NORRIS. I myself felt pretty nearly that way. [Laughter.] The Senator, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, was in favor of reciprocity and has so stated?

Mr. WATSON. I was in favor of the Blaine kind of | reciprocity, when I was a young man, and thought it entirely proper; but I will say to my friend from Nebraska that when this great outcry and declamation against the tariff bill started all over the country I thought it would be entirely possible and practical and feasible to insert in it this reciprocity proposal.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not think so now?

Mr. WATSON. I do not.
Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, since Blaine has passed away, has ceased to be a follower of Blaine. That is the difference between the Senator's Republicanism and mine. I am still a Blaine man. [Laughter.] I believed, Mr. President, in it then, and I believe in it yet under the right circumstances.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is following somebody who is dead, while I am associating with the living. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. I still respect the dead. The Senator's friendship only goes to the grave; when it gets there it stops, and he goes with his enemies instead; that is the difference.

Mr. WATSON. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken about that. I have said, with all due respect to my friendand I think he and I talked it together on the stump in those days out in his district—that I was in favor of the Blaine kind of reciprocity; I believed that the Blaine idea of reciprocity was one of the finest things ever conceived, because, in the first place, I believed in Blaine as a great American, and Blaine made the statement-the Senator may recall it-that in the McKinley tariff rates there was nothing that would provide for the sale of another barrel of flour or another hog or another sheep, the contention being that it was a hard and fast tariff bill and there ought to be something in it somewhere along the line that would mitigate its severity so far as South America was concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. That time has passed away.

Mr. WATSON. That time has gone.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senator wants to be as severe on the countries of South America as on any other country?

Mr. WATSON. I want to be the same open-and-shut protectionist all the time.

Mr. NORRIS. The logic the Senator believed in then was wrong, according to the Senator's present ideas?

Mr. WATSON. No; it was right according to the times, but it is wrong for this time; I have not any doubt in the world about that.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be a good thing under some circumstances and a bad thing when it was not needed?

Mr. WATSON. When one does not need it he does not take it, like medicine. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President-

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi. Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator from Indiana to say that he would rather follow the living than the dead?

Mr. WATSON. Where does the Senator classify himself? Mr. HARRISON. I should like to ask him is he still following President Hoover? [Laughter.]

However, Mr. President, what I rose to ask the Senator about was this: As I understand his explanation of sections 301, 302, and 303 of the Fordney bill it is that they were written in the House after the violent universal protest that came to the House following the consideration of the bill. Is that right?

If the Senator will investigate he will find that this provision was brought out of the Committee on Ways and Means, written in the original draft of the bill.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, I know all about that.

Mr. HARRISON. And was in the original report. I am just trying to correct the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I know all about that. The Democratic Party at that time, as now, vociferated against the bill even before it had been introduced, just as they did against the present law. Before the bill ever came out of the committee they uttered the most violent diatribes against it ever uttered in the English language. Before they had ever seen it they set my friends Charley Michaelson and Jouett Shouse, two | able and brilliant men, shooting at something that had never existed; they filled the public imagination with spooks and goblins and gnomes that had never existed, and said that if we should pass that tariff bill it would be the worst one that anyone had ever seen, just as the Democratic Party had done in the case of the tariff bill in 1922.

Mr. HARRISON. So the Senator was just mistaken in his first statement?

Mr. WATSON. No; I was not mistaken. I was entirely right.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator said in his first statement that the provision in question was incorporated in the law after the bill got to the House and after violent protests against its consideration came to the House from the country.

Mr. WATSON. There came a volume of vituperation against that tariff bill just as against every tariff bill.

Mr. HARRISON. In the committee?

Mr. WATSON. Everywhere. My dear friend from Mississippi helped it along; he helped to fill the newspaper headlines with denunciations against "this terrible tariff bill."

Mr. HARRISON. The Fordney bill was written behind closed doors; the Democrats did not know what was going on; the Republicans did not act as we act in the presentation of a tariff bill in the Senate. The Democrats were not brought in during the preparation of that bill. No one in the country except a few people interested and who had the token and sign and password into the committee room knew what was going on.

The protest against the bill came after it was reported to the House and after the Democrats pointed out the nefarious provisions of the proposed legislation.

Mr. WATSON. There it is again; there is the same old denunciation-the "nefarious" provisions. That is what the Senator said about the bill before he ever read it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I would advise the Senator from Arizona not to yield further. We should like to hear from a Democrat a protection speech on copper.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure that the Senator would rather have a discourse of that kind than a statement of the record of the Republican Party on the tariff. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. Now, Mr. President—
Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.
Mr. WATSON. I beg pardon of the Senator from Ari-

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will yield to me for a moment, I will say that I do not think the Senator from Mississippi is justified in questioning the explanation of the Senator from Indiana. I accept it. As I understand, the Senator from Indiana says that the provision was put in the House bill after there was an outcry against the measure, but that they had no intention of keeping it in when the outcry died down. I do not appreciate the Senator from Mississippi questioning the Senator's explanation. I accept it.

Mr. WATSON. I am very glad the Senator finally agrees with me about something.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, I agree with the Senator about a great many things.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have not stated exactly how the provision was put in the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator question my explanation of the proposition?

Mr. WATSON. No; I am delighted, I will say to my good friend, and I thank the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. And am I not correct in my statement? Mr. WATSON. The Senator is far more nearly correct than was the Senator from Mississippi, but that is not a standard of comparison, I will say. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield. Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have the floor just for a moment. I am very much interested in the statement of the Senator from Indiana that he followed Blaine and believed in reciprocity so long as reciprocity was confined to South American countries. I think, Mr. President, that we may infer that the Senator's type of reciprocity is the kind that would provide reciprocal trade arrangements with a country that is competitive only as against our agricultural interests. In other words, South America, furnishing agricultural products in competition with the agricultural commodities produced in the United States; the Senator believes in reciprocity so far as South American countries are concerned. I think, Mr. President, it is probably the first actual confession that any responsible leader of the Republican Party has ever made, at least on the floor of the Senate, that the tariff is not for the farmer.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield. Mr. WATSON. That is as far-fetched a statement as was ever made in the world, even in the perfervid imagination of my friend the genial and able Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator. Mr. WATSON. When General Garfield was President of the United States, in the brief time that he lived James G. Blaine was Secretary of State. At that time they called a Pan-American Congress, the first ever held, which met in the city of Washington. It met here for two or three purposes. One was to establish trade relationships between the two continents; I mean by that, transportation, ships. The other was to open negotiations about reciprocal relationships in tariff matters. If the tariff was not outwardly mentioned, it at least was covertly understood; and at that time James G. Blaine formulated his reciprocity idea as between this country and South America.

At that time South America produced many things that we did not and could not produce-tropical fruits, nuts, and everything of that character-and yet wanted; and we manufactured things that South America could not and did not manufacture, and yet needed. The result of it was that out of that grew up this idea of reciprocity. Was there anything wrong about that?

Mr. GEORGE. That is exactly what I said, Mr. President-that the competition which came from South America was agricultural competition.

Mr. WATSON. Tropical fruits, nuts, and things of that kind that we did not produce on any scale in the United States, never have, and never can.

Mr. GEORGE. What about leather and wool and sheep and cattle? What about that vast list of commodities which, in fact, remained on the free list until relatively recent

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, whatever furnished competition with the American product was not the subject of a reciprocity treaty. It could not be, because if two countries produce the same thing, then it is a question of competition and not reciprocity.

Mr. GEORGE. The distinguished Senator from Indiana, with all due respect to him, is begging the question.

Mr. WATSON. Why, I am not. Mr. GEORGE. He made the flat assertion that reciprocity with South America was all right because South America was not furnishing competitive merchandise. That is the meaning of it.

Mr. WATSON. I say the same thing now.
Mr. GEORGE. I say that is tantamount to saying what indeed is the truth, that your tariff was never intended to take care and never in fact has taken care of the American

Mr. WATSON. Which I categorically deny in the most vehement terms.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, I know the Senator will deny it.

Mr. WATSON. In the first place, reciprocity is in noncompetitive products. It can not be in competitive products.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. Therefore, reciprocity could exist between the United States and South America-that is to say, agricultural and pastoral countries-but reciprocity could not exist between the United States and any other country.

Mr. WATSON. But reciprocity between this country and any country in South America could not exist as to wool, because we both produce wool.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes. Mr. WATSON. Therefore there is competition, and not reciprocity.

Mr. GEORGE. That is to say, the Senator from Utah would object to that.

Mr. WATSON. I do not know what the Senator from Utah objects to.

Mr. SMOOT. Nor do I think the Senator from Georgia would want pitch or sand included in it, either.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, Mr. President-

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Just a minute, now; let me answer the

When the President of the United States called us together in extra session, and invited us to enter upon the consideration of a limited revision of the tariff, many progressive Republicans and most of the Democrats were quite willing to endeavor, at least, to give agriculture a fair break in the tariff act.

Mr. SMOOT. And that is what it got.
Mr. GEORGE. We undertook to give to agriculture rates at least in the hope that they might be effective. We also were willing to give the same protection to the producers of raw materials—that is, the raw product of the mine, of the forest, and of the field. We went along with our Republican friends as long as they were undertaking to equalize the conditions of agriculture with manufacturing, but when the bill spread out into a genuine protective tariff bill for industry, which already had high rates, we stopped.

Mr. SMOOT. Stopped where? Mr. GEORGE. Just let me finish.

We were willing, of course, to give to the producers of raw material a fair chance with the manufacturers. We made an honest effort to do that; but when the bill became a stench, we simply could not support the whole bill. Therefore we are called "hitch hikers," and what not, in the Senate and elsewhere.

What I want to invite my friends to do, and all of my friends on the other side, is to distinguish, if they can, between the moral quality of an act which sought to do simple justice to the farmer or the producer of raw commodities in the tariff act and the moral quality of outright opposition to the whole act when it had become a stench in the nostrils of decency everywhere because it sought to raise and did raise the duties on manufactured articles, some 230 of them, when approximately 1 per cent of the domestic production here was being actually imported into this country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I say again that the rates on agricultural products found in the existing tariff law were the rates that the agricultural organizations of this country wanted. They were given the rates they asked for. The greatest increases found in the existing law are upon agricultural products. and the Senator knows it.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes; I agree to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, but the Senator was a member of the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows very well that the rates that were put into the bill on all agricultural products. from the beginning of the bill to the end, were recommended by the farm organizations of this country.

Mr. GEORGE. They were recommended in general by the farm organizations. I would not say that all of them were just exactly the rates recommended.

Mr. SMOOT. I could not say that they were exactly the percentages that were recommended, but—

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is quite right. We sought to put them in.

Mr. SMOOT. And we did put them in.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, we did; but we did not stop there. We then sought to hike all the rates of the manufacturers, although they had very high rates.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; we did not take all of the rates of the manufacturers' schedules.

Mr. GEORGE. We raised the duty on 890 of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, perhaps one duty would carry through to 50 articles.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, we raised the duty on 665 articles in international commerce, articles of foreign trade; and we raised the duty on 230 articles where the imports were less than 1.6 per cent of the American production.

Mr. SMOOT. And I think among them was the importation of sand, and I could go right on with other articles.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. In this connection, let me cite some of the increases that were made.

For instance, in the chemical schedule, rates were increased on 74 articles.

In the earthenware schedule, rates were increased on 99 articles.

In the metal schedule, rates were increased on 181 articles. In the sugar schedule, rates were increased on 14 articles. In the agricultural schedule, rates were increased on 179 articles.

In the cotton schedule, rates were increased on 28 articles.

In the flax and jute schedule, rates were increased on 36

articles.

In the wool schedule, rates were increased on 61 articles.

In the rayon schedule, rates were increased on 16 articles. In the silk schedule, rates were increased on 10 articles.

In the paper schedule, rates were increased on 23 articles. In the sundries schedule, rates were increased on 152 articles.

So you did not stop with agriculture. You went a little further.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but let us analyze that a little, and I will take just one item alone.

In the wool schedule there are 61 amendments, all of them coming from the very fact that the duty on wool itself was increased. That was done for the growers of wool, the farmers who raised the wool; and, of course, when that duty was increased, the compensatory duty to the extent of 60 amendments that the Senator refers to took place, and had to take place.

That accounts for the number of these amendments. Take the chemical schedule, where there are 31 amendments. The duties placed on the basic articles in the chemical schedule compelled, in more than half of all the cases, a compensatory duty; and that was what was put on. The Senator knows that just as well as I do.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I was citing the bald fact, and the Senator does not deny it. I admit that whenever you put a duty on a raw material, naturally you put a compensatory duty on the things into which it enters; but the Senator must not restrict it, and say that because the duty on raw wool was increased, the duty was increased on every other article in the woolen schedule. Do not confine me that much. Some of the duties were increased, but not all of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Some? I can not recall one at the present

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will say that that is the only one, we will get the facts and read them into the RECORD. I know the Senator wants to be as nearly accurate as he can.

Mr. SMOOT. I stood here all day long, after the duty on raw wool was increased, and took every single, solitary paragraph of the wool schedule and asked that amendments be made to conform with that increase. Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Those are the increases that took place.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I have the same interest as every other Senator has in the enactment of legislation which will establish a better balanced and more just tariff system. For that reason I am in favor of the passage of the pending bill, the Collier tariff bill, as modified by the amendment submitted by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

It has been well recognized for many years that in the enactment of legislation imposing import duties on foreign products Congress frequently has acted without adequate information. The general purpose of the bill now under consideration is to require the United States Tariff Commission to investigate and ascertain the differences in the costs of production of domestic and foreign articles entering into competition with each other within the United States. The bill provides that if the commission finds that it is shown by the investigation that an existing duty imposed by law upon any foreign article does not equalize the differences in the costs of production, then the commission shall report the facts to the President and to Congress, with a recommendation as to what the proper tariff rate should be.

A very essential provision in the bill is that the Tariff Commission has authority to recommend the transfer of an article from the free list to the dutiable list.

Another exceedingly important feature of the bill is the incorporation in it of the principle laid down in the Norris-Simmons amendment, which was adopted by the Senate when the Hawley-Smoot bill was under consideration in the last Congress. That principle is that any bill having for its object the carrying out of a specific recommendation made by the Tariff Commission in a report to Congress shall not contain any item not included in such report. The bill clearly states that in the consideration of any such bill, either in the House of Representatives or the Senate, no amendment thereto shall be in order which is not germane to the items included in the Tariff Commission report.

A primary object sought to be accomplished by this provision in the bill was exceedingly well pointed out yesterday by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh].

The purpose is to abolish logrolling in the enactment of tariff legislation. It is common knowledge and perhaps a national scandal that whenever a bill proposing a general revision of the tariff is under consideration by Congress, those interested in the tariff on a particular commodity will combine with others who desire an import duty upon a different commodity, and thus pool their strength so that each may obtain what he desires. Understandings of this kind, however arrived at, inevitably lead to the enactment of tariff rates which otherwise could not be justified. This bill proposes, very properly, that hereafter each item in a tariff bill shall be judged upon its own merits, without relation to trades and combinations to secure votes.

IMPORT DUTY ON COPPER VITAL

In addition to this general interest in better tariff legislation. I speak for the people of the State of Arizona, who have an immediate, intense, and absolutely vital interest in the early establishment of an import duty on copper.

The copper mines of Arizona pay half the taxes collected in that State. A number of them are shut down, others soon will be, and the few remaining are operating at greatly reduced capacity. An emergency exists, which, if not met in the near future, means that the State of Arizona will be bankrupt. I use the word "bankrupt" advisedly, because it will be utterly impossible for the farmers and stockmen of Arizona to bear the burden of taxation which must be transferred to their shoulders if copper mining in Arizona can no longer be conducted at a profit.

This is the first bill to be brought up for consideration by the Senate in this Congress relating to the tariff. Heretofore we have considered relief measures of various sorts and appropriation bills, upon none of which would an amendment relating to the tariff have been in order under the rules of the Senate. Such being the case, it would have been not only vain but unfair to take the time of the Senate to discuss in detail or at any great length a subject wholly unrelated to the business pending before this body.

COPPER TARRIFF AMENDMENT PREPARED

I want to be frank with the Senate and say that this being a tariff bill the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and I have seriously considered offering an amendment to it which would provide for an import duty of 6 cents per pound on copper in all forms. We have prepared the text of such an amendment; but after consulting with Senators who are our friends, and who are as keenly interested as we are in securing a tariff on copper, we have decided not to offer such an amendment.

The argument against doing so is that the pending bill relates solely to a general means of obtaining better tariff legislation, and, as it passed the House and is reported to the Senate, it makes no mention of a specific rate of import duty on any commodity. Senators of long service in this body, and who are sincerely sympathetic to our view, insist that they will be compelled to oppose a copper tariff amendment, if offered, not because they are against it but because no specific rate of duty should be included in this bill. They further urge, very properly, that if one commodity were selected for such preferment then the bill would be open to amendment for a change in rates on hundreds of other commodities, with the result that the entire scope and character of the bill would be altered, and the measure would in fact become a bill for a general revision of the entire existing American tariff structure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the minority leader.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The question also arises, in connection with the phase of the matter the Senator is now discussing, whether, in view of the constitutional provision that all bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives, it would be permissible to incorporate in the pending bill amendments specifying rates or changing rates in existing law.

Mr. HAYDEN. From a parliamentary point of view I think there is a great force in what the Senator says. The Vice President, in ruling upon a point of order raised against such an amendment, would probably be compelled to decide as the Senator has suggested.

The last general revision of the tariff occupied the time of the Senate for more than six months. A mere statement of the time consumed on the Hawley-Smoot bill clearly indicates that it would be impossible to undertake a general revision of the tariff between now and next June, when it is expected that the present session of Congress will come to an end. Certainly any Senator would therefore be justified in making points of order against all amendments proposing the addition of specific rates of import duty to this bill.

However, it will not be long until another bill passes the House of Representatives containing a considerable number of changes in the revenue laws. When that measure is referred to the Senate Committee on Finance, those of us who believe that copper mining in the United States is on the verge of extinction will ask to be heard. We have already received satisfactory assurances that a hearing will be granted. We have not the least doubt that at such a hearing a showing can be made which will convince the Committee on Finance that the emergency is in no sense imaginary but is real, that the destruction of a great national industry is already far advanced, and therefore it will be entirely proper to fix an import duty on copper in the revenue bill

The advocates of a tariff on copper have nothing to conceal. We do not ask the Senate to take snap judgment, to act in haste, without full information. So confident are we of the justness of our cause that we are willing to proceed in the usual and orderly manner, by having the members of the Committee on Finance fully satisfy themselves that there is no other way to meet the deplorable situation which now exists in every copper-mining region in the United States except to grant such a tariff at this session of Congress.

NOTICE GIVEN

Having made an impregnable and irrefutable case before the Finance Committee, and having won its support, as I have unlimited faith that we will, I speak the truth when I give notice to the Senate that those of us who come from States where copper is produced, and where, because of the low price of the red metal, which we know is basically due to foreign competition, there now exists acute economic distress, will exhaust every legitimate effort to see that before the revenue bill passes this body it shall contain provision for an adequate import duty on copper.

It is true that the Committee on Ways and Means on March 16 decided to favorably recommend to the House of Representatives an amendment to the revenue bill fixing an import duty of 4 cents per pound on copper. The committee on the following day rescinded its action, when erroneous representations were made that the language of the amendment proposed by Representative Douglas of Arizona did not make proper provision for compensatory rates and was therefore in conflict with a number of provisions of the Hawley-Smoot law relating to rates on manufactures of copper. Subsequently a statement was made on the floor of the House which implied that the amendment would adversely affect 38 tariff schedules.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state whether, in his judgment, if a tariff was put upon copper, it would be a revenue-producing tariff?

Mr. HAYDEN. A tariff on copper would always produce

Mr. McKELLAR. Would 4 cents per pound shut out all foreign coppers or would it be a revenue-producing tariff?

Mr. HAYDEN. Four cents per pound would be a revenue-producing tariff. It would not be a high protective tariff in the sense the Senator implies. Speaking as one Democrat to another, I can say to the Senator from Tennessee that it can be completely demonstrated that under any rule of tariff making, any rule of rate making laid down in the substitute for the Collier bill offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], following the words of the bill as it is written, and adopting all of the procedure provided for in it, if an import tax should be laid upon copper it will be a revenue tariff.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not think it would virtually be an embargo on copper?

Mr. HAYDEN. No tariff based upon the average difference in the cost of producing copper in the United States and in foreign countries could possibly be anything else than a revenue tariff.

Mr. McKELLAR. Four cents a pound would bring that about, in the judgment of the Senator?

Mr. HAYDEN. In my judgment the difference in cost of production at home and abroad is greater than 4 cents. It will be proven before the Senate Committee on Finance that the actual difference is nearer 6 cents than 4 cents.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HAYDEN. Under the Douglas amendment as offered before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives every material interest of the fabricators of copper was adequately cared for. To make assurance doubly sure experts of the United States Tariff Commission have again gone over the amendment, and when submitted to the Senate Committee on Finance it will stand the test of most rigid scrutiny. The producers of copper are not and will not seek to injure the business of those to whom they hope to sell their product. All that is asked of the manufacturers is that the same degree of protection be extended to the producers of their raw material as they themselves now enjoy. We ask that they use American copper from American mines produced by American labor. This can be done with complete fairness to all concerned.

I can see a reasonable explanation for this reversal of action by the Ways and Means Committee. Every one of its members has been under a terrific strain since last November when consideration of the revenue bill began. In an earnest and sincere effort to do their full duty and find over a billion dollars needed for the support of the Government they have been harrassed and bedeviled for the past four months from every possible angle until human nature can stand but little more. The physical collapse of the chairman of that committee, Mr. Collier, of Mississippi, is a solemn warning that there is a limit to what men can endure. Under such circumstances the committee should not be utterly condemned if it made a mistake in judgment as I believe in did in rejecting the proposed tariff on copper.

FINANCE COMMITTEE WILL CONSIDER COPPER TARIFF

The situation will be vastly different when the revenue bill is before the Senate Committee on Finance. Senators who are members of that committee will not be called upon to prepare a new measure in all of its details. It is safe to say that the major portion of the work done by the House of Representatives will be found good and will be accepted. It is much easier to revise than to create. The only dispute will be over details. A tariff on copper will be one of a limited number of items whose merits shall require consideration. When that time comes the committee can and will be guided by the logic of the facts. There will be time to pass calm judgment, which I have good reason to believe will be favorable to an import duty on copper for the double purpose of raising much-needed revenue and also for the more important object of preserving the very existence of a major American industry.

In anticipation of the facts which will be fully developed at the hearings before the Finance Committee, I beg of Senators to inquire of their colleagues from States where copper is mined and predict that the answer in every case will be that thousands of men are out of work, that business has practically ceased in many mining camps, that no copper miner is now employed except at reduced wages, and that where employment does exist few, if any, miners are working at full time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator may well add that not only are mines going out of business, but because of the peculiar nature of copper mining, communities go out of existence at the same time that the mines go out, because the mines and the communities are single units and can not be separated, and the blood of one is the blood of the other.

Mr. HAYDEN. I thank the Senator from Michigan for his interruption because he has stated a profound truth, a truth which I shall completely demonstrate so far as my own State is concerned before I conclude these remarks.

It does appear strange that copper is the only metal extensively produced in the United States upon which no import duty is imposed. There was a tariff on copper for 44 years within the period between 1846 and 1894. The importance of the industry was signally recognized in 1869 by the passage of a special act of Congress relating solely to copper, which fixed a basic duty of 5 cents per pound. By the tariff act of August 27, 1894, copper was placed upon the free list, and has so remained up to the present time.

To Senators who desire all of the facts, I recommend that they read Senate Document No. 58, presented by my colleague [Mr. Ashurst] and ordered printed on February 16, 1932. The document was written by Mr. Hoval A. Smith, of Warren, Ariz., and is entitled "American Copper Production." In it will be found a complete history of all the legislation enacted by Congress relating to a tariff on copper. Mr. Smith prepared this information at the request of a commission appointed by the Governor of Arizona, Hon. George W. P. Hunt, and performed his task in a scholarly and workmanlike manner.

From 1894 to 1930 the great producers of copper in the United States appear to have been entirely content that copper should remain upon the free list. When the existing Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act was under consideration no witness appeared before either the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Finance of the Senate to ask for a tariff on copper. The hearings on the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 and the Underwood-Simmons Tariff Act of 1913 are likewise a blank so far as that issue is concerned. A search of the record discloses that not so much as a letter or a brief was filed at the time these three general revisions of the tariff law were in process.

SUDDEN DECLINE IN PRICE OF COPPER

The Hawley-Smoot bill was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Finance on September 4, 1929, and passed the Senate on March 24, 1930. The records of the United States Tariff Commission show that the average price of copper in 1929 was 18.11 cents, and in January, February, and March, 1930, the price was uniform at 17.77 cents. In April of that year, after the tariff bill was no longer subject to amendment, the established price of copper suddenly declined to less than 14 cents a pound.

Since copper mining is the principal industry of our State, the Arizona congressional delegation immediately took cognizance of this change by writing a joint letter on April 18, 1930, to the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, which begins as follows:

The recent radical drop in the price of copper is causing a most serious situation to develop in the mining regions of the West. The wages of miners and other employees in the copper industry are generally fixed by a sliding scale depending upon the market price of that metal. A low price also causes a reduction in production, which means that workmen will be discharged, thus adding to the number of the unemployed.

The situation as above briefly set forth has caused a demand or a duty on copper imported from foreign countries in the belief

The situation as above briefily set forth has caused a demand for a duty on copper imported from foreign countries in the belief that such a tariff would stabilize and increase the price of copper in the American market. We are anxious to have all the facts upon which to estimate the probable effect of such an import duty, which we suggest might be fixed at 7 cents per pound.

A response to our request for information was promptly made by the Tariff Commission, but in the reply attention was called to the fact that the data furnished was taken from its files without making an attempt to verify all the details. Candor compels me to say that Senator Ashurst, Congressman Douglas, and I were disappointed in the findings, which showed that there was but little difference in the cost per pound of producing domestic and foreign copper. The commission frankly admitted, however, that it did not have up-to-date facts and gave only comparative figures for 1928. This information was then a year behind time and showed an American average cost of 10.27 cents and an average foreign cost of 10.20 cents per pound. A significant deduction could be made from other figures submitted, which set forth that in 1928, 35 per cent of all foreign copper was produced at a cost under 8 cents per pound, whereas in 1929, only 18 per cent of the American production was below that cost. I may properly add that down to date this disparity in cost in favor of foreign copper has been sharply acTHE HAYDEN-WHEELER-VANDENBERG RESOLUTION

As time went on it became more and more apparent that the copper mines in the United States were suffering from destructive foreign competition. In order to authorize the United States Tariff Commission to make a more thorough study of the subject, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Vandenberg], who now honor me with their attention, and myself introduced a resolution which was adopted by the Senate on February 5, 1931, that reads as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is hereby directed under section 332 of the tariff act of 1930 to investigate the differences in cost of production during the calendar years of 1928, 1929, and 1930 between foreign articles and domestic articles included in paragraph 1658 (copper) of said act, and to report thereon to the Senate as soon as practicable.

The Tariff Commission again acted with dispatch and pursued its investigation with commendable thoroughness until its report was completed and submitted to the Senate on December 22, 1931. It will be observed that the commission was working under a resolution restricted in scope to merely the findings of costs of production between foreign and domestic copper, but that was the only kind of a resolution which could be passed in conformity with the existing tariff law.

VALUABLE INFORMATION IN COPPER TARRIFF BEPORT

The Tariff Commission was kind enough to heed the request of Senators and Representatives from copper-producing States, and included within its report information of great interest to supplement its findings of fact on the production costs of copper. We were again disappointed in that the report did not show a wider spread between foreign and domestic costs. The findings were based on average costs, but because of the lack of complete information the commission was again compelled to use revised figures for the year 1928.

Including depreciation and interest, the total average cost of refined copper produced from domestic ores was found to be 13.29 cents. The total cost of foreign refined copper was determined to be 11.87 cents. The difference in average costs per pound in 1928 was, therefore, 1.42 cents instead of 0.07 of a cent, as the Tariff Commission, by using slightly different factors, reported to the Arizona congressional delegation on May 8, 1930. Less than a cent and a half is apparently a long way from the 6 cents which now scarcely measures the average difference in cost between American and foreign produced copper. But when we take into consideration the economic upheaval which now encompasses the world, 1928 is a long way from 1932. The changes in conditions in the copper-mining industry have been swift and revolutionary.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. One of the reasons why foreign copper producers at the present time are able to lay their copper down so cheaply in the United States is the difference in foreign exchange.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is one factor.

Mr. WHEELER. That is, England being off the gold standard and controlling some of the African copper can send it into this country, I am told, at the present time, laid down in New York, for around 5 cents a pound.

Mr. HAYDEN. The copper producer in Africa can buy his supplies anywhere within the British Empire to-day at least 25 per cent cheaper than he could before England went off the gold standard, and, of course, that is a material advantage to him.

Mr. WHEELER. Not only is that true, but my understanding is that, by reason of the fact that England is off the gold standard, as are her dominions in Africa, where substantial quantities of copper are produced, they can lay their copper down in the United States cheaper.

Mr. HAYDEN. What the Senator says is true. The African copper development to which he refers is frequently mentioned in the report made in response to our resolution. In submitting that report to Congress the United States Tariff Commission freely predicted that whenever accurate statistics could be obtained, a materially lower foreign cost of production would be shown. The commission was aware of the marvelously rich copper deposits that are being rapidly developed in Africa and of the exceedingly low wages paid to native laborers and therefore stated, on page 9 of its report:

Comparison of domestic costs and African costs: In 1928 the mining of copper in Africa was much less developed than in 1931, and cost comparisons based on that year are relatively not significant. Engineers' estimates for the cost of production in Africa under present or prospective conditions indicate substantially greater potential cost differences than those shown.

The commission further states on page 25:

Of paramount importance are the recent developments in Africa, Chile, and Canada. African developments in the Belgian Congo and Northern Rhodesia, while foreseen for several years, have recently resulted in such increased output and give such promise of further increase as to attract the attention of the entire copper-producing industry. The Congo industry is controlled by the Belgian Government and operated as part of a huge colonization enterprise having to do not only with the production of copper but with that of cobalt, radium, tin, precious metals, agricultural products, and the building of lines of communication, the clearing and sanitation of the jungle, and the education and civilization of the natives. The enterprise includes the construction of metal-refining plants in Belgium, and contemplates further refining and fabricating plants to the end that Belgium may become independent of other countries for such metallic materials as can be produced within its control. This development, although begun before the war, has been pushed rapidly since 1920.

COPPER DEVELOPMENT IN NORTHERN EHODESIA

In Northern Rhodesia copper developments which have not yet reached the full production stage give promise of duplicating or even surpassing the results in the adjoining Congo. Present estimates indicate a tonnage of reserves five times as great as in the Congo of a grade approximately 4 per cent copper. Present plans contemplate the smelting and refining of these ores entirely within the British Empire.

On page 81 of the report the commission says:

Actual costs of the production of copper from these new large and relatively rich deposits are practically nonexistent, for the reason that the first of these properties (Roan Antelope) to be fully developed and equipped turned out its first concentrates in June, 1931, and blew in its smeltery in October, 1931. Cost estimates must, therefore, take the place of cost facts and gaps in available figures must be filled in from known cost elements developed in comparable operations.

Not only in Africa, but there have also been perfectly amazing developments in the production of cheap copper in Canada since 1928. Of this the commission says on page 25:

In Canada the most spectacular development is that of the huge Frood body of copper-nickel ore in the Sudbury district, Ontario. Smaller, but still of major importance, are the developments at Noranda, in Quebec, and at Flin Flon, in Manitoba. Smelting and refining plants have already been built in Canada to handle the resultant tonnages, so that the finished metal will be produced under British control.

And again, on page 62, with respect to smelting, the commission says:

In Canada plants completed recently will avoid the diversion of most of the blister copper produced in that country to United States refineries; and in Belgium, France, and England plants completed or projected will handle African copper, which was formerly refined in the United States.

Canada and Rhodesia are within the British Empire; and as I have said in connection with the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. Wheeler], the producers of copper in those Dominions are now able to purchase their supplies for approximately 25 per cent less, due to the depreciation of the pound sterling which came about when England abandoned the gold standard. This is the only factor resulting in cheaper production of foreign copper that was not forecast by the United States Tariff Commission in submitting its report.

SOUTH AMERICAN COPPER

The other principal source of foreign copper is in South America, where great ore bodies, having an average copper content approximately twice as high as the average in the United States, have been developed. In order not to make public the cost of production of any particular mine, the Tariff Commission combined the statistics from Spain and Latin America, except northern Mexico, but the figures thus obtained can be analyzed to show that there is no possibility of producing copper in the United States at any such low price as is done in South America. The reasons for this are primarily the same as in the case of African copper, since both the factor of high-grade ores and cheap labor operate against American production. For example, the last annual report of the Chile Copper Co. shows that copper can be produced at its mines at a cost of less than 5 cents per pound.

REPORTS AT STOCKHOLDERS MEETINGS OF AFRICAN COPPER COMPANIES

The United States Tariff Commission has found that the total average cost of refined copper produced from domestic ores in the United States is 13.29 cents. Copper is selling at this time in the markets of the world at about 6 cents per pound, and has been selling at that low price for months. Information the Tariff Commission did not possess is now available which startlingly proves its forecast of lower foreign costs. For example, at a meeting of the Roan Antelope Copper Mines (Ltd.) (a company whose properties are located in northern Rhodesia) held on September 18, 1931, in London, Mr. A. Chester Beatty, its chairman, said:

We have proved unquestionably that we rank among the cheapest producers in the world, and that we can operate at a profit even at present-day prices, which are by far the lowest in the history of the industry.

The shareholders of the Union Miniere du Haut Katanga, whose mines are in the Belgian Congo, held a meeting in Brussels on July 13, 1931, at which time the president of that company, Mr. Jean Jadot, stated:

Without being indiscreet, it could be said, in spite of the prices quoted for copper in the course of the last few weeks, a price lower than that which has ever been touched hitherto, the company was not running at a loss but was still realizing profits, which, although they were not considerable, were profits nevertheless.

Senators have no doubt read in the newspapers of the efforts made at meetings held in New York, attended by representatives of the principal copper-mining companies of the world, to reach an agreement which would restrict the production of copper until the present enormous world surplus, which has increasingly accumulated, may be disposed of. The American producers who have already cut their production practically in half were most anxious to bring about such an understanding. What I have read from the reports of the stockholders' meetings of these African companies clearly indicates why the foreigners have been so slow in even considering such a proposal. I have seen figures to demonstrate that, whereas there was an actual decrease of over 32 per cent in American production of copper between 1929 and 1930, foreign production actually increased 15 per cent that same year.

COMPARATIVE COSTS OF MINING

In the report of the United States Tariff Commission on the production costs of copper, dated December 22, 1931, at page 16, is a table showing a comparison of domestic costs of the several processes of producing copper. The table shows the average cost of mining for the years 1928–1930, including depletion and interest, to be 5.12 cents per pound in foreign countries, and 8.18 in the United States. These figures give the foreign producer an advantage of 3.06 cents per pound on that item alone. However, according to this report, the foreign and domestic situation with respect to smelting is reversed.

In the same table the average cost for the years 1928–1930 of smelting American copper, including interest, is 1.40 cents. The corresponding foreign average cost for the same years is given at 3.61 cents. These figures indicate that the average smelting costs in foreign countries are 2.21 cents higher per pound than in the United States. I have no doubt that these figures are based upon the best information that the Tariff Commission could then obtain; but I am sure that the commission will agree that foreign costs of smelting will not long remain very much higher than they are in the United States. I say this because the commission recognizes in its report that world domination of the smelting of copper, like the mining of the red metal, has passed out of American control. On page 62 of its report the commission says:

Recent history: The construction of large smelting and refining plants in Canada and Belgium and the projected construction of large refining facilities in France and England are developments of the last few years. They are examples of the postwar trend toward political control of necessary raw materials within the boundaries of important industrial countries or their colonies. The copper mined in Germany and Japan is likewise brought to the finished metallic condition within the country of origin. A similar condition appears to prevail in Russia, though detailed information respecting plants and equipment is not available.

Copper mining in the United States is not only suffering from the investment of American capital in rich deposits of copper ore located in foreign countries, deposits in many instances more than double the average values of American copper ores, but there is another injury being done which is most keenly felt. For over two generations the United States has applied its best engineering talent to copper mining, and now American brains and American methods are being widely used to beneficiate foreign ores. Like Soviet Russia, the foreign producers of copper are employing Americans who received their training and experience in our own country to develop their properties. American metallurgical processes, engineering experience, and methods of mining are all being used to produce in foreign lands copper which now gluts the American market and causes the very mines and smelters where these men received their training and knowledge of the business to shut down.

Let me cite instances of what the unrestricted importation of foreign copper has done to various towns and cities in Arizona.

JEROME, CLARKDALE, AND CLEMENCEAU

Beginning in the northern part of my State, we find Jerome, Clarkdale, and Clemenceau largely depopulated. When I visited Jerome last summer not a pound of copper was being produced. But for work occasioned by caving ground, practically no one would have been employed at its largest mine except a few watchmen. The United Verde Extension, second in size, was reopened later in the year, but only to provide employment during the winter for those previously on its pay rolls. No new man could get a job. Recent newspaper accounts say that the United Verde Extension will either be soon closed down or that production will be greatly curtailed and gradually restricted to the vanishing point.

The mines at Jerome are picturesquely located on the side of the Mingus Mountain, overlooking the Verde Valley and the canyon of Oak Creek, which rivals the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River in scenic beauty. But the miner can not live on scenery. There must be a pay roll to maintain himself and his family.

The ores at Jerome were once so rich that the gold associated with the copper paid all the expenses of mining and smelting and transportation by rail to the Atlantic seaboard, leaving the copper content as clear profit. It was from the United Verde mine at Jerome that William A. Clark, who once served in this body as a Senator from Montana, derived a very large share of his great fortune. No such fortune could again be accumulated from American copper.

THE GLOBE MIAMI DISTRICT

In central Arizona is the Globe-Miami district, whose mines have produced millions of pounds of copper, and particularly so during the World War, when that metal was so badly needed for the manufacture of munitions. The production of this copper was profitable, with the result that millions of dollars were paid into the Federal Treasury as corporation, income, and excess-profits taxes. With these great mines shut down, that source of Federal revenue will be forever ended.

That the Senate may know the actual conditions in that area, I read the following resolution adopted by the Gila County Democratic Central Committee:

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of this body that we unanimously indorse the resolution introduced by our Representative, the Hon. Lewis W. Douglas, in the United States House of Representatives, providing for a tariff of 5 cents per pound on raw copper, as its passage will prevent the closing of our copper mines and provide employment for thousands of our destitute citizens; and it is further

Resolved, That this body extends its sincere thanks to Gov. George W. P. Hunt, whose foresight and efforts brought about the creation of the Arizona Copper Tariff Commission; to the chairman and members of the Arizona Copper Tariff Commission, whose utmost efforts have been devoted to all phases of this economic problem; and to all the members of the Arizona delegation in Congress, who are straighted as velicity to save and protect the Congress, who are striving so valiantly to save and protect the basic industry of our great State; and be it further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this organization, and that copies of same be sent to Gov. George W. P. Hunt, the chairman and members of Arizona Copper Tariff Commission, and to our faithful delegation in Congress.

Passed and adopted this 24th day of February, 1932, in the city of Globe, county of Gila, State of Arizona.

GILA COUNTY DEMOCRATIC CENTRAL COMMITTEE,

By RAY GILBERT, Chairman.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President-

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my friend.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator should emphasize, as he proceeds, that these deplorable conditions are not a mere by-product of the economic depression through which the country and the world are passing, lest there be any misunderstanding about it. Even though the general economic situation were improved, there is no reasonable opportunity for the copper situation to improve except as this tariff differential protects us from Africa in particular and Canada and Chile in addition.

Mr. HAYDEN. The marvelous, spectacular, and phenomenal development which has taken place during the past three years in Africa and Chile and in Canada is such that regardless of whether times are good or times are bad in the United States, we have lost our foreign market for copper. The United States can not make copper as cheaply as it can be produced in those countries. Therefore, as the Senator says, the only remedy is to take copper off the free list and impose an adequate import duty on that commodity.

At Globe, Ariz., the Old Dominion mine, one of the oldest and best producers in Arizona, has ceased operation.

At Miami, where the oil flotation process, combined with what may be truly called "mass production," has made possible the recovery of millions of tons of copper from exceedingly low-grade ores, production is at the very minimum consistent with still keeping the mines open.

In support of a tariff on copper I have here a resolution adopted by the International Union of Steam and Operating Engineers of Miami, Ariz., which I read to the Senate.

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF STEAM

AND OPERATING ENGINEERS,

Miami, Ariz., February 15, 1932.

In view of the collapse in copper prices caused primarily by importation of the metal into the United States, and in view of the consequent misery in the copper camps in the West with a number of mines shut down and all the others working only a number of mines shut down and all the others working only a fraction of their capacity, the members of the above union, in meeting assembled at Miami, Ariz., on February 13, 1932, hereby Resolve, That every effort be made to secure a 6-cent tariff on all copper entering the United States, as this is the only means that will enable thousands of workers in the mining camps to make a living for themselves and their families.

The above resolution was carried unanimously, and the secretary was directed to forward copies to the Arizona congressional delegation and the Hon. James W. Coller, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C. ington, D. C.

[SEAL.]

J. L. MARTIN, President. J. Tom Lewis, Secretary.

SUPERIOR, RAY, AND HAYDEN

In Pinal County, Ariz., are located two great copper mines, one at Superior and the other at Ray, about 20 miles distant. These mines have been the principal source of income to maintain the county government, to pay for the operation of its public schools, and the construction of its highways. The mine at Ray and the smelter at Hayden, which was built to care for its ores, are out of production. What is happening to the Magma mine at Superior was tersely stated in a recent issue of Dunbar's Weekly, a Democratic newspaper published at Phoenix, Ariz.:

Last summer the Magma was closed down, but it reopened at full blast in the fall. The directors hoped to keep right on operating until a tariff was imposed on copper or something else happened to enable them to sell their metal at a profit. Now there is not much hope for a tariff, none at all of anything else restoring prosperity to the American copper industry. In the face of competition from the rich deposits of Africa and South America, mines of the United States are at a hopeless disadvantage. With the closing of the Magma, on June 1, for an indefinite With the closing of the Magma, on June 1, for an indefinite

Orders have gone out to that effect-

Superior will become a ghost town. Its outlook is gloomy, indeed. The miners and smelter men will have to move away with their families; hundreds of others whose income is dependent upon the Magma pay roll will also have to pull stakes or else settle down to a long, weary wait for a resumption of activity, which may never come.

Not far from Superior is the site of the once-flourishing town of Pinal, which came into existence because the ores of the Silver King mine were treated there. As a small boy I saw the 14-mule teams that were used to haul the ore. My father supplied the 3,000 people who then lived in that district with flour from his mill at Tempe. The Silver King mine paid millions of dollars in dividends to its stockholders. When the price of silver went down, the mine was not only abandoned but the town of Pinal was completely deserted. Once in later years I passed by that way, and the sole living creature seen was a coyote near a ruined wall. Arizona, like Nevada, knows full well what the loss is when mining ceases to be profitable; and that is why her people are so desperately in earnest when they ask for a tariff on copper.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit one further interruption?

Mr. HAYDEN. Gladly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it might well be emphasized in passing that these American miners and American laborers who thus are being deprived of their livelihood by the existing situation are finding that livelihood transferred to a type of labor in Africa which, according to the United States Tariff Commission, works for as low as 51/2 cents a day, the character of which can be well indicated by the fact that in the housing arrangements for taking care of it six natives live in a hut with a diameter of 13 feet, with walls 6 feet high from the floor.

That type of African labor is the beneficiary of the existing situation, at the expense of these American miners and American laborers, whose homes and communities have been depopulated by the existing situation, which the Senator pleads to have properly corrected by American tariff protection.

Mr. HAYDEN. To fully corroborate what the Senator has said I shall read, a little later, the rates of wages paid to African copper miners, as set forth by the Tariff Commission in its report made in response to the resolution which he joined with me in introducing.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. The picture that the Senator from Michigan has just shown is a deplorable one. I think it is true: but I will say to the Senator that if he had gone up into the State of Pennsylvania during the coal strike up there he would have found that the coal operators in the great State of Pennsylvania had brought into that State hundreds of negroes and were having them live under just about the same conditions that he has described in Africa. They were getting a little more money, but it was all being taken away from them in board and clothing that they had to pay for: and they were all being herded into these little houses, and were being used to compete with American labor right here in our own United States of America.

Mr. HAYDEN. I know that the Senator from Montana speaks advisedly, because he personally investigated the coalstrike situation in Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHEELER. One thing further: We might just as well face the fact that if we are going to put a tariff on copper, it is going to be necessary for the copper producers in the United States to agree upon a program of curtailing copper production, so that the production of copper in this country will be below the consumption. Unless that is done, a tariff upon copper will not be effective in the United States.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am sure that the Senator will agree that it will be much easier to curtail the production of copper in the United States than it would to curtail the production of coal in this country. There are thousands of coal mines, but there are only a limited number of mines in the United States which produce copper.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator. The point I want to make is that if Congress should place a tariff on copper, and then the operators went out and started in to operate full blast all the mines in the United States with improved machinery, they would immediately produce a surplus of copper, and the price at which they had to sell the surplus would fix the price of copper in the United States.

There is one other question I desire to ask the Senator. I have before me H. R. 6662, the Collier bill. It seems to me that in the event of its passage we could then appeal to the Tariff Commission, and, with the facts that can be produced with reference to costs of production in the United States and foreign countries, we should be able to get the Tariff Commission to recommend a reasonable and a just tariff upon copper. Does the Senator agree with that statement?

Mr. HAYDEN. I agree with it completely. Further on in my remarks I shall point out the significant provisions in the Collier-Harrison bill, which I am sure will be helpful if that measure is placed upon the statute books.

AJO

But to continue with a further description of the situation in Arizona. The last great copper mine to be developed in that State is Ajo, near the Mexican border. The early Spanish explorers found small veins of rich copper there; but the larger deposit was of low grade. It was only through the metallurgical genius of Gen. John C. Greenway-whose statue, appropriately made of bronze, Arizona was proud to place in the Nation's Capital-that a way was found to make mining at that location profitable. Because there is no apparent prospect of a better price for copper in the very near future, it has become necessary for the mining company at Ajo to order the discharge of its employees, throw them into the body of the unemployed, and provide for nothing but a few men to guard what is one of the most modern and efficient installations of mining equipment to be found anywhere in the world.

That order was issued only six days ago. I hold in my hand a newspaper account that contains a copy of the notice posted at Ajo on March 23, which reads:

On account of the present depressed condition of the copper business, it has been found necessary to discontinue all opera-tions of the New Cornelia branch at Ajo as soon as the month's production for April is obtained, and effective not later than April 24, 1932.

M. CURLEY, Manager.

Mr. Curley also gave out the following statement:

Mr. Curiey also gave out the following statement:

We greatly regret being forced to discontinue operations at Ajo in April and realize the serious effect it will have on our community and on our employees, but circumstances in the copper world make it unavoidable. We have, as a matter of fact, continued operations beyond the time that was justified in the hopes that the general situation might improve. On the contrary, however, the situation has become increasingly difficult; surplus of copper stocks has increased; buying power has dwindled; and a price for the metal has been reached which for some time past has resulted in a heavy monthly loss.

With conditions as above, we can not afford to continue depleting the company's mineral assets as well as its cash reserves, and we are therefore regretfully forced to suspend operations until a resumption is justified. When this will be can not be fore-and we are therefore regretfully forced to suspend operations until a resumption is justified. When this will be can not be forecasted at the present time. It depends for one thing on how soon general business picks up and with it a more normal demand for copper; and also whether, when that time comes, Ajo can produce copper cheaply enough to compete with the abundance of very low cost copper that will be put on the market both in this country and from abroad. At the present time, as a matter of fact, the largest proportion of the cost of Ajo copper is the proportion that it has to bear of the cost of Arizona State government and Pima County government, and with this heavy burden it is going to be increasingly difficult to compete with low-cost copper that does not carry this excessive burden of taxation. copper that does not carry this excessive burden of taxation.

EDITORIAL IN THE ARIZONA DAILY STAR

As an instructive comment upon the closing of that great mine, I read an extract from an editorial in the Arizona Daily Star, published at Tucson, entitled "Consequences of New Cornelia Shutdown ":

The suspension of operations at the New Cornelia mine at Ajo announced for April 24 is an event of far-reaching consequences to Tucson, Pima County, and Arizona. The loss of employment to the people of Ajo is a tragic matter. The loss of business to Tucson will be felt, but the most far-reaching consequences have yet to be felt. As the biggest single taxpayer in Pima County, paying approximately 38 per cent of the county's taxes, the mine is of tremendous importance to every taxpayer in the county.

The fact that New Cornelia has closed down does not mean that it is through as a producer. Not by any means. Its ore reserves are good for 50 years, and when able to operate at full capacity and market its product it can meet competition from any mine in the world. It is one of the best and one of the most efficiently conducted mines in the world. But when it can not operate at capacity, its costs are too high to cover the cost of production at present prices.

For instance, when it operates on a restricted-production basis of 2,400,000 pounds a month, the taxes it pays Pima County and The suspension of operations at the New Cornelia mine at Ajo of 2,400,000 pounds a month, the taxes it pays Pima County and the State of Arizona amount to 2.9 cents a pound. It has been selling its copper to net 5.75 cents. Thus its taxes amount to over one-half of what it receives for its products.

CLIFTON AND MORENCI

The Clifton-Morenci mining district in eastern Arizona has also produced vast quantities of copper, beginning with shipments made a half century ago, of rich ores transported a long distance by wagons to the Southern Pacific Railroad, thence by rail to the seaboard, and finally over the ocean by ships to Swansea, in Wales, for refining. There are still large deposits of copper ore in that district. but the richer ore having been first extracted, the lowgrade ore can no longer be mined in competition with cheap copper imported from Africa, South America, and Canada.

In order that the Senate may more fully appreciate the effect of this foreign competition, I read the following prophetic editorial from the Graham County Guardian:

A COUNTY THAT WOULD BE HARD HIT

In the event of a complete close down of the copper-mining industry of Arizona, one of the hardest-hit counties would be Greenlee. Outside the mining industry and businesses dependent upon it, there exist only limited property valuations in Greenlee County.

A tabulation of property valuations for taxation purposes furnished Governor Hunt by Joe Chaudoin, assessor of Greenlee County, shows that 78 per cent of the taxes in that county are paid directly by the mining companies. Business property in the mining camps, entirely dependent upon mining activities for its continuance, pays 6.901 per cent of the taxes in that county. From these figures it is seen that a total of 84.901 per cent of the taxes in Greenlee County would be wiped out with the extinction of copper mining. Theoretically, a trifle over 15 per cent would be left for all county purposes. Even this limited residue would doubtless be reduced through the depressing effect of a collapse of copper mining. This remainder consists largely of livestock and agricultural valuations, which industries are dependent, in part at least, upon the copper camps for a market.

Were the copper industry to be permanently closed down, there would not be sufficient funds remaining to operate the county government of Greenlee.

government of Greenlee.

These figures give a startling picture of what the failure of Congress to enact a tariff law on copper would mean to Greenlee County. Small wonder that the residents of that county are showing intense interest in the legislation before this session of Congress providing tariff protection for the American copper industry.

The event thus anticipated with foreboding has occurred. The blow has fallen. I have here an Associated Press dispatch from Morenci, Ariz., which reads:

Morenci, Ariz., March 24.—Notices were posted by the Phelps-Dodge Corporation to-day announcing operations at its Morenci branch will cease about July 1. The low price of copper was given as the cause for the coming shutdown.

The notices followed on the heels of announcement of Phelps-

Dodge officials last night that its Ajo properties would be closed not later than April 24. Closing of the Morenci and Ajo mines and smelters will leave only the Bisbee and Douglas properties of Phelps-Dodge operating in Arizona.

The formal notices posted here read:

"We regret to advise that on account of the depressed condition of the copporting in the property of the depressed condition."

of the copper industry, it will be necessary to discontinue all operations at the Morenci branch as soon as ore at present broken in the stopes is drawn off and concentrated, and the concentrate smelted.

"The best estimate we can make at the present time is that all work should be completed and entire operations shut down by July 1."

The notice was signed by Frank Ayer, manager, who, in connection with the close-down order, said:

"We realize the notice of discontinuance of operations at the Morenci branch will be a great disappointment to everyone in the Clitton and Morenci districts, and no one regrets the necessity more than the Phelps-Dodge Corporation itself.

"Morenci branch has been operating on a reduced basis longer than was really justified by current conditions, but the time finally has come when the copper situation is so bad in every respect that the company can not longer continue depleting its ore reserves and spending money to produce copper at a serious loss.

"With the enormous surplus of unsold copper on hand, with the present unprecedented low price of metal, and with demand at a low ebb, there is no incentive for producing copper at this time, and it is impossible to forecast how long this condition will continue, but in view of the seriousness of the situation plans are being made for an indefinite shutdown.

tinue, but in view of the seriousness of the situation plans are being made for an indefinite shutdown.

"As manager of the Morenci branch, I wish to acknowledge the fine cooperation and help that we have been given in a difficult situation by all our employees, as well as by public officials and the people of Greenlee County as a whole. Their friendly assistance and cooperation has made it possible to continue operations longer than otherwise would have been possible, and Phelps-Dodge Corporation greatly appreciates this."

BISBEE, THE WARREN DISTRICT AND DOUGLAS

Among the greatest and most highly developed mines in Arizona are those at Bisbee and the Warren district in Cochise County. For practically all of my lifetime copper in vast quantities has been produced there under expert and skillful management. About 25 miles from these mines are located great smelters at Douglas, a city almost entirely dependent upon the payment of wages to smelter men. Pioneer prospectors risked their lives to find these copper properties. Skilled geologists determined their extent. Mining engineers of great talent have spent their lives in improving the methods of extracting the ore. Prosperous communities grew up about this mining enterprise. But in the last two years all has been changed.

I am reliably informed that over 6,000 residents have been compelled to leave Cochise County, Ariz., in which these mines are located, because they could no longer obtain a livelihood there. At the present time only a very limited number of miners are employed, and practically all of them receive wages for but three days' work a week, and that pay is at a reduced rate. Many hundreds of families are supported solely by what amounts to a gratuity from the mining company-a condition that can not always last. Unless Congress acts promptly by imposing a tariff on copper. Bisbee will become another Tombstone, a ghost city, whose glory departed when the white metal, silver, suffered a decline in price similar to that which copper is now experiencing.

AN EARNEST AND TRUTHFUL PETITION

The people of Bisbee and the Warren district have sent me the petition which I hold in my hand, containing 4,348 names. I ask Senators to examine it, because no one can look at the petition without realizing that it truly expresses the sentiments of that community. The petition states:

To the Honorable Members of Congress of the United States, Members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives:

We, your petitioners, citizens of the Warren mining district, State of Arizona, do most earnestly petition your honorable body to favorably report and assure the passage of House Joint Resolution 259, introduced by Congressman Lewis W. Douglas of Arizona, and providing for the levying and collecting of an import duty upon copper in various forms. And in support of our petition we desire to set forth certain basic facts, as follows:

First. The State of Arizona and its citizenship are absolutely dependent upon the copper-mining industry; more than one-half the total valuation of the State is embraced in the item "productive and nonproductive mines and appurtenances thereof"; approximately one-half of the population of the State of Arizona is solely dependent upon the copper-mining industry, and the remaining portion of the population is largely dependent upon business conditions in the copper camps of Arizona. The collapse of the copper-mining industry will mean a complete prostration of the sovereign State of Arizona.

Second The people of the Warren mining district are solely Second. The people of the Warren mining district are solely dependent upon the copper mining industry. Our homes, our schools, our churches, our business establishments are absolutely worthless unless the copper mines in this district are permitted to operate. The population of the Warren district, as shown by the 1930 census, comprises 15,136 souls, 98.2 per cent of whom are American citizens. In addition thereto the smelter town of Douglas, 25 miles away, and solely dependent upon the copper industry.

comprises 9,878 souls. Unless the copper industry is permitted to operate, the welfare of these 25,014 persons is in imminent danger, their life savings are wholly destroyed, they face want, deprivation, and starvation.

their line savings are wholly destroyed, they lace want, deprivation, and starvation.

Third. The copper industry of the United States is in imminent threat of extinction due to the encroachment of low-cost copper taken from ores of high-metal content by slave and compound labor within the wilds of Africa. Our miners and our citizenship, enjoying the benefits of American standards of living, such standards having been established by the labor of our forefathers, who pioneered the vast mesas and prospected the forbidding mountain ranges of Arizona, are now thrown into competition with savage races of another blood, of inferior intelligence, and not capable of enjoying even the minor benefits of civilization. Our miners and our whole citizenship are threatened with the extinction of the industry upon which depends their livelihood, their liberty, and the pursuit of their happiness according to American standards. Fourth. It is within the power of the Congress of the United States to provide adequate protection for our homes and our firesides, for our schools and our churches, for our wives, and for our children. The passage of House Joint Resoluwives, and for our children. The passage of House Joint Resolution 259 by the first session of the Seventy-second Congress will provide for us the protection which we earnestly seek.

provide for us the protection which we earnestly seek.

The foregoing are but a few of many facts upon which we base this our plea to the Congress of the United States for the passage of House Joint Resolution 259 and the levying of an import duty on copper in various forms. We speak primarily for our own homes and our own citizenship living in the Warren mining district. But our plea includes and vitally affects the welfare of 450,000 American citizens within the State of Arizona and many millions of citizens within the 20 States where copper mining is an important factor. This is not a plea for political preferment; this is not a plea for additional favors. It is a petition to the Congress of the United States for the preservation of our liberties, our livelihood, and our very existence. And we earnestly trust that our plea shall not be in vain.

Respectfully submitted.

FRED SUTTER, of Bisbee

FRED SUTTER, of Bisbee and 4,349 other citizens of Arizona.

Having given this very incomplete sketch of the deplorable conditions which exist in every producing copper-mining district in Arizona, the Senate will understand my keen interest in legislation which holds out any measure of hope that prosperity may be restored through the enactment by Congress of a law which will give the product of these mines a preference in the American market.

THE COLLIER-HARRISON BILL

The pending bill has provisions which, if passed, can not fail to be a step in the right direction. I shall not go into every phase of the bill, but will merely direct attention to some of its provisions which I am sure will be beneficial. do this for two purposes. First, to point out some of the particular merits of the measure, but, secondly, to emphasize at once that whether the Collier-Harrison bill becomes a law or not, we who are seeking a tariff on copper are perfectly willing to abide by the principles it establishes and the methods it provides for determining the rates of duty on imports. We are anxious that our claim for a tariff on copper shall be considered on its own merits, and we have complete confidence that when the facts are once understood the relief granted will be both adequate and immediate.

The United States Tariff Commission is directed to ascertain the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, and in so doing is required to ascertain, among other things, the differences in wages in terms of labor cost per unit of product. It is well known that the wages in the western copper mines go up and down according to a sliding scale based upon the market price of copper. The compensation paid to miners and other employees by the copper-mining companies in Arizona in normal times has been high enough to maintain an American standard of living.

AFRICAN LABOR

The principal competition we have to-day is from the development of rich deposits of copper in Africa, where a native unskilled laborer does not receive as much in actual cash for a whole month's work as a hard-rock Arizona miner would earn in two days. Even the best-paid native laborer is content to receive a daily wage equivalent to 75 cents in American money.

The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] spoke a few moments ago about the figures contained in the report of the United States Tariff Commission with respect to wages paid African labor. I read from the commission's report:

African labor: Labor in the African copper mines and developments is performed by native blacks under white supervision. Usually 1 white man is employed (including medical staff) to every 7 to 10 blacks.

According to the Northern Rhodesian Blue Book, the average number of natives employed in 1929 in the mines of Northern Rhodesia was 17,608.

Wages and salaries are paid partly in cash and partly in allowance for food, housing, and transportation. Native labor is generally hired under a 6-month contract and white employees under a 3-year contract.

WAGES FROM FIVE ONE-HALF CENTS TO THIRTY-FOUR THREE-FOURTHS

Public sources of information, such as annual reports of operating companies and the Northern Rhodesian Blue Book, indicate that in Northern Rhodesia the daily cash wage paid to native mine labor averages from 19 cents for unskilled to 58 cents for skilled labor, with a total daily cost to the companies, including allowances in kind, of 35 and 75 cents for unskilled and skilled labor, respectively; the range of cash dally wages paid to native labor in the Katanga district is from 5½ to 34% cents, the amount depending upon the length of service and the kind of work.

The incomplete cost data available indicate a mine labor cost in Africa of $1.75 per ton of ore, equivalent to approximately 1.61 cents per pound of copper, as compared with a mine labor cost in the United States of 3.08 cents per pound of copper.

It is perfectly obvious that without protection against the product of such labor copper mining in Arizona and elsewhere throughout the United States must cease.

NEITHER PROFITS OR EMPLOYMENT

In making its report the Tariff Commission is directed to find the facts with respect to—

The conditions of such domestic industry with respect to profits and losses, the extent to which productive capacity is utilized, and the extent of unemployment.

I quote from the bill.

At the present price of 6 cents a pound there is no such thing as a profit in any American copper mine. The balance sheet of every copper-mining company at the present time will show nothing but losses. Every monthly statement is in the red. No developed copper mine in the United States is utilizing the full extent of its productive capacity. As a cold-blooded business proposition, it would pay almost every one of them to close down and discharge its employees. The hope of a better market for copper is the sole and only reason why the pumps have not been pulled in many mines and the shafts filled with water. If that were done, and later there should be an improvement in the copper market, it would cost large sums of money to restore the mines to their old productive capacity, and that is the only reason why such a course is not followed.

The paragraph of the bill that I have read also directs the Tariff Commission to determine the extent of unemployment. It will take but little time to do that, because all that is needed is a comparison of the pay rolls to-day with what they were in 1928 and prior years.

There is a provision in the bill directing the Tariff Commission to examine into "the efficiency and economic operation and location of any domestic industry under consideration." The American copper-mining industry welcomes such an investigation. The best brains in that industry have been applied to that very problem, and all America can be proud of the results that have been accomplished. American mining engineers have found a way to mine profitably copper ores of lower grade than anywhere else in the world, but however efficient and however economical such operations may be, they can not compete with copper produced from new discoveries in Africa, where the ores are richer and where the wages paid to labor are so low as to be ridiculous in the eyes of the American miner.

TRANSPORTATION COSTS

The bill further directs the Tariff Commission to take into consideration the costs of transportation, and states:

These costs shall be computed from the principal producing areas (in the United States and in the principal competing country or countries) that can reasonably be expected to ship to the principal competing region or regions of the United States, and shall be computed to such principal merket or markets of the United States as may most nearly insure equal competitive opportunity to domestic articles and like or similar foreign articles in such region

Heretofore the members of the United States Tariff Commission have not been able to agree upon a proper definition of the cost of transportation, but this bill brings an end to that dispute. The principal copper-producing areas in the United States are in Michigan and the Far West. The principal market for copper is along the Atlantic seaboard. This necessarily means that the railroad freight rate on copper is a large factor in meeting the competition of copper brought to the refineries along the Atlantic coast by ships from South America and Africa. The water haul may be longer than the rail haul, but it is much less expensive, and it is, therefore, entirely proper that the transportation factor be given due weight, so as more nearly to "insure equal competitive opportunity" for American-produced copper.

TAXATION

The bill also says that the United States Tariff Commission shall take into consideration the advantages granted to a foreign producer by a foreign government. One obvious advantage is a low rate of local taxation. In Arizona we take the equivalent of about 2 cents a pound for taxes on every pound of copper produced in the State. Two cents from 16 or 18 cent copper is a heavy but bearable tax. Two cents from 6 and 8 cent copper is unbearable and confiscatory.

Arizona has collected this tax to maintain one of the most excellent public-school systems in the Union, at the top of which are two State teachers' colleges and a State university of high rank. The money has gone into the building and maintenance of highways and to pay the expenses of State, county, and municipal governments. These attributes of civilization do not exist in Africa, and their establishment and upkeep, therefore, do not constitute a tax on the production of copper.

SIX TRUTHFUL AND FUNDAMENTAL PROPOSITIONS

Let me repeat that the case for copper can meet every test prescribed in the Collier-Harrison bill. All that is asked is an opportunity to have the tests made, and then we know that an adequate import duty will surely be imposed by Congress. Not even the most far-seeing men who are active in the management of great copper-mining companies were able to foretell the calamity which has fallen upon the industry. Immediately after the first drop in the market price of copper the Senators and Congressman from Arizona sought information from the United States Tariff Commission as a basis for action. The commission, like those in control of the industry, could not instantly appreciate what was happening. Its second report was much better than its first response to our inquiries. If called upon for further information, the United States Tariff Commission will be compelled by the logic of rapidly accumulating events to sav:

First. That within the past three years the United States has lost its commanding position as a producer of copper. Foreign production and foreign productive capacity have grown so great as to dominate and control the copper industry of the world.

Second. Foreign copper is now and will continue to be produced at lower average costs than American copper. Ore reserves in the United States average only 23 pounds of copper to the ton. In Africa enormous deposits have been developed containing 88 pounds to the ton. In South America developed mines have over a billion tons with a copper content of 41 pounds. In Canada copper has been found in large quantities of twice the average richness of American ores, and associated with the copper are high values in nickel, gold, silver, and platinum. If the expense of mining and concentrating were equal everywhere, the higher values of foreign ores makes the cost of producing a pound of domestic copper twice as great as it is abroad.

Third. That foreign copper is now and will continue to be produced at lower average cost, particularly in Africa, because American miners can never be reduced to such a low standard of living as to meet the wage paid to foreign laborers.

Fourth. That within the past three years the once great foreign market for American copper has been lost, and the United States has ceased to be a net exporter of copper. This is not due to a lack of capacity to produce copper, but to an utter inability to compete in price owing to higher costs of production.

Fifth. That foreign production of copper has been since 1929 and will continue to be vastly in excess of foreign consumption. By the end of this year foreign production will be 1,200,000,000 pounds annually greater than the amount consumed in all foreign markets. The only market for this surplus of cheap foreign copper is in the United States.

Sixth. The United States having ceased, by force of the circumstances heretofore stated, to be a net exporter of copper, a tariff on that metal will be effective, and an adequate import duty will enable the mines of the United States to produce enough copper to supply the major portion of the American market.

Concrete and specific evidence to demonstrate completely the truth of each one of these six propositions will be presented to the Senate Committee on Finance when the revenue bill now pending in the House of Representatives reaches this body. My whole argument is based upon their truth-They state the fundamental facts which comfulness pletely justify the immediate establishment of an import duty on copper adequate to permit that great American industry to continue to exist.

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE DOUGLAS OF ARIZONA

Mr. President, I know of no better way to conclude my remarks than by reading from a statement made by Hon. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS, a Representative from the State of Arizona, before the House Committee on Ways and Means, made in executive session, on March 16, 1932. I could not find better nor more forceful words to portray the actual condition that now exists in the copper-mining regions of the United States. Mr. Douglas said:

I am appearing to-day in behalf of 14 States, 5 of which produce copper in substantial amounts, 1 of which—Arizona—produces approximately 45 per cent of the copper production of the United States, while the remainder produce copper in lesser

United States, while the remainder produce copper in lesser amounts.

I am here pleading not only for these States but also for more than 100,000 American workmen and their wives and their children. I am here pleading for previously prosperous, modern communities whose sole chance for existence lies in the operation of copper mines and smelters. I am here pleading for the small merchant, small theater owner, small garage owner, who has invested his savings of a lifetime in these communities. For them all an emergency of the first magnitude exists.

Because, first, many of the American copper mines on which such communities and thousands of American workmen are dependent have been compelled to discontinue operations.

Secondly, because the remainder of the American mines are operating at a very limited capacity and a tremendous financial loss in a heroic effort to relieve unemployment.

Thirdly, because more than 27,000 families are destitute, while for the remainder wages have been reduced to the starvation level, with only two or three days of employment per week remaining for each man.

Fourthly, because complete and permanent shutdown of most of the American mines has become an immediate certainty unless the Congress grants rellef.

I can not too emphatically impress upon you the effects of such a shutdown. Large, modern, prosperous communities, with all of the conveniences of modern life, which rest solely upon the copper-mining industry—and there are many of them—will become desolated. Investments made in them by thousands of small merchants will become permanently lost beyond the remotest hope of recovery. Homes in which American miners have invested their savings will become deserted. In short, poverty will literally stalk the streets of impoverished cities, which are becoming and will become but distorted reflections of a vanished prosperity.

But more than this, Mr. Chairman, counties and States now prosperity.

But more than this, Mr. Chairman, counties and States now financially embarrassed will be rendered bankrupt. The picture which I here partially paint is not a creation of my imagination. On the contrary, it is a statement of an actual condition now partially present and shortly to be completely realized. This is the emergency.

The United States now has no foreign market for its copper, has become a net importer of the metal, and would now, even were business conditions prosperous, be confronted with practical were business conditions prosperous, be confronted with practical extinction of its copper-mining industry. It is this relentless pressure, and the prospect of an even greater overwheliaing pressure of low-cost foreign copper which has demoralized and is annihilating the copper industry in the United States, is bringing poverty and suffering to thousands of American families, is converting prosperous modern communities into desolated ones, is developing hysteria almost to the extent of open rebellion, and is bankrupting municipalities, counties, and at least one great State.

Mr. Chairman, the emergency is uncontroverted. Many may ignore it for selfish reasons, but no one can deny it. You, the Members of this committee and the Congress, have within your hands the power to avert disaster, to grant the remedy, to relieve unemployment, to save Commonwealths, and to protect the savings of a lifetime. The remedy does not impose a burden on the Treasury of the United States. On the contrary, it will provide substantial revenue. The remedy, Mr. Chairman, and the only conceivable immediate remedy, is an import tax on copper.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD, as exhibits to my remarks, certain petitions from the State of Arizona, praying for a tariff on copper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Widespread stagnation of the copper-mining industry in the United States has caused a critical situation of unemployment in the copper-mining communities of Arizona, the greatest copper-producing State in the Union Copper mines, formerly purchasers of hydroelectric power from the Salt River Valley irrigation project, have greatly curtailed consumption of electrical energy and copper-mining communities, formerly near and profitable markets for the produce of Salt River Valley farms, have become greatly depopulated, thereby reducing the demands for farm products to but a small fraction of their former demands.

Mining of copper is the largest industry in Arizona. The major part of the tax revenue derived in the State comes from this industry, and upon this industry depends directly and indirectly most of the agricultural, commercial, and industrial activity in the State. When the copper mines in Arizona are operating to the State. When the copper mines in Arizona are operating to capacity Arizona is prosperous.

In recent years the development of large surface deposits of rich ores, easily mined by cheap native labor, has taken place in Africa and other foreign lands. The copper resulting from these developments has been and is being shipped into the United States and in the total absence of any protective tariff, tax, or other regulation is giving destructive competition to the copper mined in this country. Much of this foreign copper can be produced for 6 cents a pound. Domestic copper can not be produced and delivered for less than an average cost of 12 cents a pound. As a result of such competition, the copper-mining industry in the United States is about paralyzed, unemployment is rampant in copper-mining communities, and social and economic problems are critical.

Purchasing power of mining communities has practically disap-

It would seem appropriate at this time for the Seventy-second Congress to help Arizona by passing a 5-cent copper tariff. This is perhaps the only real assurance that Arizona will have to come back in the near future; as long as copper can be laid down in the United States from Congo, South Africa, and other places for less than we can produce it in this country, we need not look for any improvement in this State.

We believe that you gentlemen should give serious thought to such a vital question as we suggest. We do not believe that there is one man in this Congress who would not like to see the United States pull out of its present plight, and this little contribution we are asking will do much for a State which must depend almost wholly on its copper mines.

Dear Sir: There are whole towns in Arizona practically in the bread line at this time. The condition comes as a result of the bread line at this time. The condition comes as a result of the very low price in copper.

At a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce with the citizens of Tucson last night it was stated that copper is being produced in the Belgium-Congo district in Africa under slave conditions, As a result their copper is being produced much cheaper than it can be produced in the United States with the result that thousands of American workmen are out of employment and their families destitute. It is believed that a copper tariff equalizing the cost of production at home and abroad should be passed immediately by the United States Government.

The whole future of the State of Arizona depends upon copper and unless you, as our representative, use every possible means within your power to see that a copper tariff is passed in this session of Congress, our State will be practically bankrupt. We are therefore looking to you for relief in this matter.

Yours very truly,

Dear Mr. Hayden: At a regular meeting of the Business and Professional Women's Club of Bisbee, Ariz., held on February 2, it was resolved that a letter be written you earnestly beseeching you to put forth every possible effort toward the enactment of legislation for a tariff of at least 5 cents per pound to protect our coppermining industry. This must be done to save Arizona's basic industry, to save our State from rule. mining industry. This must be do industry; to save our State from ruin.

industry; to save our State from ruin.

Many families in this district, home owners, many of them the cream of our citizenship, are being forced to accept charity in order to exist. Their homes can not be sold at any price and there is no employment to be had. The greater portion of the taxes in this district comes from the copper-mining industry and with this industry paralyzed the tax rate would be so prohibitive that large amounts of real estate would revert to the State.

Every merchant and every industry in the State is affected; the Federal Government is in danger of losing millions from the failure of power and reclamation-land payments. A concrete example: The San Carlos Dam with its $200,000 annual market for power cut off by the closing of the mines, and the farmers' loss of an annual $100,000 produce market, will make this reclamation district utterly unable to meet its Federal obligation of $10,000,000 for the construction of the dam. This same outlook holds true for practically all the irrigation and power districts in Arizona and will certainly have its effect eventually on the Boulder Dam project.

The members of this club as voters and taxpayers and humanitarians are looking to you, our spokesman in Washington, to see that we are not forsaken.

Very respectfully,

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in connection with the nomination of Charles A. Sandburg as postmaster at Jamestown, N. Y., I should like to say a word or two.

The objection to him came from many citizens of his city who felt that it was improper for a man drawing $250 a month from the Veterans' Bureau-$3,000 a year-at the same time to hold the office of postmaster, thus drawing two Government stipends. Of course, I explained to these citizens that there is nothing in the law which prevents this. In spite of the fact that times are hard and the offices ought to be distributed, I explained that no valid reason exists why he should not be confirmed if the President felt he was a worthy successor to himself.

It was on this account that I did not object further to the confirmation. I have notified all these interested citizens that under the law there is no reason why he should not be confirmed.

THE JUDICIARY-CHARLES E. WINTER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles E. Winter, of Wyoming, to be attorney general of Porto Rico.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I did not conceive it to be my duty I would not occupy the time of the Senate, even for a moment, in discussing the nomination now before us for consideration. Mr. Charles E. Winter has been named by the President of the United States for the important position of attorney general of Porto Rico, and the Senate is called upon to act upon the nomination. I regret to be placed in a position where I feel constrained to oppose the confirmation of one for whom I entertain a high regard. I knew Mr. Winter when he was a Member of Congress and learned to admire him and to appreciate his many fine qualities. Moreover, I discovered that he was a lawyer of ability; that he had filled a judicial position in Wyoming with credit; and possessed the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens. It is obvious, therefore, that the position which I take in regard to his confirmation is not prompted by any lack of confidence in Mr. Winter or any feeling of hostility toward him. I repeat that I entertain a feeling of friendship for him and should be glad to give him my support if he had been named for a Federal judicial position or for a position within the continental United States calling for judicial knowledge or for the services of so worthy an American. The nomination of Mr. Winter was referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, of which I am a member. I am betraying no secret when I say that the subcommittee was not unanimous, and when the vote was taken in the full committee a number of Senators voted against reporting Mr. Winter's name to the Senate, though they entertained for Mr. Winter a very friendly feeling and, indeed, a high regard. To vote against one whom you esteem and whose intellectual and professional qualifications are unquestioned can only find justification when some important principle is involved.

Since I have been in public life I have opposed some of the policies of our Government in connection with our Territories and what some are pleased to call our Territorial possessions. I have looked with disfavor upon our excursions into Nicaragua, Haiti, and Santo Domingo, and to our attitude toward the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico. With respect to the Philippine Islands I have insisted that they should be independent, and that until they were independent the largest measure of autonomy should be accorded them. With respect to Porto Rico I have believed that if that island is to remain under the flag its inhabitants should be accorded all the rights of American citizens. I have insisted that Porto Rico-if it is to continue a part of the United States; that is to say, is to be under the control of the United States—shall enjoy all constitutional guarantees, and its inhabitants shall enjoy a full measure of liberty and local self-government.

Several years ago I offered a bill authorizing the inhabitants of Porto Rico to elect their own governor and to enjoy other privileges not now granted to them; and though extensive hearings were had, during which it seemed to be conceded that this right ought to be accorded the Porto Ricans, no action was taken by the Congress. Porto Ricans of ability and scholastic attainments appeared before the committee and urged that it was the unanimous wish of their people that they be permitted to choose their own officials. No one denies that there are in Porto Rico many lawyers of ability who are qualified to hold the highest judicial positions within the island. Judge DAVILA, who has been a Commissioner from Porto Rico for many years, has recently been appointed to the position of chief justice of the highest court of Porto Rico. He is a Porto Rican; was schooled in the civil and Spanish law, and is thoroughly familiar with the judicial system there prevailing as well as with his countrymen and their problems. I repeat when I say that there are lawyers of ability in Porto Rico who know the Spanish language and have the confidence and esteem of the people.

The attorney general of Porto Rico, next to the governor, is the most important official in the island. As Senators know, the Spanish language is there spoken; it is employed in the courts and spoken by the people. It would seem, therefore, that their judges and their attorneys general and. indeed, other officials, high and low, should speak the Spanish language. They should be familiar with the civil law and Spanish law and be acquainted with conditions there prevailing.

I can not help but feel that it is unwise, if not unfair, to the Porto Ricans to send to them persons, no matter how able they may be, who are not Porto Ricans to fill high positions; persons who do not know the Spanish language, who are unacquainted with their judicial procedure, and who are strangers to the island and to the habits and traditions, and, indeed, the mentality and psychology of the people.

History is replete with examples of the resentments and bitterness arising from imposing upon an alien race officials and rulers of a dominating and conquering authority. The American colonists, though they spoke the English language and were nurtured in the common law and possessed the culture and philosophy of the British people, resented the policy of the British Crown in sending officials from beyond the seas to govern them and administer their affairs. If the American colonies were dissatisfied with British control and resented British officials being sent to exercise governmental functions and authority over them, it is to be expected that the people of Porto Rico, of a different race and language and customs and judicial system and with conditions and problems entirely different from those confronting the people in the continental United States, would look with concern and even dissatisfaction upon a policy which denied to them the right to elect their own officials and to control their own domestic affairs. It seems to me that the policy of the United States should be to prepare the Porto Ricans for statehood and for the enjoyment of all the privileges which belong to American citizenship.

A person who is unfamiliar with the Spanish language and with the Spanish and Roman law there prevailing, and who is unacquainted with the problems and questions unique and important in character, is at a great disadvantage when called to fill the office of attorney general of Porto Rico. The attorney general, next to the governor, is the most important official in the Porto Rican governmental system. The responsibility rests upon him to advise the governor upon legal matters, and to be the legal adviser to the various branches of the government. It is his duty to represent the government in the courts: to try cases in the courts; to interpret the law; and to see that the laws are enforced. It needs no argument in support of the proposition that the attorney general should be not only an eminent lawyer but one familiar with the judicial system obtaining in Porto Rico and the language in which the laws are written and in which the courts conduct their business.

There are Senators upon the floor who have lived in Territories and they know the unsatisfactory conditions growing out of the policy of the Executive authority of the United States in superimposing upon the people of the Territories governors, judges, attorneys, marshals, and other officials who were nonresidents of such Territories. I can not forget the controversies that existed in my own State under the Territorial form of government.

I resented and the people of the Territory resented, the action of Presidents and executive officials in sending persons to rule us who were not citizens of the Territory; who were strangers to the people; and who were unfamiliar with our local laws and customs. We were not mollified though the governors and judges and marshals and other officials were of the same race and came from the same States from which most of the founders of the Territory came. The people opposed a "carpet-bag" rule; they were bitter because they were not permitted to choose their own officials and to manage and control their own affairs. It is undoubtedly true that statehood was sought by many inhabitants of Territories, perhaps prematurely, because of the repugnance felt toward what they called a condition of vassalage under which their rulers were sent from distant States. They were strangers to the residents of the Territories and, as I have indicated, were unfamiliar with their local problems and too often unacquainted with the system of jurisprudence there prevailing.

Senators will understand, I hope, my position and appreciate that it is taken, not because of any unfriendliness toward Mr. Winter, but because I feel that an important principle is here involved—one which goes to the very heart of our theory and philosophy of government. It has been the boast of Americans from the foundation of the Government that all just powers are derived from the consent of the governed and that the right of self-government is one of the concomitants of our institutions and our Government.

Wherever our flag floats it should float over a free people, a people who are entitled to all the rights and privileges of all other citizens under the flag. I repeat when I say that I have a high regard for Mr. Winter and would be happy to support him for a corresponding position or even a much higher one within his own State or within appropriate spheres of the Federal Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, Mr. Winter lives in Wyoming; he has served in the House of Representatives with credit to himself and to his State. He was the recent Republican candidate, I understand, for Senator from Wyoming, but was defeated at the general election. On the other hand, it is conceded that he is an able lawyer; that, so far as legal attainments are concerned, he has the ability properly to perform the functions of attorney general. There is nothing whatever, so far as I know, against Mr. Winter's ability or his character. So it is somewhat embarrassing to say anything against his confirmation, because it is usually understood that when a nominee fails of confirmation there is something wrong with him in some of the respects I have mentioned. Nothing of that kind exists in this case.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, I believe the nomination of Mr. Winter is a mistake. It is conceded that he can not speak Spanish and that he has no ability to read the Spanish language; he is entirely ignorant of it. The records in Porto Rico are printed in Spanish. Trials in Porto Rican courts are conducted and the testimony is given entirely in Spanish, and the court records are written in that language. So Mr. Winter as attorney general of Porto Rico would be, I think it is conceded, badly handicapped in the performance of his duty.

Moreover, there is no dispute whatever but that in Porto Rico there are attorneys amply able and competent, and who possess all the qualifications necessary properly to perform the duties of this office. Those are reasons, Mr. President, that cause me to believe that the appointment of Mr. Winter is a mistake; but they are not the only reasons. There is another reason, and that is that the people of Porto Rico rather resent the idea of the Government of the United States sending to govern them men from continental United States who are unacquainted with their habits and who are unfamiliar with their language.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. King] has just referred to the time when he lived in a Territory and when the powers in Washington appointed officials who, though they understood the language and lived in the same country, yet came from some other part of the United States. Our Government is based, to a great extent, upon the demand of our forefathers that our people be permitted to govern themselves. It has been the custom of all political parties to transgress along these lines. The case before us now is a very fair example of the policy that has been pursued by our Government.

Porto Rico is a ward of the American people; the Porto Ricans are a proud people; to a great extent they have a different civilization from ours; they have an entirely different language. Their law is founded upon the civil law; ours mostly upon the common law. The procedure in their courts is very different from the procedure in ours. This man could not try a lawsuit in Porto Rico without having an interpreter to interpret every question and every answer. If there were no attorneys in Porto Rico competent to fill this place, it would be entirely different.

Certainly, Mr. President, I have no feeling of any kind but the most friendly toward Mr. Winter; I am personally acquainted with him; he came from my State; his people live in my State now; and I would be glad, under ordinary circumstances, to vote for his confirmation.

Before I read a letter or two, I want to make another remark, and that is that the present administration, going, I think, a little further in that direction than most administrations have gone in the past, has seen fit to appoint to high office those who have been defeated in the campaign just preceding. It does not mean, of course, because a man has been defeated in a political campaign that he is not patriotic or anything of that kind; I am making no such charge; I do not believe that there is anything of that kind ! in this case; but as a policy of government, even if it be confined to our own borders, it is one that is greatly injurious, and, followed to its logical conclusion, will finally bring about results that are not beneficial to our country or to our Government. We have been confirming this kind of appointees regularly. The Judiciary Committee has been passing on them at almost every meeting and almost always has made a favorable report because the nominees are able and competent to fill the places for which they have been designated.

However, Mr. President, there is another aspect of this system that can not be defended in a Republic such as ours. It gives to the party machine—and I do not use the word "machine" in any offensive sense-or the head of the organization of the political party in control an advantage in a political contest which is not possessed by one who has the temerity or the courage to fight the slate which the organization puts up for the people to vote for. Those who favor the administration, if they go down to defeat in the contest, know they will stand a good show of obtaining a better position than the one which the people denied them. On the other hand, those who dare to oppose the administration, regardless of what party it may be, know that they take their political lives in their hands when, following the convictions of their own consciences, they oppose any man or any program that has been laid down by the machine in power. So such a policy in the end means bad government.

But laying that aside, Mr. President, is it wise to say to the people of Porto Rico, whom we have taken under our wing and under our control without their consent, "We are going to send you governors, officials, and officers to rule over you from the United States"? It seems to me, if we want to draw the people of Porto Rico to us, if we want to have them respect our flag and our Government and want them to be friendly and loyal to our Republic and our institutions, we ought to treat them more as equals rather than to put in control of their government politicians who have failed at home, even though it be conceded that the men we send to carry out our policy are high-class men.

Mr. President, before this nomination was made by the President Mr. Davila, the Commissioner in the House of Representatives representing Porto Rico, wrote a letter to the Secretary of War. I want to read that letter. It is written on the official letterhead of the Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

FEBRUARY 6, 1932.

Hon. Patrick J. Hurley,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.
My Dear Mr. Secretary: It is with reluctance that I again—

He had done this before-that I again respectfully call your attention to the pending appointment in the office of attorney general of Porto Rico.

It is my candid opinion that the administration should take the advice of the executive of the island before making this appointment. As you know, the attorney general is a member of the governor's cabinet and should enjoy his confidence and loyalty. He should also be a lawyer of good standing and reputation with a thorough knowledge of the Spanish language, which is essential for the proper interpretation of our civil code, mortgage law, and other laws of Roman and Spanish origin.

Our organic law assigns the attorney general a salary of $6,000 per annum, and it is my impression that it would be somewhat difficult to obtain the services of a lawyer from continental United States at such a salary and with these qualifications. There are difficult to obtain the services of a lawyer from continental United States at such a salary and with these qualifications. There are a number of outstanding lawyers in Porto Rico, however, who are fully qualified to fill this position and who would be willing to accept it, not for the material benefit involved, but mainly for the high honor of the appointment. These lawyers have the advantage of being familiar with the Spanish and English languages, and possess a thorough knowledge of American institutions and of the customs and psychology of the Porto Rican people. If it is possible to find a man in Porto Rico so ideally qualified it should only be natural for us to ask and expect that he be so honored.

The policy pursued in the other Territories should be followed in Porto Rico. In Hawaii the attorney general is appointed by the governor of the Territory; in the Philippine Islands he is also appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the insular Senate; while in Alaska he is elected by the people. Why should it be otherwise in Porto Rico? As the attorney general is appointed by the President, the least we can ask to approach this policy is that the Governor of Porto Rico be consulted and his recommendation carried into effect.

There is the expectancy in the island that a Porto Rican will be selected for this office, and the appointment of a candidate unknown to them will create great disappointment and a feeling of distrust on the part of the national administration.

Very truly yours,

FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA.

Mr. President, I think that letter-courteous, gentlemanly-must appeal to everyone who will stop for a moment and look at this question from the viewpoint of the people of Porto Rico.

I should like to see the people of Porto Rico become endeared in every way to the United States. We did not consult them when we took possession of their territory. They have become our wards; and the policy of sending to Porto Rico from the United States governors and attorneys general and other officials who are unacquainted with their habits, who do not understand the psychology of the people, who do not speak their language, must drive them, as far as their affections are concerned, away from the people of the United States.

It is because I do not want to carry out that policy, it is because I want to have the people of Porto Rico respect and honor our country, that I rise in my place even against my own friend to protest against sending over there, to govern them, men from our country.

In the Judiciary Committee this appointment was approved by quite a large majority of the committee. I see in the Chamber now some of the members of the committee who voted that way. Almost every one of them, however, voted that way with an apology. If I make a statement that is not correct, I shall be glad to be interrupted and corrected. They voted in favor of confirmation because it was conceded that it was a good man who was appointed. They did not, however, agree with the policy of sending men from here to govern the Porto Rican people.

The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh], who is absent from the city at the present time, was a member of the subcommittee to which this nomination was referred. ought to say that subsequently to the writing of this letter by the Resident Commissioner, Mr. Davila, he has been appointed by the President and has been confirmed by the Senate, with a unanimous recommendation of the Judiciary Committee, to a position on the Supreme Court of Porto Rico, and therefore is no longer a Resident Commissioner with a seat in the House of Representatives. The Senator from Montana, in his official capacity as a member of that committee, wrote to the now supreme judge of Porto Rico, Mr. Davila, and, after telling him that he was a member of the subcommittee to which the nomination had been referred, asked him what, if anything, he had to say particularly in regard to the question of the President being able to get other attorneys who live in Porto Rico, who are familiar with their practice and their language and the habits of the people, to fill this important position of attorney general. That was the substance of the Senator's letter. I desire to read you the reply that now Judge Davila wrote to the Senator from Montana:

Hon. Thomas J. Walsh, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WAISH: In reply to your letter of March 16, regarding the nomination of Mr. Charles E. Winter, of Wyoming, to be attorney general of Porto Rico, I wish to inclose copy of a letter which I wrote to the Secretary of War explaining my views on this appointment.

That letter I have already read. He goes on:

There are several prominent lawyers in Porto Rico who could very acceptably fill the place; and, while I am not personally opposed to Mr. Winter's nomination, I think that the policy pursued in the other Territories and possessions of electing or appointing a resident for this important position should be followed in Porto Rico.

Signed by Judge DAVILA.

Mr. President, that is about all I have to say. I realize, I think, that this confirmation is going to take place; but I desire to enter now in the RECORD, for future action, my protest against this method of caring for a people that we have under our control and under our jurisdiction—a people who are amply able, in my judgment, to handle their own business, to transact it satisfactorily to themselves, and who look with some dread upon the idea of being treated as a subject race. I want every Senator—and I hope it gets to the administration, not only this one but others that shall follow—to realize that if this policy is pursued, we will eventually reach a time when we will have incurred the dislike and even the hatred of all the people that we are holding against their will and their wish, and governing them by sending to them a carpet-bag government, because that is what it is.

There are people in the United States who realize to a great extent what that means and how offensive it is. If we will take it home to ourselves, we will realize that as free American citizens we would rather be left to govern ourselves than to be turned over to some other nation, even though for argument's sake we might concede that they could govern us better than we could govern ourselves.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I feel that I should say a

I have known Mr. Winter for several years. I have a very high opinion of him and a very friendly feeling for him; but I believe in the policy that has been announced by the Senator from Nebraska. I have tried to follow that policy with reference to some of the other Territories.

There has been, as Senators know, more or less trouble with reference to appointments to be made in Alaska. I have universally followed the rule of expressing the belief that those appointments should be filled by residents of Alaska, and I feel the same way with reference to Porto Rico.

For that reason, I am going to vote against the confirmation of this nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. I object.

Mr. NORRIS. Unless the Senator from Wyoming can give some reason for it that seems to be proper, I shall have to object to that request.

Mr. CAREY. The reason why I make the request is that the transport sails to Porto Rico on Thursday; and if the President is not notified now, it means that Judge Winter will have to remain over a week, waiting to go to Porto Rico.

Mr. NORRIS. Is Judge Winter here?

Mr. CAREY. He is here in Washington. He has been here for quite a while.

Mr. NORRIS. Under those circumstances I think that is a sufficient reason, and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Wyoming if he would be willing to let this matter go over until to-morrow. The Senator from Washington [Mr. Dill] is not here. He will be back to-morrow, as I understand. He has made it a universal rule to object unless he is acquainted with the circumstances.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Tennessee that I have discussed this matter with the Senator from Washington [Mr. Dill]. He does not object to this confirmation, and he stated to me that he expected to vote for it in the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the circumstances, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to state that I do not think the Senator from Washington [Mr. Dill] would object, if that is the reason why the Senator is making the objection. Moreover, while I have continually and consistently objected in all instances, unless a reason is given, to notifying the President, ever since we had the unfortunate difficulty over the appointment of Mr. George Otis Smith as chairman of the Power Commission, I regard the reason given by the Senator from Wyoming as a perfectly good reason.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do, too; and for that reason I will withdraw the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the President will be notified. The clerk will state the next nomination on the calendar.

COOPER HUDSPETH

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Cooper Hudspeth to be United States marshal, western district of Arkansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

JOSEPH FRITSCH, JR.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph Fritsch, jr., to be United States marshal, western district of New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask unanimous consent that the post-masters be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the post-masters will be confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. FESS. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 30, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 29, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy Spirit, faithful Guide, do Thou hear our supplication. As we venture upon this day, may we not reject the wisdom that cometh from Thy Holy Word. With open minds may we accept the precepts of its wise and cautious teachers. Touch us where our heart lies, that its undertone may be of that rest which inspires the sweet song of life. Oh. may its string never break or its harp become tuneless. Again, our Father, lead us to understand that cooperation is the basis of success and, if wisely observed, will feed the roots of stable government. We bear upon the lips of this noonday prayer a petition for these honored and faithful servants of our land. We beseech Thee that the whole course and flow of this Congress may be the very fountainhead from which all our people shall gather inspiration which shall be justified for years to come. Spirit of the Most High, move upon us, and with urgency and zeal, with longings and aspirations may we press faithfully onward. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE REVENUE BILL

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10236, the revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Bankhead in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title. The Clerk read the title, as follows:

H. R. 10236, a bill to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as I

(b) Adjusted basis: The adjusted basis for determining the gain or loss from the sale or other disposition of property, whenever acquired, shall be the basis determined under subsection (a), adjusted as hereinafter provided.
(1) General rule: Proper adjustment in respect of the property shall in all cases be made—

(A) for expenditures, receipts, losses, or other items, properly chargeable to capital account;

chargeable to capital account;

(B) in respect of any period since February 28, 1913, for exhaustion, wear, and tear, obsolescence, amortization, and depletion (computed without regard to discovery value or percentage depletion), to the extent allowed (but not less than the amount allowable) under this act or prior income tax laws;

(C) in respect of any period prior to March 1, 1913, for exhaustion, wear and tear, obsolescence, amortization, and depletion, to tion, wear and tear, obsolescence, amortization, and depletion, to the extent sustained;

(D) in the case of stock (to the extent not provided for in the foregoing subparagraphs) for the amount of distributions previously made which, under the law applicable to the year in which the distribution was made, either were tax-free or were applicable in reduction of basis (not including distributions made by a corporation, which was classified as a personal-service corporation under the provisions of the revenue act of 1918 or 1921, out of its earnings or profits which were taxable in accordance with the provisions of section 218 of the revenue act of 1918 or 1921).

(2) Substituted basis: The term "substituted basis" as used in this subsection means a basis determined under any provision of subsection (a) of this section or under any corresponding provision of a prior income tax law, providing that the basis shall be determined—determined-

(A) by reference to the basis in the hands of a transferor, donor,

(A) by reference to the basis in the hands of a transferor, donor, or grantor, or
(B) by reference to other property held at any time by the person for whom the basis is to be determined.
Whenever it appears that the basis of property in the hands of the taxpayer is a substituted basis, then the adjustments provided in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be made after first making in respect of such substituted basis proper adjustments of a similar nature in respect of the period during which the property was held by the transferor, donor, or grantor, or during which the other property was held by the person for whom the basis is to be determined. A similar rule shall be applied in the case of a series of substituted bases.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker be given such time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I will not abuse the privilege, because it is not my purpose to make an extended statement. When I was elected Speaker of the House of Representatives it was my purpose then-and it has been my purpose all along, and it shall be my purpose in the future-to preside over the House of Representatives as impartially and fairly as my intellect will permit. [Applause.] In order to do that I felt it would be better if I did not enter into general debate for fear it might become partisan, and therefore I have refrained up to this time to take the floor on any subject.

It was my intention to refrain this session from addressing the House or the Committee of the Whole; but, in view of the fact that I had served 18 years on the Ways and Means Committee, had acquired some knowledge of taxation, it was felt by some of my colleagues on that committee that I owed a duty to the House to make some statement concerning the tax situation. Yielding to that, I appear before you this morning to make what I conceive to be a statement as to the duty and right of each Member of the House from my viewpoint.

In October the President of the United States requested certain Members of Congress to come to Washington to consider certain questions that he had in view to recommend to the Congress of the United States when it met.

While here in Washington there was a very grave doubt in the minds of certain officials and members of the administration whether there would be a tax bill at the coming

After ascertaining this, I returned to my home and for the first time in my life undertook to prepare an address to the House of Representatives, believing that the Republicans would organize the House and that my Democratic colleagues might elect me leader.

I believed then, as I do now, that it was the duty of our Government to sustain its credit and to ask Congress to balance the Budget. [Applause.] That speech will never be delivered, because I was not selected as the minority leader but happened to become the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I arrived here on the 11th of November, before the Congress met. The newspaper men gathered in my office at that time, when it looked as if the Democrats would organize the House of Representatives, and whatever I might say might be interesting to the country. The first interview I gave was to impress upon them—and, I hope, to impress upon the country and my colleagues-the importance of maintaining the financial integrity of this Republic. [Applause.] I have from that time until this repeatedly, before Congress met and before I was elected Speaker, maintained that the highest possible duty that the House of Representatives could perform for the people of the country during this session was to levy sufficient taxes to sustain the financial integrity of the Republic.

It was suggested by some of my colleagues, both in the Senate and in the House, that it might be advisable from a party standpoint and of the service to the country that the Democrats of the House and the Senate get together and, so far as they could, outline a program or policy which we thought would be to the best interests of the country. In pursuance of that thought, Senator Robinson, leader of the Democrats in the Senate, and myself selected what is known as the policy committee. It was composed of 10 Members of the Senate and 10 Members of the House. I shall read the names of that committee, because I think it will illustrate both to the Republicans and, I hope, to my Democratic friends that the committee is composed of average Democrats of the House and of the Senate.

The Members from the Senate are Senators Robinson of Arkansas, Walsh of Montana, Walsh of Massachusetts, HARRISON, PITTMAN, GLASS, BULKLEY, WAGNER, HULL, BARK-LEY. The Members of the House on that committee are GARNER, RAINEY, BYRNS, CULLEN, CRISP, BANKHEAD, TAYLOR of Colorado, DREWRY, SANDLIN, and GREENWOOD. That committee from time to time had meetings in my office for the purpose of discussing what was the best interest of the country as well as the best interest of the Democratic organization of the House and the Senate. On January 6 of this year, after a two hours' session and a full discussion, that joint committee unanimously decided upon this language as expressing what should be the Democratic policy of the Senate and the House of Representatives:

It is of primary importance that the Budget be balanced promptly.

As I say, that was unanimously adopted by the policy committee. I believed then, and I believe now, that the paramount duty of the House of Representatives is to levy sufficient taxes of some kind, of some nature, that will sustain the credit of this country in the eyes of the world as well as our own people. Later on the Ways and Means Committee went to work with a view of bringing about that desired end. After a discussion of more than 30 days-and if I make a mistake in any statement concerning the Ways and Means Committee, I hope the gentleman from Georgia will call my attention to it-

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, we had hearings lasting more than 30 days. Over 177 witnesses appeared before us, and the committee was in executive session about five weeks before we finally brought out the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Before the bill was reported, some two or three weeks before it was brought out, it was decided by a meeting of the Democrats of the Ways and Means Committee and myself in Mr. CRISP's office that the better policy would be to prepare a nonpartisan tax bill and present it to the House of Representatives. In view of the fact that the Democratic majority is small, we felt it would be difficult, if not impossible, to pass in the House of Representatives a partisan bill. In addition to that, in the hearts of these men and in their conversations they thought it was the more patriotic thing to take into our confidence the entire mempiece of legislation. The only two thoughts conveyed to the country in the statement from the Ways and Means Committee was that it was to be a nonpartisan bill and that there were to be sufficient taxes raised to balance the Budget.

I mention the background to this. Mr. Chairman, and my Democratic friends especially, to meet some criticisms that have been directed at me for advocating the policy of levying sufficient taxes to sustain the credit of the Government. In view of that background, I think I had a right to ask the House of Representatives, and especially the Democrats, to join with us in an effort to levy sufficient taxes to take care of the obligations made by the Congress of the United States. The Committee on Ways and Means went about their work in executive session and reported a bill to the House of Representatives. In the course of those executive sessions I was told, and I think the membership of the House was told, that the committee believed it impossible to find sufficient taxes which they thought the House would indorse in order to balance the Budget, unless they went to a manufacturers' tax. My reply to that was that I had been opposed to a sales tax ever since I had been a Member of Congress, and I had always been and always would be opposed to a sales tax. I am now opposed to a sales tax; but, gentlemen, if I find it impossible to balance this Budget and restore the confidence of the world and our own people in our Government without some such tax I would levy any tax, sales or any other kind, in order to do that. [Applause.] I think more of my country than I do of any theory of taxation that I may have, and the country at this time is in a condition where the worst taxes you could possibly levy would be better than no taxes at all. [Applause.]

The Committee of the Whole House acted otherwise. I have no quarrel with you. I have said on the floor of this House scores and scores of times, and I repeat it now, that I do not believe in rules being applied to the House of Representatives that take away from it the freedom of expression not only of your voice but of your vote. I believe in freedom of expression; therefore I was unwilling to have any gag rule, so called, applied to the consideration of this bill. I wanted the Members to have free opportunity to express themselves in the Committee of the Whole, and you have had that opportunity. You have expressed yourselves; you have arrived at a conclusion that you will not have a sales tax; and, I repeat, I have no quarrel with you because of it.

I appeal to you, not only in the name of my party but my country, that in view of the fact there has been stricken from this bill more than $500,000,000 of taxation, it is your duty, your paramount duty, to help this House and this Committee restore some taxes to this bill in order that this country's financial integrity may be maintained. [Applause.]

My only object in taking the floor was to make that one

Last Saturday, as well as yesterday, the people of the world realized that Congress, in a gesture, had indicated that it did not intend to balance this Budget. What was the result, not only among American people but among the peoples of the world?

As reflected through the New York Stock Exchange and other exchanges in this country, what did we find? We found the foreigner selling the dollar. We found our exchange going down more than it has at any time in the past 12 years. We found it renewed yesterday, and we found that followed by a sharp reduction in United States securities. What does that mean? It simply means that the $1,800,000,000 of money belonging to foreigners who have come to us with the idea that this flag not only protected the person but protected property, and who put their credits in the banks of our country because they thought that was the safest place on the face of the earth to deposit their wealth, have transferred their gold to foreign vaults. When they heard around the world that there was some doubt about this Congress balancing the Budget, they immediately began to withdraw their wealth, to sell American exchange, and trans-bership of the House in undertaking to pass this important | fer their gold to foreign vaults. As sure as I stand in the well of this House, I believe that if this Congress to-day should decline to levy a tax bill there would not be a bank in existence in the United States in 60 days that could meet its depositors. I believe that the shock to the Nation, the shock to the foreigner who is doing business with us, would be such that there would be a financial panic such as has never been equaled in this Republic since its organization.

This committee will bring in a program. I hope you will support it. [Applause.] I do not want all the taxes that are in there. You can not get just the taxes that you want. This committee is composed of 24 men from 24 different States. I believe you will admit they are fairly intelligent. They are patriotic. They want to serve the country. They want to serve you. They would like to bring in an ideal bill that could be voted for by every Member of this House, but it is impossible to do it ...

So I appeal to you that if you do not like the taxes which they report, will you not be good enough, will you not have statesmanship enough when you criticize it and ask to strike it out, will you not have the manhood to substitute something in its place? [Applause.]

At the risk of being criticized I want to give to the world and to the country to-day, if I can, an expression of this House, so that the world and the country may realize we are going to balance the Budget. Mr. Chairman, may I do an unusual thing? I may be criticized for it, but I want every man and every woman in this House who hopes to balance the Budget and who is willing to go along with that effort to try to balance the Budget to rise in their seats. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Now, if they do not mind, those who do not want to balance the Budget can rise in their seats. [No one rises.] I think this ought to restore to the American people confidence in our country. [Applause.]

We may have differences among ourselves, but in our hearts we are patriotic. We want to serve this Republic. This is a sensible Congress and we can get sensible results.

I again want to ask the charity of the House, and I am going to say to the membership that, with their permission, for the balance of the consideration of this bill I hope to participate in it. [Applause.]

I said to the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee yesterday that I would not consider it any reflection on me or on my honor or integrity or desire to serve the Nation if the committee disagreed with me about some of the taxes. That is a privilege. It is not only a privilege but it is the duty of the Members to express themselves. [Applause.]

I am an organization Democrat. I never in my life cast a vote against my own judgment except I had to go along with the Democratic organization. [Applause.] I have done that, and I will do it again. You must have organization. We have it through committees, and it is the only way we can function in this House.

Let me say to the Republican side that during the consideration of this bill, while some remarks have been made by men in high authority on the outside that ought not to have been made, the membership in this House on the Republican side has been quite decent. [Applause.] I am willing to pay them that encomium because they are entitled to it.

Gentlemen, I just wanted to say these few words to you. Let me say to the Democrats alone, do not become critical, do not throw brickbats, let us be brotherly so far as we can. If one of us should disagree, do not point your finger at him and say he is not a Democrat. That is not the thing to do, and it is not helpful. I pray you on this side to be in a good humor so far as you can. You are here to serve your country; and, gentlemen, let us put through this legislation at the earliest date possible in the interest of our country. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. Chairman, in view of the very extraordinary statement made by our distinguished Speaker, I feel it is incumbent upon me to say a few words at this time, notwithstanding the fact that I have a severe cold and my voice is not in very good condition to speak.

However, I want to say to the Speaker of the House, to the Democratic majority, and to the people of this entire country that, as far as I know the sentiment of the minority side, we are in entire sympathy with everything the Speaker has said in regard to the need and necessity of balancing the Budget at the present time. [Applause.] We truly feel that is the most important and really the first obligation resting on this House. We are willing to do our part in doing the work the country expects of Congress at this time. [Applause.]

I was among the Members on our side who had a tentative agreement that we would write a nonpartisan tax measure. I thought that was best for the interest of the entire country, and I still believe so. While, as the Speaker said, I had never been especially in favor of the manufacturers' sales tax, yet when the great Ways and Means Committee said that was the only way they could find to get the money at this time and in this emergency, I accepted that proposition and supported it to the best of my ability as long as it was before the committee. However, if it is necessary to have some other line of taxation, I am willing to go along on that other line.

We all know very well that when the news went out to this country and the nations of the world that we were faltering on the proposition of whether we would balance the Budget or not, that cost this country in depreciated value of securities just twice the entire amount you are trying to raise by this tax measure. Every man well knows that. If there was so much trouble over the fear that we would not balance the Budget, no one knows what would happen if we actually failed to do our duty.

As far as I know, the Republican minority are willing to continue to go along and do the best they can in supporting the Ways and Means Committee in levying enough taxes to pay the expenses of the Government. That is the vital proposition before us at the present time, and we must not fail.

We are not especially interested in any one particular line of taxation. You can make any tax program you like and send it out to the country, and every individual man who is affected by that program will oppose it. Every individual can argue effectively against any tax that affects himself. But the duty devolves upon us to do what we think is right at this time, and I have faith enough in this House to know that it will do what is expected. [Applause.] The important thing is to pass a tax measure that is reasonably fair and just to every class and to every part of the country.

I can assure the Speaker and the members of the Ways and Means Committee that the majority on our side of the aisle will fairly and justly consider every proposition made by the committee. We expect to back the committee to the fullest extent in passing a law that will balance the Budget and give this country enough money to pay its running expenses and maintain the Nation's credit, both at home and abroad. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for 12 minutes. The reason for the request is that I desire to present the alternative program which the Ways and Means Committee to-day decided to recommend for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole. It takes some time to read it, and I want to give you the whole picture so far as it has been agreed to by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, some months ago I became convinced that the welfare of the Nation required a balanced Budget, and that without it there could be no economic recovery. As it is my philosophy to believe that I serve my district best when I serve my country best, I determined to go the whole length to do what I could toward the balancing of the Budget. [Applause.]

No taxes, my friends, are pleasant. No one wants to pay taxes. Under whatever form taxes are levied, if the competition of the business permits it, the taxes are passed on to the consumer and they are, in reality, sales taxes.

The committee cheerfully acquiesced—as it could not do otherwise—in the decision of the House not to adopt a manufacturers' sales tax. We simply brought it to you for you to consider. You have given us your judgment on it. You are opposed to it. It is eliminated and the committee will not, of course, attempt again to present a manufacturers' sales tax to you. [Applause.]

When it was eliminated from the bill, about $500,000,000 of contemplated revenue went out and it left the bill that amount short of balancing the Budget.

As soon as you acted on the sales tax, as acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, I appointed a subcommittee to consider items to suggest to you to raise money to balance the Budget. That committee met in a bipartisan way. There has been no partisanship in the consideration and preparation of this bill from the first day up to now. The minority leader, the gentleman from New York, has cooperated with me. I have talked with him about this bill as freely as I have talked with the Speaker from the time we started its preparation. [Applause.]

The members of the subcommittee have been very diligent and have worked day and night. This morning they reported their substitute plan to the full Committee on Ways and Means and the Ways and Means Committee to-day approved it. This subcommittee is continued in office. There may be some necessity for offering other amendments, especially if some of these items are rejected, in order to provide adequate revenue to balance the Budget.

The Ways and Means Committee was made happy this morning when this House signified its determination to balance the Budget, and if any of these items are eliminated, the subcommittee will make a report to the full committee and the full committee will report items to you for your consideration.

Without enumerating the changes made by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as to income taxes, inheritance taxes, and so forth, I am going to read to you the proposal which the Ways and Means Committee indersed this morning and decided to present to you for your consideration. These items will be offered separately as committee amendments, and under the unanimous-consent agreement which the House kindly gave, the Ways and Means Committee has the right to recur to any part of the bill that has been passed over. So I am going to start, at the conclusion of this discussion, unless some other gentleman desires to speak, to offer these committee amendments to Title IV. They are open to discussion for adoption or for rejection, and the committee will welcome suggestions from any of the Members of the House, for the sole, burning thought of your committee is to levy taxes to balance the Budget.

The committee recommends that the surtax bracket which now starts at $10,000 commence at $6,000 income, and this will produce $7,000,000 additional revenue.

Under the bill as reported, a corporation with a net income of less than $10,000 was given a $2,000 exemption. The committee recommends reducing that to $1,000.

My friend from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon] suggests that possibly I should not give the amount of the yields, but I think I will give them to you. They may be inaccurate and may have to be checked up. If they prove short, we will propose something else to you.

Repeal of the net losses—these wash sales—$20,000,000

Section 115 (b) dividends, $9,000,000 more. Dividends (section 115 (d)), $2,000,000 more.

Rearranged depletion allowance, $12,000,000 more.

Sales of stock, one-fourth of 1 per cent, but not less than 4 cents per share, estimated to yield $75,000,000. [Applause.] We had an estimate of $125,000,000 on this item, but after conferences with the subcommittee last night, at which I was not present, representatives of the Federal Reserve Bank in New York and some of the officers of the stock exchanges, on account of the volume of business and in the interest of accuracy of estimate, reduced that amount to $75,000,000.

Bond transfers, one-eighth of 1 per cent, $13,000,000.

Capital stock and bonds, issues of (10 cents per $100), $13,000,000.

Conveyances, a tax of 50 cents on each $500 of value in real-estate transfers, the same as the war-time tax on realestate transfers, $10,000,000.

Sales of produce on exchanges, 5 cents per $100-it is now 1 cent and we have raised it to 5 cents—estimated to yield $6,000,000.

The committee recommends changing the exemption on admissions to picture shows, raising it from 25 cents to 45 cents. [Applause.] This will produce $40,000,000. The bill as reported by the committee was estimated to produce $90,000,000.

Now some excise taxes:

Cosmetics, 10 per cent, estimated to yield $25,000,000. [Applause.]

Furs, 10 per cent, estimated yield, $20,000,000-although, to be candid, I fear the amount of this estimate is excessive. Jewelry, 10 per cent, $15,000,000.

Sporting goods and cameras, 10 per cent, $4,000,000.

Beverages, the act of 1921 rates, $11,000,000.

Matches, 4 cents per 1,000, $11,000,000.

Chewing gum, 5 per cent, $3,000,000.

Radios, phonographs, 5 per cent, $11,000,000.

Mechanical refrigerators, $4,500,000.

Automobiles, a rate of 3 per cent on passenger cars, a rate of 2 per cent on trucks, and a rate of 1 per cent on accessories, which will yield $57,000,000.

Yachts, motor boats, and so forth, above value of $15, one-half million dollars.

Gentlemen, this is a negligible amount of money, but the committee felt that inasmuch as they were taxing automobiles and other methods of transportation they should include yachts.

In the original plan we estimated changes in legislation relative to the Postal Service that would save $25,000,000. The committee recommends now that with a little change this will save $27,500,000.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. The reason I suggested a while ago not to give these estimated amounts at this time is justified by this item here. Just a few moments ago I had word from the Post Office Department that you would increase that item from $27,000,000 to $30,000,000, and I would like to say here with respect to many of these items-for instance, the one the gentleman has already suggested with respect to furs-that is being rechecked. Many of these things are substantially correct, but may vary in one way or another to some extent.

Mr. CRISP. I know my friend has the same desire I have to lay the whole proposition before you, giving you all the information we have, and that is why I am reading

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman let me finish this list, and then I shall be pleased to yield. I think the committee would like to have this in full.

Then the committee, as much as it dislikes to do it, forced to the necessity of raising money, recommends to you that the first-class postage be increased from 2 to 3 cents, which will yield $135,000,000. [Applause.]

Now, I think the country expects Congress to reduce the Federal expenditures, and I think the membership of both branches of Congress think that the $4,000,000,000 Budget is excessive, and that it should be reduced, and I think Congress will reduce it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRISP. The subcommittee did not desire to bring in any statement as to the amount that might be saved. They conferred with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, they conferred with some Senators, they conferred with the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, and other employees of the Treasury Department. It is assumed that $243,000,000 can be cut from the Government expenditures. and the Ways and Means Committee will cooperate in every way possible to bring about this reduction, and I believe that the membership of the House on both sides will do that.

It also recommended an excise tax of 5 per cent on candy, estimated to yield $12,000,000. A 10 per cent tax on safety deposit boxes that will yield $1,000,000.

Now, the sum total amounts to $1,293,000,000, or approximately $50,000,000 more than is necessary to balance the Budget.

If you gentlemen accept this program, you balance the Budget. If you strike out any item, which you have a right to do, I appeal to you to give us the benefit of your estimate, your counsel, your aid, in proposing something in lieu of it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In regard to the stock transfers, the gentleman said it would yield $125,000,000. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the correct estimate is $75,000,000.

Mr. CRISP. I thank the gentleman; he is correct. Now, gentlemen, if this program is adopted, it will balance the Budget, and in conclusion may I ask my friends-and I count every man and woman in the House my friend-to please cooperate with me in trying to speed the passage of this bill. We have talked and talked, but talk is not going to change things. The country wants action, and we can serve the country best by speeding up this legislation.

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. PARKS. Has the committee considered the taxing of advertisements, such as in magazines, newspapers, political advertisements, over the radio?

Mr. CRISP. I will say to my friend that the committee did consider it, and there were a multitude of other things considered. In the program given out-and I gave it to the press as I left the committee room—there was a provision relating to affiliated and consolidated returns of 1 cent, but there was no final conclusion as to that. That is reserved for further consideration.

Mr. KVALE. In the consideration of the last committee amendment some of the Members attempted to offer amendments to the amendment offered by the Ways and Means Committee. The chairman then ruled—and properly so that the usual expedient for securing recognition for five minutes by offering a pro forma amendment could not be employed, such pro forma amendments being amendments in the third degree. Debate upon any proposed change in the committee amendment was thus necessarily limited to 10 minutes, of which 5 were consumed by a member of the Ways and Means Committee in opposition.

In many specific instances this made for a deplorable lack of proper understanding of various amendments offered.

To-day, Mr. Chairman, a similar parliamentary situation will exist when committee amendments are offered. Upon some of the items enumerated, important changes in rates of taxation or in classifications may be proposed as amendments to the committee amendments, upon which it might be desired to have more than 10 minutes' debate. Can not some arrangement, temporary, at least, be made along that Mr. CRISP. I hope the House will trust me. I think I have demonstrated fairness all through this bill.

Mr. KVALE. Indeed the gentleman has, and splendidly. Mr. CRISP. Under the rule of the House five minutes debate are allowed for and five minutes against. We have a practice here of moving to strike out the last word and going on and discussing the merits of the amendment. I shall have no disposition to shut off reasonable debate upon these amendments; but after there has been reasonable debate, I think the House ought to back me in a motion to close debate. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Why would it not be advisable, instead of levying a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent on gambling transactions on the stock exchange, which the gentleman says will produce revenue of $75,000,000, to increase that amount to three-quarters of 1 per cent, which would bring in revenue of $225,000,000, or about $150,000,000 more revenue than is now proposed by the committee, and then we would be able to eliminate from the bill the proposal to raise the postage on first-class postage from 2 to 3 cents?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman, I think, is high in his estimate, but in these short sales the gentleman speaks of, there are two sales to make the transaction, and it runs the tax on them up to one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes,

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand the gentleman proposes taxing the transactions on the stock exchanges and the produce exchanges. Am I correct?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Did the gentleman consider taxing transactions on the cotton and grain exchanges?

Mr. CRISP. I think they are all included. I think they should be.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The cotton exchange is not included in the produce exchange.

Mr. CRISP. It ought to be, and there should be an amendment to that effect. I was not on the subcommittee, but I think that ought to be taxed, and I thought it was

Mr. RAGON. It is taxed.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Has any consideration been given to the matter of the desirability of a rule that would permit the consideration of all these amendments en bloc, so as to facilitate the passage of the bill?

Mr. CRISP. There has not been. Personally I do not want a rule. I want the House to have an opportunity to show the world we can transact business under liberal rules.

[Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, you have heard the Speaker of the House, the acting chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, representing the majority, and the distinguished leader of the minority. May I just take a few minutes to express the viewpoint of a very small minority? I agree, and always have, with the plan of raising sufficient revenue to meet the current expenses of the Government. I shall not say "balance the Budget," the phrase coined recently, which has become so catchy, particularly among people who were first responsible for the Treasury deficit and are now seeking to hide their misdeeds and to make the wage earner and working people pay the entire cost of the depression. I have consistently maintained from the time that the first long-term bonds were issued to meet current expenses that we should not pass on to the next generations the blunders of to-day. As far back as July and August the progressives were in correspondence with each other and exchanging views on the question of a revenue bill. I was in correspondence with the distinguished Speaker of the House, and many of the items suggested to-day were included in a tentative plan which I offered.

After exchange of views and a careful study of the fiscal condition of the country I announced to my progressive colleagues in a formal statement the necessity of increasing taxes in order to meet the deficit. I believe it is quite proper that I read at this time a statement which I made on October 4, 1931, and which was, if my memory serves me right, carried in full by the press on that date. At that time, October 4, 1931, I said:

It is obvious that the progressives will have to take the initiative in pulling the country out of debt. The issuance of long-term bonds of $1,000,000,000 to cover the present deficit is indefensible. It is not only bad finances but tends to destroy the very purpose of a Budget system and passes on to the next generation not only the cost of the present governmental expenses but makes the next generation pay for the blunder and incompetency of the present management

Anyone can readily see, with a system of issuing bonds to pay for current expenses and spending public money without limita-tion, how easy it is, particularly on the eve of a national election, to avoid the inevitable necessity of increasing the Government revenue. I am certain that the progressives will not be a party to any such policy.

There seems to be a great deal of timidity on the part of leaders in coming right out and saying that there will be an increase in taxes next year. No one can honestly suggest legislation carrying additional expenditures unless he can first show his ability and willingness to raise the money. As I have stated, borrowing money for current expenses and passing it on to the next generation is not only bad financing, destructive of the Budget and the part of the states of the states of the states of the states. An individual or a corporation downright political dishonesty. An individual or a corporation who would finance its current pay rolls and expenses out of borrowed money would be thrown into bankruptcy, placed into the hands of receivers, and liquidated. We shall not permit our country to be liquidated.

I shall suggest to my progressive colleagues, and I feel confident that we can agree on a policy not to permit the consideration of appropriation bills until we shall have passed the tax bills necessary to raise the revenue. We might permit consideration of one or two appropriation bills, but surely not more, pending preparation of the tax bills. But then, in the interest of sound legislation, we shall suggest deferring all appropriation bills until the tax bills are passed and signed. Such matters are entirely the functions of Congress specifically so delegated by the Constitution.

I intend to present to the progressive group, which will meet in the latter part of November, a complete financial program. Of course, other members of the group will present other programs which may be better than mine. One thing is certain: We will agree on a real, constructive, courageous financial policy for the agree on a real, constructive, courageous mandal policy for the Government. My plan will increase Federal revenues a little over $750,000,000, and this plan does not include certain economies which I will present to the progressive group. I am mailing a copy of my taxation proposals to my progressive colleagues so that they may check the figures and study the proposition before we meet. I will be ready to announce the itemized schedule in a day or so.

Our legislative program will also be considered when we get together in November. I shall submit my proposals within a very

At the same time a complete plan for tax revision was submitted. I then included many special excise taxes necessary to raise revenue. I also included, reluctantly but as a matter of necessity, the suggestion for an increase in firstclass postage. The reason I took first-class postage was that other classes of postage created first-class mail, that it was an easily collectible tax, could not be avoided, and as a source of temporary additional revenue the public could easily adjust themselves to it.

As far back as last August and in my plan of October 4, 1931. I urged increased rates in inheritance taxes with an accompanying gift tax in order to prevent avoidance of the inheritance tax. May I repeat in passing, what I have said so many times, that the gift tax was purposely repealed under the Mellon plan so as to make possible the avoidance of the inheritance tax. I also at the time urged increased income taxes in the higher brackets. I submitted schedules gradually increasing the present rate of income tax which stops at 20 per cent on incomes over $100,000 and I graduated them to 49 per cent on incomes in excess of $2,000,000. While it is quite true that increased income taxes in the higher brackets may not at this time bring the increased revenue normally expected, I submit that it is a necessary tax and that I for one do not hesitate to state that it is a social tax as well as a revenue producer. I have slightly altered the plan proposed last October after the benefit of several months of additional study, calculations, conferences, and additional information.

The differences are very slight. I have suggested a tax on safety-deposit vaults because it is an easy tax to collect and will bring in a few millions of dollars; not a large amount, but, considering the minimum cost of collection, a tax which should now be imposed.

A stock-transfer tax—that is, a percentage tax on all stock transfers-has been under discussion in this House for many years. No one can claim any originality in that. The committee has increased the stamp tax on stock transfers. The committee's recommendation would levy 4 cents a share on each share of stock transferred. Considering the magnitude of the turnover, it would seem that a tax of one-eighth of 1 per cent or one-quarter of 1 per cent on the amount paid for the stock with a minimum of the 4 cents suggested by the committee would be most timely. In the course of the discussion on the substitutes for the sales tax I am certain that some very interesting statements, data, and figures will be given. As I said, the stock-transfer tax has been suggested so long ago and studied for many years there is no reason why it should not be tried out at this time.

Just one word more on the sales tax as being unsuitable for conditions in the United States. I have already referred to a statement made by the Hon. Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury, on December 14, 1931, which is so clear and convincing in opposition to the sales tax that it would seem further argument is unnecessary. Inasmuch as there has been some talk of a compromise exempting food, clothing, and medicines, it might be well to state here that the consideration of this so-called compromise disclosed how far-reaching and involved a sales-tax system is.

For instance, at first blush an exemption of food, clothes, and medicines seemed quite a concession. As I have stated before, I believe two or three times already, after careful analysis of the exemption plan it was found that while a suit of clothes was exempt, the textile, the buttons, the thread, the lining, and everything that went in it would be taxed; while a pair of shoes is exempt, the leather, the sole, the eyelets, the shoestrings would all be taxed. The same with medicine, while the prescription might be exempt, every chemical and component part that went into the prescription would be taxed. This alone will give an inkling of the cumbersome, far-reaching system of a sales tax and the army of Government employees necessary to watch it, control it, and enforce it.

I mention these facts as absolute proof that while the very people who are now criticizing the opponents of the sales tax for having no plans, it was they who last summer were urging the issuance of long-term bonds to meet current expenditures, while I and my fellow progressives as a matter of fact were working and had a complete tax program. The newspapers of October 4, 1931, and, if my memory serves me right, during the summer, are now matters of record, and the news items of those dates containing my declaration of a tax policy and my proposed rates stand as the incontrovertible proof that I and my fellow progressives approached this crisis in a constructive manner.

Perhaps it would be quite proper to read in passing a cordial and friendly letter which I received from the distinguished Speaker of this House, who at the time perhaps did not know that the vicissitudes of politics and life would make him the Speaker of this body. I contacted him because the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Garner] and I have worked very closely together the last 10 years on all matters of taxation. I admired his courage in opposing the first Mellon plan. I admired his frankness and service to the country in exposing the favoritism and the staggering cost to the country on the refunds of taxes that have taken place the last few years. I had always talked freely with the gentleman from Texas on taxation matters and I wrote him at the time, sending my proposed plan, and this is Mr. GARNER's reply:

UVALDE, TEX., October 11, 1931.

Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA, New York City, N. Y.

DEAR MR. LAGUARDIA: I presume your letter of October 6, with inclosures, was a general one and probably you did not expect many replies, but in view of the fact that I am intensely interested in this subject I am going to briefly say that I am in agreement with a good many of your suggestions. I think an exchange of views on this subject would be helpful. I expect to be in Washington the early part of November, and if you should be down there I would like to talk this matter over with you.

With regards and best wishes, I am, very sincerely, yours,

JNO. N. GARNER.

I could call many of my colleagues with whom I have been conferring, in correspondence and in personal talks, on this matter to bear me out in every detail of my work during the congressional recess in connection with this problem; but I do not believe that the misrepresentations, the deliberate lies, and misstatements that are being circulated against me as to my attitude on the tax bill and the necessity of balancing the Budget require any further answer.

The sales tax is objectionable for many, many reasons. First of all, it would place a burden of $660,000,000 on the working people, the wage earners of this country. They can not stand it, and the proponents of this sales tax, in their greed and anxiety and in their belief that they had already saddled this law on the American people, immediately commenced denouncing the income tax law, vilifying Congress, and demanding the repeal of the income tax law. They disclosed their hands. Gentlemen, the friends of the sales tax out of Congress did more to defeat it than the opponents of the sales tax in Congress. In addition to that, imagine over 275,000 manufacturing concerns in this country. Just think of the army of internal-revenue agents necessary to check, investigate, and verify tax returns.

Gentlemen, the mere fact that this House, notwithstanding the pressure, notwithstanding the abuse, notwithstanding that the Committee on Ways and Means came out with a bipartisan recommendation, has been able to thoroughly study, investigate, and repudiate the sales tax stands as the living proof of the success of representative government and the ability of the House of Representatives to act for the best interests of the American people.

This House having, I believe, once, and for a great many years to come, defeated the principle of a general sales tax, as far as I am concerned, I am ready to go along with the committee. Of course, in this instance it is very easy for me to go along, because it so happens that the plans that I recommended and put into the RECORD during the general debate coincide with the plan now offered by the committee. I shall support every one of the items suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, and gentlemen must know that some of them are going to be very unpopular in my city. I am going to get it coming and going; there is no doubt about that. My friend from New York says that I deserve it, and perhaps I do. But no matter what happens to me, I am willing to pay the price for having taken an unimportant part in the defeat of one of the most vicious plans of taxation ever devised, brought here as a result of misrepresentation, and I refer to the sales tax.

I want now to say a word of appreciation of the Speaker and of the majority floor leader, in having given us the opportunity which for 15 years we have been trying to obtain in this House, and that is the opportunity of discussing and considering a revenue bill without a gag rule from the Committee on Rules. [Applause.] Gentlemen can not commence to realize what that means. Of course Wall Street is smarting under it. Do gentlemen realize that this is the first time in many years that a revenue bill or a tariff bill has been considered by the House of Representatives and not controlled from the outside? My colleagues the other day suggested bringing in a rule, and I say this demonstrates that it is possible to legislate without the duress of a rule and the limitation which it imposes. Whatever may come out of this bill, and it is going to be a well-balanced bill when it leaves the House, it will have the full confidence of the American people because it was written here in the open [applause], while the suspicion that surrounds the last tariff bill will remain with that bill until it is repealed, for the reason that it was first considered in secret and then brought here under a most unfair gag rule and considered under it. I would not be fair if I did not make that comparison, because the very thing that many of us in this House have been criticising and have been devoting our time and efforts to obtain is the opportunity to legislate as was intended by the mandates which we hold when we come to this House.

Now, I want to assure the committee of my support. I do not know whether one-fourth of 1 per cent tax covers the other half of my proposition, and if it does not I will suggest that we can obtain additional revenue by increasing the one-quarter of 1 per cent to one-half of 1 per cent on all short sales

The Speaker referred to the condition of the market. I want to say that nothing has happened in this country to justify the fall in prices, and it has been repeated so many times that the people of this country understand now that it is not an economic condition, but simply financial manipulation. It is the usual instrument of threat that has been held over Congress so many times and over the President so many times. The President was threatened with that very same thing until he declared for a moratorium. You will remember that when we convened here to ratify the moratorium the same situation and the same conditions were resorted to. When we considered the Reconstruction Finance Corporation legislation again we were told that prices in the security market would go down. A few days after that, with the Glass-Steagall bill, again they said, "We will break the market," and they said, "If you pass this, up will go the market." Gentlemen, that market is under absolute control. Those men who are bearing down the market and using that as a threat to obtain legislation are not patriots. They are not investors. They are not builders. They are the most miserable kind of tin horns, playing with loaded dice, and the country ought to know it. [Applause.]

So fear not what those manipulators may do. This House is now considering a revenue bill. Public assurance was given to the country by a rising vote of our willingness to meet current expenses with current revenue, and that we can do by the time this bill leaves here.

I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that I appreciate the difficulties he has been laboring under. The gentleman from Georgia is so clean, so honest, so pure that he must have believed some of the deceptive statements and misrepresentations that were made to him with reference to the condition of the country and what would happen if we did not take the sales tax. That is out now, and I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that I will stand by the committee and their recommendations announced to the House to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, as one of the humble Representatives in this body who exerted every possible effort within their power to defeat the sales tax. I want to assure the Speaker of the House and the acting chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that we are just as anxious to balance the Budget as they are, and we are glad to know that they are willing to go along with us in our fight to that end.

They say that when we strike out anything, we should substitute something in its place. We have done that. We raised the inheritance taxes and we raised the income taxes in the higher brackets.

Permit me to say to those gentlemen who opposed us that they need not be using any appeals to patriotism. We are just as patriotic as they are. Those of us who fought the sales tax have the same interest in our Government they have, and we are willing to go along and help balance the Budget; and we are going to do it without the imposition of a sales tax.

The slump in the market on yesterday had no connection with the defeat of the sales tax any more than the slump of 1929. That slump was caused by the fact that those in charge of this Government, from an executive standpoint, have failed and refused to put into operation the Glass-Steagall bill, the only bill that has been passed looking to the inflation or expansion of the currency. Until there is an inflation or expansion we will not get any relief, even though you tax the American people to death.

Further, let me say that this fight on the sales tax is an old fight. It is a fight between the masses and the classes that reaches back down through the ages of history, even to the dawn of time. It is a fight that will be waged as long as this Government exists. It is a fight that will be waged "In states unborn and accents yet unknown," and those who do not realize the great fundamental principle, the line of cleavage between those two ideas of government, certainly ought to study history instead of criticizing those of us who opposed it and who helped to bring about its defeat.

In my opinion it was a glorious victory for the American

We have also been working on a plan of taxation to balance the Budget, and almost everything submitted in the plan suggested by the gentleman from Georgia has been approved by those who have been fighting along with us in this cause. There may be some things we do not agree with, but in the main we are willing to go along and help to pass taxation necessary to balance the Budget; but we must maintain that the burden of taxes should be placed where it belongs-that is, on those who are most able to pay.

No: we are not wrecking the Government, but we are saving this Government for the American people when we strike down the attempt to depart from the time-honored system of taxation and to embark upon one that is wholly undemocratic, wholly un-American, in my opinion, and that would ultimately have loaded the great burden of taxation of this Government upon the masses of the American people instead of upon those who are most able to pay.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Now that we are getting together, does not the gentleman think we ought to strike out those two tariff measures on oil and coal?

Mr. RANKIN. Of course. They have no place in this bill. The gentleman knows my position. I have never faltered in my opposition to the tariff.

I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that on the floor of this House I represent America, too. I represent the American people, and so help me God, when it comes to principles I am going to continue to exercise that judgment and to cast those ballots which I think are for the best interest of all the people of these United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chirman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, no one rejoices more than myself in the fact that we seem to be reaching a point in the discussion of this revenue bill where we at least understand each other.

I did not hear all the remarks of our distinguished Speaker, as I was delayed in my office. However, I approve and appreciate that portion of it I heard and fully indorse all he said.

So far as I am concerned-and I am satisfied I voice the sentiment and feelings of those who were associated with me in opposition to certain provisions of the revenue bill, that a unanimous vote could have been had declaring that it was our purpose to balance the Budget and protect the credit of the Government immediately after the vote on the sales tax was taken [applause]—so far as I am concerned I have entertained no other thought nor had any other purpose; in fact, that object has been paramount with me all the while; that is, that the integrity and credit of the Government must be preserved at all hazards. The difference of opinion arose, first, over the question as to the amount necessary to balance the Budget, and, second, as to the best method of raising taxes to pay the necessary Government expenditures and leave no deficit in the

When former tax bills were under consideration, it is a matter of common knowledge that our worthy Speaker, Mr. GARNER, and able majority leader, Mr. RAINEY, flatly refused to accept the estimates of the Treasury Department as a basis for legislation.

But now that the sales tax has been defeated my major objection to the bill has been removed.

The thanks of the House are due to the subcommittee, who for the past few days, has been considering and preparing a substitute for the sales-tax provision, which was stricken from the bill. This substitute, while not wholly satisfactory to anyone, will raise the money claimed to be necessary to balance the Budget and perhaps with as little burden as possible. I regret that the subcommittee thought it necessary to increase the rates on first-class postage, but as this is only to continue for two years and to meet the present emergency, it will perhaps be necessary to leave it in the bill if something less burdensome can not be substituted, which I hope we may be able to do.

It should be distinctly understood that if any harm or injury has been done the country or the stock market, it has been caused by those who have consistently and persistently misrepresented a majority of the Members of the House, endeavoring to give the country the impression that the Budget would not be balanced simply because a majority of the House would not permit certain selfish interests to dictate the taxes that should be imposed and the method by which the Budget should be balanced. It seems they have been determined to rule or wreck the country by false or erroneous statements touching the motives of Members of Congress whom they could not frighten or intimidate; however, most of the press have been fair to the House, and I wish to say to those who have been unfair that they can serve their country better if they will be content with publishing the truth and not misrepresenting or impugning the motives of those with whom they disagree.

When I started my opposition to the sales tax I did not even dream there would be a majority of this House opposed to it, but as the debate progressed the American people were heard from, and, responding to their voice, the House defeated the sales tax.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The most of the vicious propaganda and misinformation has come from William Randolph Hearst, who is one day a renegade Democrat and the next day a renegade Republican.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Undoubtedly, and Mr. Hearst's opposition is motivated by his morbid desire to escape the payment of income tax and saddle upon the American people taxes that he and those in his class should pay.

Mr. DYER. He has never been a Republican.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I want it distinctly understood that I have no criticism of those in this House or elsewhere who conscientiously favor the sales tax, but judging from the correspondence I have recently received—the letters and telegrams of congratulation and commendation from all parts of the country as well as my own district-from manufacturers, merchants, farmers, lawyers, doctors, and people of all occupations and all professions and callings in life, I have not the slightest doubt but that 90 per cent of the American people are unqualifiedly opposed to a sales tax; but that is behind us now and we must look to the future, and I fully concur in what the gentleman from Georgia said this morning when he expressed the hope that we may go forward in the consideration of this bill without acrimony or bitterness and without further impugning anyone's

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Is not a proposed tax on automobiles a sales tax or a manufacturers' tax?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Well, it may be called a manufacturers' tax or an excise tax, but it is not a general manufacturers' tax covering almost every article in common use, as was the sales-tax provision which was stricken from the bill, and we all know that some excise taxes are necessary if we are to balance the Budget. A limited excise tax on a few restricted articles is entirely different from a general

Mr. HASTINGS. Will not the gentleman conclude by expressing the hope that we may proceed with the consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I certainly hope we may do that: but before I conclude there is one other thing I want us all to keep in mind while we are considering the matter of balancing the Budget, and that is that the American people are insistent and determined that we must exercise the most rigid economy and cut all governmental expenses as drastically as can be done consistent with efficient Government service. The taxpayers of this country are not going to submit to increased taxation until we have cut the expenses of the Government to the lowest possible limit.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman regard voting $130,000,000 extra road appropriation at this time as the kind of economy we need?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I shall not attempt to answer that question, because it is not propounded in good faith, and the gentleman knows full well it would take an hour to debate it. However, I will say that in my opinion no appropriation this Congress can make would be more effective in relieving unemployment and more beneficial in its results to all the people than money appropriated for highway building. Now, may I hope that we may proceed speedily to complete this bill and leave no doubt in the minds of the public as to whether or not the credit of the Government is to be protected and maintained.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. Crisp: Page 229, after line 8, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. -. TAX ON TOILET PREPARATIONS, ETC.

"There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by "There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Perfumes, essences, extracts, toilet waters, cosmetics, petroleum jellies, hair oils, pomades, hair dressings, hair restoratives, hair dyes, tooth and mouth washes, dentifrices, tooth pastes, aromatic cachous, toilet soaps, toilet powders, and any similar substance, article, or preparation, by whatsoever name known or distinguished, any of the above which are used or applied or intended to be used or applied for toilet purposes." for toilet purposes."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, just a word. This is an amendment which is expected to yield $25,000,000. Of the one hundred and seventy-odd witnesses who appeared before us, the only one who suggested this tax was Miss Laurette Taylor, and she stated that the women would cheerfully pay this tax, and it would not slow up business.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. This amendment covers the entire field known as cosmetics.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; it is so intended.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And it is on the retail price?

Mr. CRISP. It is on the manufacturers' price.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. But it is intended to be passed on? Mr. CRISP. Of course the gentleman from New York knows that all taxes are passed on if they can be passed on.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will say that this item was also included in my tentative plan.

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentlewoman from California. Mrs. KAHN. I want to say to the acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that speaking for the women of the country there will be no opposition on their part to paying this tax. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. I thank the lady for that contribution.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. In justice to Miss Laurette Taylor, who appeared before the gentleman's committee and about whom the gentleman has seen fit to speak so favorably, may I ask this question? Did not Miss Laurette Taylor suggest the cosmetic tax in lieu of a tax upon the spoken drama?

Mr. CRISP. She appeared before the committee in opposition to any tax on spoken drama.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I shall only speak a few moments. In the last election I ran as a Democrat, was forced into the election in a Republican district, and a number of the constituents in my district, hoping they could trust the Democratic Party again, including the substantial business men of the community, voted for me, and as a consequence I was elected. There are a few others of us northern Democrats who had to fight for our election and who appealed to the intelligence of the country, not to its prejudices.

Now, as a young man I used to play poker, and one of the dictums of the game I played was, "Leave your sympathy with the losers "-

Mr. MANLOVE. Does the gentleman mean to say he has grown past that age?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I admit that. "Leave your sympathy with the losers, but go home with the winners.'

I do not believe in holding any post mortems on the sales tax. I can be very happy now in what has occurred this morning. I want to say that my whole life's training has been to follow the old-established institutions of the country and to follow leadership-organized leadership, authoritative leadership—and when this great old institution, this old Ways and Means Committee, unanimously reported here in favor of the sales tax, with my training and with my discipline, I felt I had to follow them; but when my party wandered away from that old-established leadership and went under the leadership of my socialistic colleague from New York I was very unhappy.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I decline to yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I think that is very unfair, and very

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I was very unhappy, but my wisdom in following the leadership here has been proven in the rebellion in this country against the action of the House-not only in the country but throughout the world as well. Nothing else was to be expected. When you entered socialistic on a program to "soak the rich" you received throughout the country just condemnation. I am glad to see that the House has returned to sanity.

I am going to support the Ways and Means Committee to balance the Budget, as I have done right along. I did not intend to run for reelection this fall. I have served my country a lifetime and I am entitled to a rest. But I have now received a telegram from the people who elected me saying, "We can not spare you now."

I will make the sacrifice for them. I think the class of Democrats that I represent are badly needed on the floor of this House, and so I am going to run again. I am going to continue to stand here and protest against action which divides us into classes and drives us into socialism.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I decline to yield.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, I was one of those who voted for the sales tax, and I did it because I wanted to stand by the committee. I am going to continue to stand by the committee in an organized effort on our side, so that we will be able to bring about a tax bill that will balance the Budget.

I protest against those who would seek now to inject not only partisan politics into the bill but provocative and unfair amendments which will give rise to controversy. Hardly were the speeches of the Speaker and the minority and majority leaders over when the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] rose and said that he would offer something that is bound to give rise to considerable controversy and great difficulty, and again stir up the muddy waters of acrimonious debate in this House.

He said he was going to offer an amendment to increase the tax on transfers of stock in and of short sales on the stock exchange from one-fourth to one-half per cent. warn the gentleman that if he seeks to destroy short selling on the market by the means of taxation he may run afoul of Supreme Court decisions. We can not do away with a certain practice by means of taxing it out of existence. We tried to do away with child labor by taxing the products of child labor and the Supreme Court declared the statute unconstitutional. You can not do by indirection what you dare not or can not do directly.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not discussing the amendment. I hate to do it, but the gentleman is talking about extraneous matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Does the gentleman know that the committee has accepted my plan of taxing transfers?

Mr. CELLER. I said that I am going to stand by the committee, but not if it adopted your plan in toto. I shall oppose a one-half per cent tax on short sales. The present transfer tax is 2 cents per $100. One-half of 1 per cent would be 50 cents, or twenty-five times the present rate. That is ridiculous. Your proposition would defeat its own ends. It would harass and oppress and raise little or no revenue. It would drive business out of the country into Canada. The Montreal exchanges would do a land-office business. Canada would gain. We would lose business and the tax as well.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion that it close now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers to amend the motion that debate close now.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LaGuardia) there were 45 ayes and 36 noes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be permitted five minutes, as he was on the floor and had been recognized?

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Chairman, there are other Members here who desire to speak. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGugin] wants five minutes.

Mr. CRISP. But he was not on the floor, and the gentleman from New York had been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRISP: Page 229, after line 8, insert a new section, as follows:

" SEC. - TAX ON JEWELRY, ETC.

"There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: All articles commonly or commercially known as jewelry, whether real or imitation; pearls, precious and semiprecious stones and imitations thereof; articles made of, or ornamented, mounted, or fitted with, precious metals or imitations thereof or ivory (not including surgical instruments); watches; clocks; opera glasses; lorgnettes; marine glasses; field glasses; and binoculars."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a moment. This is estimated to yield $15,000,000.

Mr. McGUGIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to go along on any kind of a bill that will reasonably balance the Budget, but while we are at it I want to see the record kept straight and clear. The provisions which have been offered by the Ways and Means Committee constitute just another sales tax, and there is no need of covering it up with hypocrisy. The increase in the price of first-class postage by 50 per cent is just another sales tax which is to be paid in every home of the country, provided the occupants of the home can read and write. I know there are probably two of the peerless leaders in this fight against the general sales tax who can probably well represent their constituencies and accept an increase in first-class postage with no great degree of expense upon their constituents, since those who buy postage stamps are usually able to read and write the English language. Let us keep this thing straight. The tax on cosmetics is another sales tax. You call it a luxury tax, but cosmetics are used by the women in this country in all walks of life, down to the poorest girl who works in a restaurant.

Now, let us turn to the automobile. I am too much of a modern-day American to accept the suggestion that the automobile is a luxury and that the people should be especially taxed for buying an automobile. Yet we come in here and especially tax the automobile industry, set it aside and persecute it, when it is one of the key industries of the country.

Even if an article is what you may choose to call a luxury, yet somebody works in the factory that makes that article, and every time you tax it you destroy the demand therefor. There is some poetic justice in this thing. You can not crucify the automobile industry without hurting every man in this country. The steel industry depends upon automobiles, as well as the railroads and every other industry.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Did the gentleman hurt the automobile industry by voting for a tariff on oil? [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. McGUGIN. If you restore the buying power of hundreds of thousands of men engaged in producing oil and coal, then you will reestablish the automobile industry to a large extent.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman refused to help restore the buying power of the many men engaged in the brewing industry.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am willing to restore buying power, but I am not willing to make a scrap of paper out of the Constitution of this Nation in order to do so.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman will admit that the rates proposed to be levied upon automobiles, accessories, and trucks are substantially those which the gentleman supported a few days ago in the blanket sales-tax title of the bill?

Mr. McGUGIN. The point is they are higher, and, what is more, it singles out that industry and places a burden on it not comparable to the burden on other industries.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. RAGON. On automobiles it is three-quarters of 1 per cent higher, but accessories are only 1, so it is a reduction of 1½ per cent. Trucks are at 2, which is one-quarter per cent lower than the other provisions.

Mr. McGUGIN. Strange as it may seem, if you place upon the automobile industry the identical tax which was contained in a general tax, and let all other industries escape that responsibility, you have none the less placed an economic burden upon the automobile industry.

With these remarks I do not care to say a great deal more, except that I want to go along and help balance this Budget. I am going to do it at the end of the road, but I am under no obligation and do not intend to sit in this committee and vote for a special tax on automobiles or for an increase in postage.

There is one thing about which I do want to commend the committee in presenting this last report. I refer to its determination to reduce the expenses of this Government by $230,000,000, as they should be reduced, and when the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] said he was going along with the committee I hope he will remember to go along with the committee when the Economy Committee brings in a bill to reduce the expenses of this Government. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

Page 229, after line 8, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. -. TAX ON FURS

"There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Articles made of fur on the hide or pelt or of which any such fur is the component material of chief value."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, just one word. It is estimated, according to the light we now have, that this amendment will yield $20,000,000 in revenue. We are having that estimate rechecked.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is it plain that this tax is on the finished article rather than on the furs that go through processes from one manufacturer to another? That is important, otherwise there will be confusion.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Ragon] was a member of the subcommittee and heard that testimony, which I did not hear, and I will ask the gentleman from Arkansas to answer the gentleman.

Mr. RAGON. It is on "articles made of fur on the hide or pelt or of which any such fur is the component material of chief value."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, there may be pyramiding of taxes there, which will run away above 10 per cent, if the fur goes through different processes. If the raw fur is given to one man to cure, and then it is passed on to some-body else to do something with it, and there are three or four processes, if not more, before the fur coat, for instance, is completed, there will be pyramiding.

Mr. CRISP. It is on the manufactured price. I see the point the gentleman is making. There may be several manufacturers engaged in that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes. Now, it was clear in the sales tax, but is it clear here?

Mr. RAGON. Well, I do not know. I thought it was. It is the same provision that was in the 1918 tax. It is just a copy of that.

Mr. GARNER. If it is the same provision as in the 1918 tax, it is on the finished product.

Mr. CRISP. It is the same provision.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Would it be much trouble to put something in there to make it clear?

Mr. CRISP. Let us adopt this amendment, and then look it up, and if it is necessary the committee can return to it and offer a perfecting amendment.

Mr. CULLEN. This is practically the same amendment that we had in the sales tax.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. It is an attempt to tax a garment that is made chiefly of fur, and not, for instance, a garment that has some fur trimming on it?

Mr. CRISP. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is clear?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. Carsp: Page 229, after line 8, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. -. TAX ON SPORTING GOODS

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by "There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Tennis rackets, nets, racket covers and presses, skates, snowshoes, skis, toboggans, canoe paddles and cushions, polo mallets, baseball bats, gloves, masks, protectors, shoes and uniforms, football helmets, harness and goals, basket-ball goals and uniforms, golf bags and clubs, lacrosse sticks, balls of all kinds, including baseballs, footballs, tennis, golf, lacrosse, billiard, and pool balls, fishing rods and reels, billiard and pool tables, chess and checker boards and pieces, dice, games and parts of games (except playing cards and children's toys and games); and all similar articles commonly or commercially known as sporting goods."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, it is estimated that this amendment will raise $2,500,000 of revenue.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question in regard to furs, jewelry, and sporting goods?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. In the event of the importation of either or all of those articles is the tax placed on the articles plus the import duty when they are sold in this country?

Mr. CRISP. There are no special tariff taxes in this amendment. This is an excise tax, and it is levied on the manufacturer, producer, or importer when he sells these articles, and the tax all goes to the United States Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

" SEC. -. TAX ON RADIO RECEIVING SETS, ETC.

"There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold: Chassis, cabinets, tubes, reproducing units, power packs, and phonograph mechanisms, suitable for use in connection with or as part of radio receiving sets or combination radio and phonograph sets (including in each case parts or accessories therefor sold on or in connection therewith or with the sale thereof), and records for phonographs. A sale of any two or more of the above articles shall, for the purpose of this section, be considered a sale of each separately."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the Treasury Department estimates that this amendment will yield $11,000,000.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CRISP. I yield.
Mr. DYER. This, of course, is another one of the sales taxes included in these amendments? Is not that correct? Mr. CRISP. May I say to my friend: Cock Robin is dead; let him stay dead? [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, the estimate of revenue from this amendment is negligible, only $500,000; but the committee felt as it was levying an excise tax on other methods of transportation, in equity there should be a levy on boats.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the committee regretted the necessity of having to recommend the levying of a tax on automobiles, trucks, and so forth, but they found themselves in the difficulty that they did not see how they could avoid it unless they brought in a recommendation for a tax on gasoline, for a tax on bank checks, or an increased tobacco tax. The committee thought this was less burdensome, less retarding to the recovery of business than any other, and they have recommended it. It is reduced from the percentages recommended by the Treasury Department in their original recommendation, and it is estimated to produce $57,000,000.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Can the gentleman tell the committee what the loss of revenue would be on passenger cars if the rate were reduced from 3 per cent to 21/4 per cent?

Mr. CRISP. I have not the figures.

Gentleman, let me see if we can get an agreement as to time

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CRISP. Yes.
Mr. PARKS. In levying this tax are you levying it at the factory or at the retail dealer's establishment?

Mr. CRISP. At the factory. It is on the wholesale price. Mr. PATTERSON. But, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me, I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas that this is one tax that will be passed on to the consumer. I think the gentleman from Georgia will admit that this iniquitous tax is one that will be passed on to the consumer, and could not there be some way found to exempt cars of the lower price?

Mr. CRISP. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that the committee felt it would not be justified in exempting the lower-priced cars. The man who buys a highprice car pays a much higher tax. If I buy a car that costs $500, I pay a 3 per cent tax on that, or $15. If the gentleman buys a car that costs $5,000 and pays 3 per cent, he is paying $150 of tax. If we exempt the low-priced cars we lose your revenue. There are more of the low-priced cars sold than the higher ones, and if we exempt them we lose what we are seeking in the interest of the country-taxes.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the gentleman will permit one other observation, the automobile, and especially the lowpriced automobile, is in no way a luxury.

Mr. CRISP. I have not called it a luxury.

Mr. PATTERSON. I know the gentleman has not, and I hate to see this tax imposed.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Did the committee consider what the loss would be if automobiles, say of $500 or $600 or less, were exempted from this tax?

Mr. CRISP. I did not sit with the subcommittee, because I could not stay on the floor and be there also, but I know when we had the matter up at first the Treasury Department said that if we exempted the low-priced cars we would practically lose all our revenue. I can not answer the gentleman specifically as to that matter.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BACHMANN. What is the difference in the amount of tax that will be received under this provision and the amount that would have been raised if the sales-tax provision had carried?

Mr. CRISP. Under the sales-tax provision there would have been levied a manufacturers' tax of 21/4 per cent on automobiles. This bill levies a 3 per cent tax on passenger cars, which is three-fourths of 1 per cent more than the sales tax. The sales tax levied 21/4 per cent on trucks and this bill only levies 2 per cent on trucks. The sales tax levied 21/4 per cent on accessories and this bill only levies 1 per cent.

Now, as to the amount of money that will be raised. I can not answer.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

Mr. Chairman, before we leave section 601 I rise to make a few observations regarding a portion of the bill to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, which has a very direct and important bearing upon the economic relations between the United States and the Philippine

I desire to invite the attention of the House to a provision in this section which would establish a new precedent in the policy hitherto followed by the United States in her dealings with insular possessions and would nullify certain provisions which now obtain in the tariff act of 1930.

I respectfully ask attention, particularly of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, to section 601, paragraph (c):

The tax imposed under subsection (b) shall be levied, ass The tax imposed under subsection (b) shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as a duty imposed by the tariff act of 1930, and shall be treated for the purposes of all provisions of law relating to the customs revenue as a duty imposed by such act, except that—

(1) The value on which such tax shall be based shall be the dutiable value (under sec. 503 of such act) of the article, plus the customs duties, if any, imposed thereon under any provision of

(2) For the purposes of section 489 of such act (relating to additional duties in certain cases of undervaluation) such tax shall not be considered an ad valorem rate of duty or a duty based upon or regulated in any manner by the value of the article;
(3) Such tax shall not be imposed upon any article imported prior to the date on which this title takes effect;

(4) No drawback of such tax (except tax paid upon the importation of an article described in subsection (d) (4)) shall be allowed under section 313 (a), (b), or (f) of the tariff act of 1930 or any provision of law allowing a drawback of customs duties on articles manufactured or produced with the use of duty-paid materials;

(5) Such tax shall be imposed in full, notwithstanding any provision of law or treaty granting exemption from or reduction of duties to products of any possession of the United States or of any country; and

(6) When he deems such action to be in the interest of the revenue, the Secretary may direct that such tax with respect to any class of articles designated by him shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law as the tax imposed by subsection (a).

Note especially the words of subsection (5), which says:

Such tax shall be imposed in full, notwithstanding any provision of law or treaty granting exemption from or reduction of duties to products of any possession of the United States or of any is whether or not you can by this revenue legislation nullify provisions of existing treaties to which the United States is a signatory. On this point I am not going to dwell at length.

I am more concerned with the principle involved in our tariff and fiscal relations.

Section 301 of the present tariff act expressly provides reciprocal trade arrangements between the United States and the Philippines, and yet you have, inadvertently, I believe, left in section 601 this provision which, to the extent that tax is imposed upon imports coming to the United States, would nullify the administrative provisions, especially section 301 of the tariff act of 1930, commonly known as the Hawley-Smoot Act.

That this interpretation is correct finds corroboration in the report of the committee, for on page 35 there is a paragraph which closes with these words:

• • and provisions of law exempting products of the various insular possessions from duty shall not be applicable with respect to the tax.

Mr. Chairman, it ought to be known by the membership of this House that in all the 30 and more years of relationship between the United States and the Philippines, Congress has never felt constrained to levy any tax upon Philippine products for the purpose of augmenting the funds of the Government of the United States. With this provision left intact the United States would be establishing a precedent in her policy, procedure, and practice in dealing with the Philippine Islands.

Taxes could be imposed on certain imports of the Philippines for the first time for the express purpose of augmenting the revenue of the United States or helping salvage the deficit in the Treasury of the Government.

I am not voicing a complaint. I am not airing a grievance. Nor am I speaking in stubborn opposition. I simply wish to call the attention of the membership and the leadership of this House to the policy and principle involved.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSIAS. I yield. Mr. CRISP. In view of what the United States has done for the Philippine Islands, when the United States is taxing its own people to meet an emergency, why should the Filipinos be excepted? [Applause.]

Mr. OSIAS. The gentleman has just heard me say that I am not voicing a complaint or airing a grievance, but I am simply calling attention to the fact that it will be the first time in the history of our relations that this will be Congress has the power, it has the authority to decide what policy should be pursued, and as a representative of my people I can say that we shall abide by whatever policy may be determined upon by the sovereign American Government. After I have called the attention of the Members of the Ways and Means Committee to the facts, after I have apprised the Members of this House of the effect of the pertinent provisions of this measure, if Congress should decide to tax us I want to assure the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that the Filipinos will bear the tax manfully.

We, the Filipinos, realize that this country is confronted with an emergency. We sympathize with your affliction because of the extraordinary deficit which must be met. We are aware of the necessity of balancing your Budget and the maintenance of your credit unimpaired. We shall consider the payment of such tax as may be imposed as our modest contribution to the Treasury of the United States to achieve these laudable ends.

This will not be the first occasion that you will find the Filipinos comporting themselves in this manner. When America decided to participate in that awful and bloody drama of world proportions, my people disciplined themselves so as to lighten America's burdens and in order not to embarrass her in the eyes of the world.

Through our Philippine Legislature we made known to the Government and people of the United States our loy-

The first point that should address itself to the committee | leadership of Hon. Manuel L. Quezon, a former member of this body, a militia act was passed. By that law we cast in our lot with you in that World War that tried men's souls. We oversubscribed our quota of the Liberty bonds. We gave till it hurt to the Red Cross and other activities calculated to advance the cause espoused by the United States and her Allies. We not only offered of our limited means, but 25,000 of the flower of Filipino manhood volunteered for service that theirs may be the honor and privilege of fighting side by side with American soldiers in that war for democracy, for the right of countries, great and small, to be self-governing and free.

> If we were ready then to give of our wealth and our lives to assist America, we should not begrudge in her present travail to bear some tax levy. In the confident belief that this present Congress will act on the bill that shall grant our independence, I wish to say on my official responsibility that the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, now as in the past, will cheerfully shoulder their rightful share in balancing your Government's Budget and maintaining American credit unimpaired. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to. Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks that would be proper at this time.

Mr. OSIAS. I ask to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman may

Mr. OSIAS. I wish, in closing, to assure the membership of the House that if Congress should, in its wisdom, decide to retain this provision in the bill, you will not hear the Filipinos complaining or find them stubbornly opposing. We have been privileged to share in the glory that was America's in her days of prosperity. As a people we should be willing to bear our share in your adversity. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. I want to say to the gentleman that before long Congress will grant independence to the Filipino people. so that this will not matter so much.

Mr. OSIAS. I thank the gentleman from Missouri. He knows, of course, that my chief mission here is to bring that about.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the delay of the last few days has produced wonderful results. It is fine to think that finally we have come to a point where it appears very probable that we can proceed in an orderly manner to balance the Budget. [Applause.]

I want particularly to take the time to say that I, as one of the subcommittee, appreciate the assistance that has been rendered to us and to the country by the address of our able Speaker, the gentleman from Texas, when he took the floor this morning. [Applause.]

During the 15 years or more of my service on the Ways and Means Committee there is no man that I have had more acrimonious debates with than I had with our Speaker, and at the same time I have always respected his views, and I take it that he has given me that same element of credit for sincerity.

Therefore when he comes before the House as the Speaker of the entire House and asks us as Representatives of the American people to back the Ways and Means Committee in the report we made here this morning, I, for one, want to take off my hat in compliment to him for the service he has rendered to the American people. [Applause.]

Now we have come to one other disputed item in this bill. The automobile industry came before the Ways and Means Committee and particularly asked us to exclude from the alty and readiness to cooperate. Under the courageaus bill the original tax item that had been suggested to the committee. The committee has followed their suggestion and that of many other special interests. Their argument was that the automobile industry is representative of the loyalty of the American citizen, and that all they asked was to be treated exactly like other people will be treated in a tax bill.

In reaching our decision to include many of the items that would raise a small tax on the automobile that will bring in a revenue of $57,000,000 into the Treasury in assisting to balance the Budget, we ask that industry to-day to show the same interest and loyalty as they professed to show when we were considering a manufacturer's tax. [Applause.]

There is no one item in American industry that, to our mind, can better carry that slight burden than can that great industry, spread out as it will be over hundreds of thousands of owners of automobiles.

We have reduced the rate on trucks and accessories. To my mind, if we were going to increase it at all, it should be the item of heavy trucks. They are destructive to the highways, they take freight from the railroads, they are unpopular on the road, and we are furnishing them with a free right of way throughout the country to carry on their business.

I do not think the automobile industry can rightfully complain of the action of the Ways and Means Committee in relation to this provision as to trucks.

Mr. CLANCY. Why should they not complain of this discriminatory tax?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is not a discriminatory tax in any sense of the word. In no sense can it be discriminatory, and that is proved by the fact that when you go down town in any city in the country, as in Washington, you are not able to find a place to park your car. So far as the rates on trucks and parts are concerned, they are less than those in the manufacturers' title.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do not want to be placed in the position of retarding action that will balance the Budget, because I have stood with the Ways and Means Committee throughout the consideration of this bill in its efforts to balance the Budget in a safe and sensible manner. However, in justice to the great automobile industry which means so much in the industrial life of the Nation, which is domiciled largely in the State which I have the honor to represent in part in this body, I must enter a protest against this discriminatory tax. That industry never has objected to paying its full proportionate share of the taxes of the country. We do not object now. We realize that the Budget must be balanced, because the stability of our country and all its institutions depends upon such action. Hundreds of thousands of men and women from every crossroad to the center of our largest city depend for livelihood upon the automobile industry. The very prosperity of the country depends more, possibly, on the return of prosperity to the automobile industry than on any other single industry. The automobile leaders came to Washington, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, placed all their cards on the table, and promised fullest cooperation to bring about economic recovery, and stated clearly that any additional tax placed on the industry could not be absorbed but must be passed on to the purchaser. Therefore, be it understood that whatever the tax is, the consumer will pay it.

Something over an hour ago the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee announced that this amendment would be offered. No opportunity has been given to the industry to consult the committee in reference to proposed rates, and this again demonstrates the fallacy of an effort to write a tax bill on the floor of the House. These matters should all be referred to the committee for deliberate consideration. The Treasury bill originally submitted proposed a tax of 5 per cent but the committee in its wisdom, after proper deliberations, concluded that this industry meant so much in the life of the Nation that the purposes which we are all seeking would be best subserved at this time by not inflicting punishment upon an industry simply because this might prove an easy way of raising money.

It is true that the spokesman for the industry appeared before the committee when the last excise tax was removed and patriotically stated that if the tax at that time was necessary to the balancing of the Budget that the industry would not want the tax removed. In those days the country was prosperous; the industry was prosperous. Owing to the demand, manufacturers could not keep up production. A different picture presents itself to-day. Dividends have been curtailed. All extravagances have been eliminated. Profits have almost reached the vanishing point. The owner of the stock is sacrificing for the benefit of the man who must have his bread and butter from the operation of the plant. A few more straws will break the camel's back. If necessary, any one industry had better be broken than to break the country; but this is not necessary, and this injustice to any one group will have its effect throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Call it what you want, this proposed amendment places a sales tax on automobiles, trucks, and accessories. The loudest opposition to the manufacturers' sales tax came from people who feared that we are setting a precedent; that the country would find that a sales tax was a painless tax; and that, because of the easiness of the collection, the amount would be increased and possibly more painful forms of taxation would be done away with. They were opposed to the principle of a sales tax. Therefore they must for the same reason be opposed to this tax. Pursuing the same logic, let us say that this is put putting the nose of the camel under the tent, and when more money is needed the easy thing to do will be to raise the tax on automobiles.

I realize that we must have money to balance the Budget, and I am just as sure that the items suggested this morning, which are to take the place of the manufacturers' sales tax which has been eliminated on the floor of the House, will fall more heavily upon the backs of the average consumer than would the taxes provided in the manufacturers' schedule. Picking out specific industries to bear the burden is un-American and unfair, and I predict that those who are responsible for striking out the manufacturers' tax and thereby inflicting these excise taxes will hear from the people back home if the law ever becomes effective.

Let me repeat that the automobile manufacturers do not want to do anything to impede the passing of legislation to balance the Budget, and one familiar with the attitude of the majority in this body since the last-minute appeal of the Speaker realizes that from now on there will be little discussion on any amendments offered, and that we will accept the recommendations of the Ways and Means Committee without any change. Under the parliamentary situation, in the main this course is necessary, but let us not forget that in voting for these rates we are not voting the deliberate judgment of the Ways and Means Committee, but that we are accepting makeshifts inspired by necessity. This will not be a balanced bill when written, but this seems to be the only way that results are obtainable. The reaction of the country to the proceedings in the House during the last few days is forcibly expressed in a telegram which I have just received from Mr. Alvan Macauley, president of the Packard Motor Car Co., of Detroit. Mr. Macauley says:

The upset in Congress last week was probably the greatest discouragement industry and business has suffered since 1929. It came just as there was a definite hope that the impetus of spring buying would start industry and business on the upturn. Unless the situation is stabilized by sane thinking and temperate action, and promptly, prosperity will be postponed indefinitely.

I want to appeal to you that we think sanely, that our action be temperate, to the end that justice be done to all industry, and that the Budget may be promptly balanced.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, like a bolt of lightning from a clear sky the House Ways and Means Committee to-day recommended a heavy automobile sales tax amounting to $57,000,000 about 1 o'clock and about an hour later announced the vote was under way and that only 10 minutes would be allowed to those of the 435 Members of the House who might want to make speeches against the taxes.

By a gag rule also no debate was allowed on important amendments which were made to the tax.

The protesting Members were not even furnished a copy of the proposed legislation so that they might make intelligent amendments, and this procedure was in violation of a long-established practice of the House. Speaker Garner and other leaders on both sides of the House appealed to the House in ringing and sensational statements to support the program of the Ways and Means Committee which shortly would be announced and which was announced at 1 o'clock.

Those of us who fought vigorously against the proposal of the Treasury Department for discriminatory taxes against the automotive industry won a partial victory, because the Ways and Means Committee recommended that the Treasury Department proposals be cut from 5 per cent to 3 per cent on passenger automobiles, from 3 per cent to 2 per cent on trucks, and from  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent to 1 per cent on parts, tires, and accessories. The Treasury Department estimated that its higher proposals would bring in about \$120,000,000, so that by the splendid fight which the friends of the automotive industry made against the Treasury proposals a saving of \$63,000,000 per year to users of autos and trucks was achieved.

The battle is not over yet. Probably the friends of the automotive industry will wage a terrific battle in the Senate.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who is in charge of the bill, announced that his latest proposals, plus those already in the bill, aim to bring in $1,293,000,000. He also states that this amount is $50,000,000 in excess of the needs of the Budget.

Therefore, a part, or indeed all, of these three taxes on parts, trucks, and passenger cars could be safely stricken out and yet the bill would balance the Budget.

Probably in the heat of the debate to-day unfair statements have been made about these auto taxes.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] charges that the tax is not discriminatory, when it is very plainly so, and the automotive industry is singled out as the only means of transportation for levying a sales tax.

The leaders of the automotive industry are probably more enterprising, more public spirited, and more patriotic than the leaders of any other industry.

Although they represent the key industry of the country and the one which is doing the most to aid in a revival of business and the bringing back of prosperity, they said they would bear their share of general taxation, although the automobile is already the heaviest-taxed commodity in this

The automotive leaders patriotically withheld any opposition to the manufacturers' sales tax because that tax was not discriminatory and that bill assessed a sales tax on freight and passenger railroad cars and locomotives, freight and passenger vessels, freight and passenger airplanes, buggies, wagons, bicycles, motor cycles, and so forth.

How can the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Treadway] say that to-day's proposals are not discriminatory under these circumstances, when they do single out the automotive industry and do not assess a tax on its competitors in the field of transportation?

Two gentlemen, Mr. Treadway and Mr. Ragon, say there should be no complaints from the automotive industry, because they did not complain against the manufacturers' sales tax, which taxed autos, trucks, and parts 2½ per cent, and they are not willing to admit that that was an entirely different sort of legislation—different in theory and different in execution—and to this extent not unfair and discriminatory.

In the rush and confusion of a hectic day, with only a few minutes of debate allowed, they mislead the Members of the House to a considerable degree, and they do not give the opportunity to the friends of the automotive industry to clarify the issues,

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Carsp] in presenting the Crisp amendments explains that the new tax on yachts and motor boats, and so forth, is levied because it is a form of transportation, and he speaks of a tax being levied on automobiles as a form of transportation.

Thus, probably unconsciously, he places the stigma on the automotive industry of being a luxury or semiluxury, because he classes it with pleasure yachts and motor boats, most of which are luxuries, although some of them are engaged in business and providing the necessities of life, such as in the fishing industry and the ferrying business.

But most yachts and motor boats are known as luxuries or semiluxuries.

This stigma of being classed as a luxury or semiluxury is what the automotive industry has fought against most vigorously.

Mr. Crisp says there is a working leeway and surplus in this bill of $50,000,000. When I led the movement beginning in 1923 to kill the war excise auto sales taxes, the House first opened its mind to the principle that the parts tax is a misfortune tax, as when a man breaks an axle or destroys any part of his car he must pay a tax on his misfortune to replace the part.

The House was also willing to admit that a tax on trucks was highly unjustifiable, because it is a tax on the truck of the grocer, the butcher, and the farmer. The House admitted in the manufacturers' sales tax that it did not want to tax foods and exempted foods from the bill, but a tax on these trucks which carry and produce food is a cost which is added to the price of the food, and is, therefore, a tax on food.

I object to the haste and turmoil with which the committee has considered this bill. I understand that yesterday the bill contained an exemption on trucks of 1½ tons, under which is the truck of the farmer, grocer, and butcher, but to-day when the bill is presented that exemption is stricken out, and to-day the tax on passenger autos is raised from 2½ per cent of yesterday to 3 per cent.

If Congress considers the auto as a shining target to cripple with still heavier taxes when it is already the heaviest taxed of all commodities and especially of transportation agencies, then it would be an incentive for States, counties, and cities in this country to leap forward with more tax proposals on the auto industry.

Other hard-pressed countries looking for additional taxes will probably follow the example of the American Congress in singling out for discriminatory taxes the automotive industry.

I am confident the automotive industry will fight and fight desperately the discriminatory auto tax.

I started in 1923 the successful fight to kill the heavy war excise auto sales tax, and Congress finally killed these taxes. For the same reasons which impelled me to lead that fight in 1923 I am going to oppose this auto sales tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman

Mr. CLANCY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. If the sales tax had been adopted, the average person who drives a Ford car would have been taxed $6. Now, if he buys a Ford car, under this tax, he will pay a tax of $15, will he not?

Mr. CLANCY. Fifteen dollars, yes; under to-day's bill. Now, gentlemen, the captains of automotive industry are risking their fortunes in their efforts to restore business. Henry Ford is putting $300,000,000 into his present drive. He claims he will put up his entire fortune to restore business. Other auto manufacturers are doing this, but with lesser money, of course. The farm organizations of the country want to see the return of prosperity. They are absolutely opposed to this tax.

I do criticize the manner in which this measure is brought in. We have a few speeches to-day at noon and then within the space of an hour or two the question is up for a vote. The industry is not given a chance to express its views at all. You certainly are imposing this tax in an unfair, unjust, and discriminatory manner.

Mr. FULLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLANCY. I yield.

Mr. FULLER. I think the gentleman made a mistake in his answer to the gentleman from South Dakota, because under the sales-tax provision they would pay 2¼ per cent, and under this tax they would only pay 3 per cent, so there would only be a difference of three-quarters of 1 per cent.

Mr. CLANCY. I said, or meant, the present proposed 3 per cent tax would mean $15 on a $500 Ford, if there be such an exact-priced Ford.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the

I appreciate what the two gentlemen from Michigan have said about the automobile situation; but as was suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Fuller], I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Clancy] misspoke himself in answer to the gentleman from South Dakota or perhaps gave an answer that he did not intend to give—that the tax on a Ford automobile under the sales tax would be $6 and under this amendment it would be $15.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I think I misspoke myself. I should have said the ordinary automobile rather than a Ford.

Mr. RAGON. In any event, there would not be that difference, because the sales tax provided 21/4 per cent, and the present rate is 3 per cent.

In 1928 we considered this question, and Mr. Graham, an outstanding automobile man, said to the Committee on Ways and Means, "We want this $60,000,000 wiped out; but if that means involving the United States Treasury in a deficit, then we say to you as automobile manufacturers, leave the rates in the bill as they are."

Now, if that was the attitude of the automobile industry in 1928, as spoken by their accepted representative, Mr. Graham, what, I ask you, ought to be the attitude of that industry in this time of great disaster and distress?

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. The question is whether the 3 per cent tax proposed by this amendment would apply on exactly the same base as the 21/4 per cent proposed in the manufacturers' sales tax, and if not, what is the difference?

Mr. RAGON. This applies on the wholesale price of the automobile at the factory, and, as I recall it, that is just exactly as the 21/4 per cent applied.

Now, I say to you that after we had the automobile hearings on the proposal by the Treasury Department to levy a 5 per cent tax upon automobiles, we went into the consideration of the manufacturers' excise tax, and not a single telegram of protest came to a member of that committee from the automobile people after they once learned that  $2\frac{1}{4}$  was to be the rate that was to be put on instead of 5 per cent.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. Now, with all due respect to my good friend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], for whom I have the greatest admiration, his voice is the only voice, save and except the voice of his colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Clancy], that I have ever heard raised against this 3 per cent tax upon the automobile industry.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. No one knew anything about it until an hour ago.

Mr. RAGON. The 2¼ per cent tax was announced over 10 days ago and not a single word has been uttered by the automobile industry or any of you gentlemen upon the floor, but now, when the Ways and Means Committee is in desperate straits for taxes to balance the Budget, this protest is made. What does balancing the Budget mean to the automobile industry in this country? Now, since we have found it necessary to impose this tax, when it increases their tax three-quarters of 1 per cent, my friends from the automobile States then become very active.

Now, I say to you frankly we can not pass any tax that will balance this Budget, that will be popular.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGON. I do not believe if you would leave this open for 10 days you would get any great protest from the large manufacturers of automobiles.

Mr. BOILEAU. I would like to add my voice to that of my colleague from Michigan, that we are opposed to this 3 per cent tax.

Mr. WHITE. And I also.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment to strike out 3 per cent and insert in lieu thereof 2¼ per cent, as provided in the report of the committee when they brought this matter out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman intend to increase the tax on trucks from 2 to 3 per cent?

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order. I understood that all time has expired on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. PARKS. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to ask the Clerk to report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Michener to the committee amendment: In paragraph (b) of the committee amendment, strike out "3 pcr cent" and insert in lieu thereof "21/4 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Stafford) there were—ayes 16, noes 142.

So the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out "and accessories, 1 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Clancy to the committee amendment: Strike out of the committee amendment "Parts or accessories for any of the articles enumerated in subsection (a) or (b), 1 per cent."

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLANCY. Is debate allowable on my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Clancy) there were—ayes 22, noes 123.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. White: After the word "automobiles," insert "except automobiles of which the manufacturers' price is $500 or less," and after "trucks" insert "except trucks of which the factory price is less than $500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from

The amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, these are the only committee amendments which have been drafted. This morning it was practically 12 o'clock before the committee could reach a conclusion as to what they were going to recommend. Therefore it will be impossible for me at this juncture to offer further committee amendments, so I ask that we return to the part of the bill where we left off reading yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be the regular order, the Chair thinks. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Basis for depletion-

(1) General rule: The basis upon which depletion is to be allowed in respect of any property shall be the adjusted basis provided in section 113(b) for the purpose of determining the gain vided in section 113(b) for the purpose of determining the gain or loss upon the sale or other disposition of such property, except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection.

(2) Discovery value in case of mines: In the case of mines discovered by the taxpayer after February 28, 1913, the basis for depletion shall be the fair market value of the property at the date of discovery or within 30 days thereafter, if such mines were not acquired as the result of purchase of a proven tract or lease, and if the fair market value of the property is materially disproportionate to the cost. The depletion allowance based on discovery value provided in this paragraph shall not exceed 50 per cent of the net income of the taxpayer (computed without allowance for depletion) from the property upon which the discovery was made, except that in no case shall the depletion allowance be less than it would be if computed without reference to discovery value. Discoveries shall include minerals in commercial quantities contained within a vein or deposit discovered in an existing mine or mining tract by the taxpayer after February 28, 1913, if the vein or deposit thus discovered was not merely the uninterrupted extension of a continuing commercial vein or deposit alrepeted extension of a continuing commercial vein or deposit already known to exist, and if the discovered minerals are of sufficient value and quantity that they could be separately mined and marketed at a profit.

(3) Percentage depletion for oil and gas wells: In the case of off and gas wells the allowance for depletion shall be 27½ per cent of the gross income from the property during the taxable year. Such allowance shall not exceed 50 per cent of the net income of the taxpayer (computed without allowance for depletion) from the property, except that in no case shall the depletion allowance be less than it would be if computed without reference to this paragraph.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

to this paragraph.

Amendment offered by Mr. Mansfield: Amend paragraph 3 of section 114, on page 83, by inserting the word "sulphur," in line 21, after the word "for" and before the word "oil," and by inserting the word "sulphur," in line 22, after the word "of" and before the word "oil."

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this amendment is to place sulphur in the same category with oil and gas. These substances are mined in the same manner; they come from the same geological formations in the earth, and there is no reason why there should be any distinction between the three mineral substances.

It does not in any sense of the word reduce the tax upon the sulphur industry, but, on the other hand, it will have a tendency to increase it to a certain extent because the producers of sulphur are allowed these depletions anyway. However, it puts those engaged in the sulphur industry to the great expense, time, and trouble of presenting their data before the Bureau of Internal Revenue. It also puts the Bureau of Internal Revenue to the expense of investigating and reporting upon these matters. In every instance since the law of depletion has been in effect they have allowed to the sulphur producers a greater percentage of depletion than the 271/2 per cent that is allowed as a matter of law to the oil and gas industry. If you will read the section to which this amendment applies you will observe that the producers of oil and gas are granted a depletion allowance of 271/2 per cent. Mining is a business of wasting assets; its capital stock is continually being depleted and destroyed and, therefore, it is obviously entitled to a depletion allowance, and the law so recognizes. All of our revenue laws have recognized that fact.

The justification for and the fairness of the amendment exists in these simple obvious facts, which, I trust, will be carefully considered by the committee.

Sulphur, oil, and gas originate in and are mined from the same geological formations. They are mined by wells. They all occur in the same geological structures. In addition to that they are all valued at the well as soon as they are brought from the earth. They have their market value right upon the ground without any further processing or anything of that kind.

I am offering the amendment particularly because all of the sulphur produced in the United States is produced in the district which I represent in Congress. I will state that it also constitutes 86 per cent of the sulphur production of the entire world.

I feel that no one should object to this amendment. I realize the imperative necessity of increasing the Government's revenue at this time, and if I thought that this amendment would reduce the tax on the sulphur industry, I would not propose it. As a matter of fact, the depletion allowances heretofore granted to the producers of sulphur have always exceeded the 271/2 per cent.

I sincerely hope that the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], will consider this matter. I am sure if they do so they will not object to this amendment.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think the important thing the gentleman from Texas is trying to bring out is the necessity of something definite.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Something definite; yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. The idea of having a depletion that may be 50, 75, or a lower figure is indefinite. It places it in the hands of the officials of the Treasury Department, whereas gas and oil wells should have something definite.

I think the gentleman is correct in asking for some definite figure, so that there need not be any lack of knowledge as to just what the companies are facing.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The gentleman is entirely correct; and the figure is less than that which has been allowed, after investigation, in every instance.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say I do not see why sulphur should be treated differently from oil and gas. I am also candid enough to say I am not familiar with the rules and regulations with respect to depletion under the income tax law as they are enforced, and, of course, I assume they are enforced in accordance with the law. I have always heard that the mineral interests on account of depletion, and so forth, really pay less taxes to the Government than any other industry. I myself opposed any organic changes in these depletion provisions in the committee on this bill without having given those interested in the industry an opportunity to be heard.

Those engaged in this industry have conflicting views, and I did not think it was wise or fair for the committee, after the hearings were closed, and without any further hearing, to basically change these laws. I hope the committee later will have a chance to have hearings on these matters, and if these provisions need tightening up in the interest of the taxpayer I hope legislation to that effect may be reported to the House.

I may say that about all the changes in the administrative features in this bill, with one exception, are to tighten up loopholes and retain money in the Treasury. There is one provision relating to estate taxes, which I shall discuss when it comes up, that has the opposite effect.

I am not myself going to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. Coming from the center of the world's greatest zinc and lead mining district, I am somewhat familiar with the provisions of the discovery and depletion clauses, and I want to thank the gentleman for the statement he has made. I hope the House will go along with the leader in this matter because of the fact that this is a question that requires a great deal of study and consideration before anybody can have a real conception of what it means. I hope we may postpone the consideration of this matter until some later time when it can be thoroughly discussed.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, may I say while we are on this matter that Mr. Lambertson has just sent me a note that he has just heard from the New York exchanges and they have reacted splendidly to the action of the House to-day and that stocks are going up. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Mansfield].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Source of distributions: For the purposes of this act every distribution is made out of earnings or profits to the extent thereof, and from the most recently accumulated earnings or profits. Any earnings or profits accumulated, or increase in value of property accrued, before March 1, 1913, may be distributed exempt from tax, after the earnings and profits accumulated after February 28, 1913, have been distributed, but any such tax-free distribution shall be applied against and reduce the basis of the stock provided in section 113.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all the language in the paragraph after the period in line 16, down to and including the period in line 22.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Vinson of Kentucky: Page 84, line 16, after the word "profits," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, by this amendment, if adopted, you will cause to be taxed dividends that are now being paid out of surpluses acquired prior to March 1, 1913. Under the present law, dividends that are paid from such surpluses are exempt from taxation, and it was the thought of the subcommittee and the action of the full committee that dividends paid from that source should be subject to the same rate of taxation applicable to other dividends, which are, of course, subject to the surtax.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair inquire if this is a committee amendment?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) Other distributions from capital: If any distribution (not in partial or complete liquidation) made by a corporation to its shareholders is not out of increase in value of property accrued before March 1, 1913, and is not out of earnings or profits, then the amount of such distribution shall be applied against and reduce the basis of the stock provided in section 113, and if in excess of such basis, such excess shall be taxable in the same manner as a gain from the sale or exchange of property. The provisions of this subsection shall also apply to distributions from depletion reserves based on the discovery value of mines.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 85, line 17, beginning with the word "is," strike out through the word "and" in line 18.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That carries out the amendment recently adopted by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the language, beginning after the word "property," down to and including line 25.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 85, line 23, after the word "property," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is evidently a different subject matter. Will not the gentleman make some explanation of it?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. This will realize about $2,-000,000 for the Treasury. The present law exempts dividends paid from depletion reserves occasioned by discovery value. This amendment will remove that exemption. The subcommittee thought that when a dividend is paid from discovery value as surplus they should be subjected to the surtax rate on dividends,

Mr. STAFFORD. This is to extend the taxable income? Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; and it is estimated that this will raise at least $2,000,000, whereas the first amendment would raise $9,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. The Clerk read as follows:

(f) Stock dividends: A stock dividend shall not be subject to tax.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It was my understanding that the committee was to give more study to the possibility of taxing the issue of stock dividends, not as a profit but placing it in the same category with the original issue. We have a stamp tax on the original issue. That being so, why could not the stock dividends be taxed to the extent of the original issue, thereby getting some revenue without conflicting with the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is my understanding that stock-dividend issues are subject to a tax as original issue.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am glad to hear that.

The Clerk read as follows:

(g) Redemption of stock: If a corporation cancels or redeems its stock (whether or not such stock was issued as a stock dividend) at such time and in such manner as to make the distribution and cancellation or redemption in whole or in part essentially equivalent to the distribution of a taxable dividend, the amount so distributed in redemption or cancellation of the stock, to the extent that it represents a distribution of earnings or profits accumulated after February 28, 1913, shall be treated as a taxable dividend.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 86, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "accumulated after February 28, 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 68 for the adoption of an amendment to carry out the basic amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to return to page 68 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Vinson of Kentucky: Page 68, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words and figures "accumulated after February 28, 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 84 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. Vinson of Kentucky: Page 84, line 12, strike out the words and figures "accumulated after February 28, 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Teachers in Alaska and Hawaii: In the case of an individual employed by Alaska or Hawaii or any political subdivision thereof as a teacher in any educational institution, the compensation received as such. This subsection shall not exempt compensation paid directly or indirectly by the Government of the United States. Subsection (b) of section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April

30, 1900, as amended by the act entitled "An act to amend section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900," approved April 12, 1930 (U. S. C., Sup. V, title 48, sec. 495 (b)), is repealed as of January

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Houston of Hawaii: Page 87, lines 17 and 18, strike out "as a teacher in any educational institution" and insert in lieu thereof "as an officer or employee."

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Chairman, the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. Wickersham] joins me in this amendment. I shall not detain the committee very long. It may appear to be an inconsequential matter, but to us who pay in the Territories all of the taxes that are levied by this tax bill it is a matter of principle. The officers and employees of a State are not taxed. The officers and employees under existing law in the Territory of Hawaii are not taxed, but by this law you undertake to repeal the law of April 12, 1930, which did, in fact, exempt the officers and employees of Hawaii. May I not assume that was done for the purpose of providing equality as between the Territory of Hawaii and the Territory of Alaska by just this amendment, and that by striking out the words which I have proposed in this amendment you will be treating the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii on an equal footing and on a parity with the treatment allotted to the States?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the position of the full committee is unanimous in opposition to the amendment offered by the Delegate from Hawaii. Section (b), to which this amendment is offered, is the same provision adopted by this Congress prior to the enactment of this present law that came from the Committee on Territories preferring Hawaii. The committee bill reverts to the former statute, and I would like the Delegate from Hawaii to inform me and inform the House why employees in Hawaii who would be affected by his amendment should have preferential treatment to employees in the 48 States on this side of the Pacific.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. They would not have preferential treatment. They would be treated exactly on a par with officers and employees of the States if this is adopted; such employees may not be taxed under the Constitution of the United States.

It is only by reason of the fact that Congress has the power to legislate for the Territories differently from the manner in which they legislate for the States that this discrimination against the Territories is possible. It is a question of the right of might.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Of course, the gentleman understands that under the Constitution the salaries of State employees are exempt.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. That is right.
Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. We do not think it is any time to exempt further employees in the Territory of Hawaii, when we need money so badly in our Treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And if we did that there would be no argument against exempting employees of the District of Columbia.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think the statement of the gentleman is correct.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. That would come under that part of this section which says that the subsection shall not exempt compensation paid directly or indirectly by the Government of the United States. As a matter of fact, the sum total involved is less than $5,000, and the principle of equity, which has been recognized so far as Hawaii is concerned by this Congress not later than April 12, 1930, would seem to indicate that this matter should be treated favorably.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It was recognized by legislation which did not come from the Ways and Means Committee. I trust the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. When it was put in that way it was with the acceptance of the then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the minority ranking member of the Committee on Ways and Means. As written the law is a direct effect of taxation without representation, repugnant to American institutions.

The following is the report under which the bill, which subsequently became the act of April 12, 1930, which this section repeals:

[House Report No. 492, Seventy-first Congress, second session]

AMEND THE HAWAIIAN ORGANIC ACT

Mr. Houston of Hawaii, from the Committee on the Territories,

Mr. Houston of Hawaii, from the Committee on the Territories, submitted the following report (to accompany H. B. 7830):

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 7830, after consideration, reports the same favorably and recommends that the bill do pass.

This is a bill to amend section 5 of the Hawaiian organic act so as to place the Territory of Hawaii upon a parity with the States of the Union in the matter of collection of Federal taxes. It will carry out the spirit of the treaty proposed at the time of the annexation of Hawaii, and which treaty is referred to in the joint resolution of Congress accepting the so-called cession of the resolution of Congress accepting the so-called cession of Hawaitan Legislature.

Hawaiian Legislature.

Upon the occasion of formal transfer of the sovereignty of Hawaii on August 12, 1898, Harold M. Sewall, minister of the United States to Hawaii, presenting to President Dole, of the Republic of Hawaii, a certified copy of the joint resolution, said:

"This joint resolution accepts, ratifies, and confirms, on the part of the United States, the cession formally consented to and approved by the Republic of Hawaii."

In replying to the last above-noted address by Minister Sewall, President Dole said:

"A treaty of political union baying been made, and the cession."

President Dole said:

"A treaty of political union having been made, and the cession formally consented to and approved by the Republic of Hawaii, having been accepted by the United States of America, I now in the interest of the Hawaiian body politic and with full confidence in the honor, justice, and friendship of the American people, yield up to you as the representative of the Government of the United States, the sovereignty and public property of the Hawaiian Islands."

The visiding up to the United States of the sovereignty refers Islands."

The yielding up to the United States of the sovereignty refers to the consent and approval of the Republic of Hawaii, which was given by the action of the Hawaiian Senate, which ratified the treaty, in which it was stated "to the end that those islands shall be incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof." And it was expected under these agreements that Hawaii would be treated on a parity with the States. This amendment undertakes to provide for such parity in a matter which up to the present time has not existed, and does not in effect provide either for raising or reducing the revenue. As a matter of fact, administration of present statutes provides an absolute discrimination as between the States and the Territory, and further provides a discrimination in the Territory as between certain of its employees and others. For example, school-teachers are exempted from payment of a Federal income tax on their salaries received from Territorial sources or from political subdivisions of the Territory, but other employees of the Territory or its political subdivisions must pay a Federal income tax on such salaries.

The Territory of Hawaii, through its legislature, memorialized

The Territory of Hawaii, through its legislature, memorialized Congress to remove such discrimination. Copy of the joint resolution passed on the subject is quoted herewith:

"JOINT RESOLUTION No. 2 (H. J. RES. No. 11)

MEMORIALIZING THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO EXEMPT ALL OFFICIALS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII AND ITS POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS FROM THE PAYMENT OF FEDERAL INCOME TAXES

"Whereas under the revenue act of 1921 of the Congress of the united States the officials and employees of the Territory of Hawali and its political subdivisions are compelled to pay taxes upon theome derived from the Territory or its political subdivisions; and "Whereas the officials and employees receiving compensation from the various States of the Union are exempt from the payment

"Whereas although the United States Government has the power to tax the income from salaries derived from the Territory of Hawaii or its political subdivisions, such taxation amounts to a discrimination in favor of the officials and employees of the various States of the Union as against the officials and employees of the Territory of Hawaii: Now therefore "Be it enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, That the Congress of the United States is hereby formally requested, through the Delegate to Congress from the Territory of Hawaii, to amend section 213 of the revenue act of 1921 so as to exempt from taxation thereunder all income in the form of salaries derived by the officials and employees from any Territory or the political subdivisions thereof, if the laws of the Territory require the payment of a tax on such salaries. the political subdivisions thereof, if the laws of the ferritor, require the payment of a tax on such salaries.

"Approved this 15th day of April, A. D. 1927.

"W. R. FARRINGTON,

"Governor of the Territory of Hawaii."

The present law is well covered in the following letter: TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE, Washington, March 31, 1926.

Hon. WILLIAM P. JARRETT.

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My DEAR MR. JARRETT: Reference is made to your recent personal call at the bureau relative to the question of whether the salaries of teachers of the Territory of Hawaii are exempt from Federal income taxes. You have asked to be furnished full information regarding this matter, including data relative to pertinent provisions in the various income-tax statutes.

You are advised that the power of the Government to tax the salaries of State officers received extended consideration in the noted case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S. 429), decided April 8, 1895. In the opinion rendered in that case it was stated (p. 584):

it was stated (p. 584):
"The Constitution contemplates the independent exercise

"The Constitution contemplates the independent exercise by the Nation and the State, severally, of their constitutional powers.

"As the States can not tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, nor the means which they employ to carry their powers into execution, so it has been held that the United States has no power under the Constitution to tax the instrumentalities or the property of a State.

"* * In Buffington v. Day it was adjudged that Congress had no power, even by an act taxing all incomes, to levy a tax upon the salaries of judicial officers of a State for reasons similar to those on which it had been held in Dobbins v. Eric County Commissioners (41 U. S. 16 Pet. 435), that a State could not tax the salaries of officers of the United States."

Buffington v. Day (11 Wall. 113), cited above, was decided April 3, 1871, and is a leading case on the subject. The question involved was whether, under the Civil War income-tax statutes, the salary of a State judge was taxable under the general provisions of the acts. In holding that the salary was not taxable the court said (pp. 125, 127):

"It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the states from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the states from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the states from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the states, nor is there any prohibiting the States from ta

" . . the means and instrumentalities employed for car-

"* * the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution, should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated by the taxing power of another government. * * ."."

The revenue act of 1913 specifically exempted the salaries of State officers in the following language (Sec. II B):

"That in computing net income under this section there shall be excluded * * the compensation of all officers and employees of a State or any political subdivision thereof except when such compensation is paid by the United States Government."

Section 4 of the revenue act of 1916, as amended by the act of October 3, 1917, provided for a similar exemption.

Neither the revenue act of 1918, the revenue act of 1921, nor the revenue act of 1924 contained any provision specifically exempting the salaries of State officers and employees. Section 213 (b) (7) of each of these acts, however, exempted "income derived from any public utility or the exercise of any essential governmental function and accruing to any State, Territory, or District of Columbia, or any political subdivision of a State or Territory, or income accruing to the Government of any possession of the United States or any political subdivision thereof." It might be noted here that the exemption covered by the provisions quoted is extended to Territories as well as to States.

Article 85 of Regulations 45 relating to the revenue act of 1918 was promulgated as interpretative of section 213 of the statute and reads as follows:

"Compensation of State officers: Compensation paid its officers reads as follows:

reads as follows:

"Compensation of State officers: Compensation paid its officers and employees by a State or political subdivision thereof, including fees received by notaries public commissioned by States and the commissions of receivers appointed by State courts, are not taxable. Employees of universities receiving salaries paid in part or in whole from funds available under the Smith-Lever Act of May 8, 1914, who are officers or employees of a State, are not required to return as taxable incomes the salaries so received. This is also true with respect to the act of August 30, 1890, relating to colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, and to the act of March 2, 1887, relating to agricultural experiment stations in such colleges."

to the act of March 2, 1887, relating to agricultural experiments stations in such colleges."

Treasury Decision 2843, approved May 17, 1919, cited an opinion of the Attorney General relative to the taxable status of the salaries of State officials, seemingly as authority for the provisions of the article. That Treasury decision reads as follows:

"Section 213 (a) of the revenue act of 1918 provides that gross income shall include 'gains, profits, and income derived from relative wages or compensation for personal services."

• • of salaries, wages, or compensation for personal services salaries, wages, or compensation for personal services * • • of whatever kind and in whatever form paid.'

"In accordance with an opinion of the Attorney General, dated May 6, 1919, and based on the well-settled rule that governmental agencies of the States are not subject to taxation by the Federal Government, it is held that salaries of State officials and salaries and wages of employees of a State are not subject to the income tax imposed by the said revenue act of 1918."

Article 88 of regulations 62 under the revenue act of 1921 is closely similar to article 85 of regulations 45, but contains the following provisions not contained in article 85 of Regulations 45:

"Compensation received for services rendered to a State or a political subdivision thereof is included in gross income unless the person receives such compensation as an officer or employee of a State or political subdivision. An officer is a person who occupies a position in the service of the State or political subdivision, the tenure of which is continuous and not temporary and the duties of which are established by law or regulations and not by agreement. An employee is one whose duties consist in the rendition of prescribed services and not the accomplishment of specific objects, and whose services are continuous, not occasional or temporary." or temporary."

Article 88 of regulations 65 under the revenue act of 1924 contains language similar to that contained in article 88 of regulations 62.

As the result of an opinion rendered by the Solicitor of Internal Revenue in the latter part of 1923 and published as Solicitor's Opinion 152 in the Internal Revenue Bulletin Service, Volume II, Bulletin 35, page 12, issued under date of December 3, 1923, the exemptions of State officers and employees were thereafter made to depend upon whether they were employed in activities representing "strictly governmental functions" as distinguished from proprietary or private activities, exemption being denied to officers or employees of a State or a political subdivision thereof whose duties fell in the latter class. As a result of the situation arising from this decision with respect to "State officers and employees" Congress, in section 121 of the revenue act of 1926, enacted the following provision:

"Any taxes imposed by the revenue act of 1924 or prior revenue acts upon any individual in respect of amounts received by him as compensation for personal services as an officer or employee of any State or political subdivision thereof (except to the extent that such compensation is paid by the United States Government directly or indirectly), shall, subject to the statutory period of limitations properly applicable thereto, be abated, credited, or refunded."

From the foregoing it is clear that the income-tax statutes prior As the result of an opinion rendered by the Solicitor of Inter-

From the foregoing it is clear that the income-tax statutes prior to the revenue act of 1918 specifically exempted the salaries of State officers and employees; that there was ample authority in the United States Supreme Court decisions for provisions in the regulations under the revenue acts of 1918, 1921, and 1924 specifically exempting such salaries; and that the revenue act of 1926 clically exempting such salaries; and that the revenue act of 1926 contains specific provisions that such salaries shall be exempt. However, none of the revenue acts nor any of the regulations promulgated under such acts provides that the salaries of the employees of a Territory of the United States shall be exempt. The basis of the distinction is the fact that under our dual system of government the Federal Government and the State governments operate independently of each other, while the operation of the Territorial governments is dependent upon the Federal Government. In the case of Buffington v. Day, cited above, it was held that it is not competent for Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to impose a tax on the salary of a judicial officer of a State, which decision was based upon the sovereign powers vested in the State governments. The Territorial governments are not vested with such sovereign powers, but are under the direct jurisdiction of the Federal Government. the direct jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

If you desire to take up this matter further with me, consideration will be expedited by reference to IT:E:RR-CTR.

Sincerely yours,

D. H. BLAIR, Commissioner.

In compliance with the rule, there follows a statement of the law, showing the new language in italics:

"Sec. 5. (a) That the Constitution and, except as otherwise provided, all the laws of the United States, including laws carrying general appropriations, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States: Provided, That sections 1841 to 1891, inclusive, 1910 and 1912, of the Revised Statutes, and the amendments thereto, and an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes,' approved July 30, 1886, and the amendments thereto, shall not apply to Hawaii. Hawaii.

"(b) The salaries or wages paid by the Territory of Hawaii, or any of its political subdivisions, for services rendered in connection with the exercise of an essential governmental function of the Territory or its political subdivisions, shall not be taxable by the United States in the administration of the income tax laws."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the Delegate from Hawaii.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the case of an individual, if in the taxable year and in each of the 10 preceding taxable years the amount of the contributions or gifts described in section 23 (n) plus the amount of income, war-profits, or excess-profits taxes paid during such year in respect of preceding taxable years exceeds 90 per cent of the taxpayer's net income for each such year, as computed without the benefit of section 23 (n), then the 15 per cent limit imposed by such section shall not be applicable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the necessity for carrying the clause in different places throughout the bill in respect to warprofits and excess-profits taxes paid "during such year in excess of preceding taxable years"? I was under the impression that we no longer carried any war-profits or | excess-profits taxes. I can conceive of these war-profits and excess-profits taxes being applicable to returns many years back, but I can not see where they are applicable to returns in the future.

Mr. CRISP. The only reason this is retained is because some of those old cases are still pending. There are some cases where deficiencies were levied against them, and they have not been finally adjudicated. That is the only reason for carrying those provisions in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then this clause refers to that character of tax covered in returns 10 years or more back?

Mr. CRISP. Yes. Of course, we have not had any excessprofits tax for years. The provision has been carried to protect the Government in those cases still pending growing out of the old law in years past.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

(4) Partnerships and estates: In the case of any such individual who is a member of a partnership or a beneficiary of an estate or trust, his proportionate share of such taxes of the partnership or the estate or trust paid or accrued during the taxable year to a foreign country or to any possession of the United States, as the case may be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment to this section. I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is a motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. I offered an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to strike out a portion of the section which has

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Johnson of Missouri: On page 103, strike out lines 5 to 25, inclusive, and on page 104, strike out lines 1 to 7, inclusive.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK. I have offered a perfecting amendment to this section. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is a motion to strike out. As I understand, my amendment must be acted upon before the motion to strike out is considered.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct, but the gentleman from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if my motion prevails, I shall then file motions to strike out the remaining portions of section 131.

Mr. Chairman, when section 31 of this revenue bill was read I offered a motion to strike that section from the bill. That section provided that taxes paid to foreign countries should be allowed as a credit against taxes assessed in the United States, to the extent provided in the bill. That motion prevailed. The motion which I have filed to-day simply seeks to strike the provisions in section 131 relating to these tax credits from the bill. The House has, in fact, acted on the subject matter of my amendment, and the amendment which I offered to-day simply seeks to carry out the will of the House as expressed in the vote some few days ago.

Under the law as it now exists, a resident corporation which goes to a foreign country, invests its money there, and receives a large income is permitted to take credit against the tax imposed by the United States to the extent of the tax which it pays to the foreign country. If my amendment prevails, the Treasury Department experts state it will bring to the Treasury for the year 1933, $12,000,000, just for that part of the fiscal year; that under normal times it will bring revenue of $35,000,000 a year; and under such times as we have now it will bring revenue of approximately $20,000,000 a year.

House this morning, they included the $12,000,000 which my amendment seeks to raise. Therefore unless you support this amendment, you destroy the plan of the Ways and Means Committee in its effort to balance the Budget. My amendment supports the theory and the plan of the Ways and Means Committee in its effort to balance the Budget.

The Department of Commerce informed me this morning that in the year 1930 the money invested in foreign countries by citizens of the United States amounted to over $15,000,000,000; that of that amount about $7,000,000,000 were invested in direct investments or industries and $7,000,-000,000 were invested in bonds and securities of foreign countries. My amendment simply seeks to place those people who take their money which they have earned in the United States and which they have invested in foreign countries on an equality with citizens of the United States who remain here and employ their money in this country.

It is a known fact that thousands of industries and corporations, because of the retaliatory tariff laws, have gone into foreign countries, practically closed their factories here, and now are manufacturing their products in foreign countries with foreign labor.

It was stated on the floor of the House that Mr. Ford manufactured his automobiles in the foreign countries, sent them back to the United States, and sold them in competition with automobiles made here with American labor.

We simply ask by this amendment that he be placed on a parity and equality with citizens of the United States who are employing their money here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended one minute in order that I may ask him a question or make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think it was the intention of the Ways and Means Committee to indorse the principle announced by the gentleman's amendment, or any different principle from what they originally recommended, by putting that in the list of items this morning. I think they simply acknowledged the fact that the House had taken a different position on the matter than the Ways and Means Committee. I think most of the members of the Ways and Means Committee still think that their original amendment was better than the one offered by the gentleman from

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. But the $12,000,000, I understand, is included in the Budget.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was included on account of the action taken by the House the other day.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

When the gentleman from Missouri, some 10 days ago, sought to amend section 31 of this revenue bill I spoke against his amendment, at least in so far as it affected American citizens and corporations in the possessions of the United States. To that part of his amendment affecting American investments or business in foreign countries I did not then address myself nor will I concern myself with that phase now. That is a matter which the Congress of the United States has to determine for the people of the United States.

Upon the occasion when this matter was first discussed, in connection with section 31, which is related to section 131, now under consideration, I made it clear that I was not rising in defense of Filipinos, Filipino interests, or Filipino corporations, but that I was defending, as I am now doing, as a matter of duty and as a matter of equity, the interests of your own fellow citizens and the corporations of your own citizens in those distant possessions which, through the fortunes of war, came under the American flag 34 years ago.

I believe then and I believe more strongly now that Ameri-The Committee on Ways and Means, I think, is supporting can citizens and corporations in the possessions of the my amendment, for in the Budget for 1933, read to the United States are rightfully entitled to the benefits of the tax-credit provision for income, war-profits, and excess- it in that way, you will not get it at all until we succeed. profits taxes paid there.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the author of this amendment himself desires to discriminate against American citizens or American corporations that have established business in the possessions of the United States.

If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] should review, or if any one else should review, the record of the discussion when section 31 was first discussed, he would find that the tenor of the sentiment which then prevailed in the House was favorable to denving American investors and corporations that have business plants in foreign countries tax credit, but not to American investors in the possessions of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I submit it would not be fair nor just to American citizens or corporations to subject them to such a burden as this. Earlier in the day when I was addressing myself to another section of this revenue measure, I pointed out a provision which, if unchanged, would mean a tax levy on certain imports, and would mean an absolute departure from a policy followed for more than three decades. Bear in mind that those American investors in the Philippines have to pay the taxes imposed in your possessions. If the amendment should be approved, you will not give them credit for taxes paid there contrary to the original intention of the Committee on Ways and Means. If, on top of all this, their products imported here will be further taxed, you will be subjecting your own citizens and corporations not only to double taxation but, in a sense, to treble taxation. [Applause.]

I hope the amendment will not prevail.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much the action the House took in the matter of these corporations. [Applause.] I am going to ask, if nobody else does, for a separate vote on this amendment when we get back into the House. [Applause.] Perhaps, however, the defeat of the amendment now proposed will accomplish the same

The situation is this: A great many domestic corporations are now operating branch plants abroad. They have got to do it in order to get back of those high tariff walls. It is not our own tariffs that are hurting our industries now so much as it is the tariffs of other countries.

I have talked with some of these gentlemen who have established branch plants abroad. They say to me they prefer not to do it; that they prefer to manufacture in the United States in large amounts, in mass production, with a trained personnel; that they can do it cheaper; that they do not like to break up their plants and establish small plants all over the world, but that they have got to do it on account of these foreign retaliatory tariffs now erected against them. They say they can not get over their tariff barriers.

Now, it is an appealing thing, of course, to say-and it sounds logical if you do not think very deeply into the question-that these men have no right to make these investments abroad; that they ought not to take away the money they have earned here and invest it abroad and employ 500,000 foreign laborers. But they can not invest it here. We are producing here now more than we can possibly consume during the period of this depression. If you compel them to close their operations there, they can not operate here. A great many of our factories are now closed, probably one-third of them. We hope more of them will open in the future. So the only thing they can do is to invest their money over there, which, of course, is unfortunate. But the money they earn there comes back here.

Perhaps I can make myself clear. For a long time the Italian Government was largely maintained by the remittances of Italians who were at work here. It was a large item in their budget, the immigrant remittances. They always counted on these remittances over there, and they became a part of their stock of money. So the money which now comes back to us from these factories is in the nature of immigrant remittances. That is all. If you do not get by some international agreement or something of that kind. in bringing about a lowering of the tariff walls of the world.

Now, for a great many years—and to some extent I have aided in bringing it about-we have been conducting negotiations, sometimes with the League of Nations, which would lead to a cessation in the world, as far as was possible, of what is known as international double taxation. We have succeeded in accomplishing results in two or three of the European countries. They have agreed that they will not tax doubly American capital invested there, and we have agreed to give them the same treatment here. We have appropriated considerable money and we have sent commissions abroad to consult even with the League of Nations in an effort to bring about an end to double taxation in the world. When we adopted this amendment the other day we just took a long step backward. We destroyed at once the results of all our negotiations over there and we reestablished ourselves the principle of international double taxation, and. of course, it is nothing else, and the progress the nations have made in abolishing international double taxation has been due to the initiative of the United States. Now we are about to destroy it ourselves.

We will not accomplish anything by discouraging these investments abroad. We do not make any money by doing it. If they can not pay these double taxes—and experts have told us they can not pay them—we simply stop them over there and the high tariff walls have stopped them here. Whenever we readjust these tariffs they will come back to the United States soon enough. There is no trouble about that, but we are asked by this amendment to take steps now that make impossible any readjustment of the conditions under which the world is struggling. This amendment should be voted down.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know just exactly where we are on this proposition. It is true that the Committee on Ways and Means originally rejected this amendment, but in the program to-day that is presented to the House and to the country the moneys that will be realized from the adoption of this amendment are included in order that the Budget may be balanced.

Twelve million dollars will be brought into the Treasury of the United States if this amendment is adopted, and this $12,000,000 is included in the items that aggregate $1,243,-000.000.

I listened attentively to my leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], on the theme of double taxation. I heard the testimony before our committee in regard to that matter. One foreign country squints in the direction of wiping out double taxation, but no single nation of the world has yet preferred American yield in that foreign clime. So do not get it into your heads that some foreign country has been doing something for American capital and American income that we will not do for them.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois dealt in generalities. I want to talk to you in figures and get down to specific detailed facts.

When we began a study of foreign credits there arose three conditions, and you will be surprised when I tell you about them. If I were to tell you that under existing law if a corporation made $1,000,000 in America and $1,000,000 in England, the corporation would pay less money to the United States in income tax than if it had not made the $1,000,000 in England, you might doubt my veracity; but in the presence of the membership of the Ways and Means Committee I say to you that under the law which now obtains this very thing happened again and again to the detriment of the Treasury of millions of dollars.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In a minute; yes. I know the gentleman will say that the committee has plugged

Mr. ALDRICH. Exactly.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Certainly, it did, but it was only plugged because the gap was discovered. I want to give you the figures on that. Take the $1,000,000 earned in England and the $1,000,000 earned here by a corporation, that makes $2,000,000 gross income. You take the $250,000 of corporate tax in England, come over and wipe out the $120,000 corporate tax here in America; then you take the $130,000 that evidences the remainder between the $250,000 English tax and the $120,000 American tax and subtract it from the foreign yield of $1,000,000. You bring that sum of $870,000 over here and add it to your $1,000,000 American income. Then you multiply by the 12 per cent corporatetax rate; and if my calculation is correct, it brings in $221.400. Then you subtract the $120,000 of American tax, leaving $101.400 actual American tax. That corporation which made $1,000,000 in America and $1,000,000 in England, instead of paying $120,000 normal corporate tax only paid into the Treasury of the United States $101,400. Am I right or wrong?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If the gentleman will permit, that is under the present law?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Under the present bill that gap was filled.

Mr. KVALE. It is one-tenth of the net profits annually, is that right?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; approximately.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What would it be under the proposed modification; that is what we are interested in?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I want to give you the whole picture because if there is going to be a vote I want the Members to know what they are voting on.

Under the law that now obtains, if a corporation made $1,000,000 in America, $1,000,000 in England, where they have a corporate tax, and $1,000,000 in Argentina, where they do not have a corporate tax, instead of getting the credit of 50 per cent of the English tax, because they happen to be fortunate enough to make $1,000,000 in Argentina, they take two-thirds of that $250,000 of tax as a credit. Consequently the Treasury is still further depleted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Rainey] dealt in generalities. I want to get down to this amendment that is proposed. Let us assume you have a corporation making $1,000,000 of net income in America, and that same corporation has a net income in England of $1,000,000. There is an income of $2,000,000. All this amendment does is to allow that $250,000 that is paid to the English Government in tax to be used as a deductible item; not as a credit against the tax but as a deductible item.

If a business concern in this country has to pay State taxes to 8 or 10 different States, you are not permitted to take the tax you pay the States and use it as a credit against the Federal tax. All you can do in that case is to take the State tax and use it as a deductible item from the gross income.

All this amendment does is to place it on the same basis that you place the tax paid to different States. In other words, a concern making $1,000,000 in this country and $1,000,000 in England would have a gross of $2,000,000. You would subtract the tax of $250,000, which would leave $1,-750,000. Then you take the normal rate of 12 per cent, and you will have a taxable yield of $210,000. In other words, you would pay the normal rate on the American yield, and at the same time the normal rate of yield abroad with the tax used as a deductible item.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I will only take a moment of the time. My friend from Illinois said he was going to ask a separate vote in the House on the section that was stricken out. That is not necessary. That was a cross reference, and the real issue as to foreign credits is now before you. If this is stricken out, the foreign credit will be deleted. If it is retained, the foreign credit will be retained, and it is not necessary to have a vote on that section.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the acting chairman of the committee has said that this matter should be decided by the action taken by the Committee of the Whole on the pending motion to strike out. This is the situation that exists under the bill. I am not speaking of the present law, but of the bill as reported by the committee.

Suppose \$100,000 taxable income was earned in the United States and \$100,000 earned in England. Under the bill the United States would tax the \$100,000 earned in this country at the rate of 13 per cent, or \$13,000. England would tax the \$100,000 earned abroad at  $27\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, or \$27,500. Under this state of affairs we would not tax the income earned in England.

If, in another case, $100,000 were earned here and $100,000 earned in another country that had the same rate of tax as ours, 13 per cent, we would still get $13,000 on the income earned in this country and not tax the income earned abroad.

If $100,000 is earned in this country and $100,000 earned in some country where the tax rate was 7 per cent, we would get $13,000 on the $100,000 earned in this country and the difference between $13,000 at our rate of taxation and $7,000 at the rate in the other country, or a total of $20,000. We would subtract from our rate the foreign rate and levy a tax on the income earned abroad at the rate of difference between the American rate and the foreign rate.

If, however, another country has no tax rate at all, then we will get $13,000 on the income earned in this country and $13,000 earned on the income in the other country, or $26,000.

In any event, under the bill we get the $13,000 on the income earned in this country.

Now, it was suggested that the tax paid on incomes earned abroad should be a deduction from the gross income earned here and abroad, as are taxes paid to the State, county, or local government here. The difference is this, that all the income earned in this country is earned under the protection of our laws and guaranties, safeguards, and privileges that we give to persons and property, but incomes earned abroad are earned under the protection of laws and safeguards of other countries.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think that an income earned under our flag ought to be given more credit than an income earned under another flag?

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. And is it not a fact that the income that is earned in a foreign country is earned under the protection of the United States?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; not at all. If it is earned in England, they go to the English courts for the settlement of their disputes and for the protection of their persons and property, and the protection of their rights in the same manner as Englishmen do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Do they not frequently have the United States intervene and settle disputes?

Mr. HAWLEY. Only to see that our people have, under international law and comity, the same fair treatment that English citizens have, and we give Englishmen here the protection of our laws.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Does that condition exist in China? Have we not our own courts there and have we not our Navy there to protect our people?

Mr. HAWLEY. China is under different treaty arrangements by which we have obtained rights and assumed special responsibilities for our citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is proposed to strike out the provision in the bill concerning which I have just spoken, by which we are to get the full 13 per cent on the American income in any event, and additional amounts upon revenues earned abroad under the condition I have previously stated. It is proposed to strike out the section under discussion. What | House that they should pay some attention to this question. would happen? Let us take a case in which the English tax is involved. On $100,000 of income earned in this country, of course, we collect our 13 per cent. On the $100,000 of income earned in England the English Government will collect $27,500. When that income is reported in this country the $100,000 earned here will be added to the $100,000 earned abroad, and from that will be subtracted the English tax of $27,500, and we will compute the American income tax at 13 per cent on $172,500, or $22,425, which will be the American tax. Or to state it in another way, we collect the $13,000 due on the American income. The taxpayer will pay the English tax at the rate of 2.5 per cent, or $27,500. Subtracting the English tax from the $100,000 taxable income, the taxpayer will have left $72,500, and on this we will under the bill collect a tax at the rate of 13 per cent, or $9,425.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Of course, the gentleman is in error about the English tax. It is 25 per cent.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is 271/2 per cent.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The experts over here tell

Mr. HAWLEY. My information is that the English rate is 271/2 per cent. The particular rate, however, does not make any special difference. The tax collected by us on the income earned in England, $9,425, plus the English tax, will be $36,925. That is, the American company doing business in England will pay a tax on its English income equal to the full English tax and our tax of 13 per cent on that part of the income taxable here. That is, it will pay $9,425 more than its English competitor. Under such a tax it can not do business over there. That increased amount of tax will be such a handicap that it will have to close its business. It may be said that we ought to have no American capital invested abroad. If we are of that opinion, then when American capital leaves our land for operations abroad we should regard it as a foreign operation and excuse it from taxation here. Of course, the property of a man is his to use under our law wherever he pleases. I might agree with the policy or I might not agree with the policy of American investments abroad. But if we are pursuing the policy of approving investments abroad, why should we when they are made abroad impose such a tax upon them as to make their operation impossible in competition with foreign competitors?

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. PALMISANO. Is not it true that the present law exempting corporations of the tax abroad gives them an opportunity to take advantage of cheap labor abroad?

Mr. HAWLEY. They take advantage of such conditions existing abroad as do exist, but if we are to allow them to go there, and that is our policy, why make their operations impossible in competition with their competitors in the country in which they operate, which have the same labor

I desire to return to my original statement in closing the argument that I am making. Under the bill we are doing all I think we ought to do at this time in the critical condition of business here and abroad by saying that we will collect, in any event, the tax on the income earned here in full, and then, if other countries have lower rates of income taxes than we have, we will collect the difference between the rates. We are getting all of the money we are entitled to, it seems to me, if we are undertaking to hold an even balance and a fair arrangement between our own people doing business abroad and the foreign competitors whom they meet in the markets.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to admit that I have no sympathy with Americans who have sent their money abroad and invested it in factories for the purpose of securing cheap labor and manufacturing commodities formerly produced by American labor and sent abroad. I stated that a few days ago. I have another purpose in rising to-day and that is to warn the Members of the in agricultural projects combined.

It is a big question. It involves no less than $12,000,000, according to the Treasury, and we have all learned that Treasury estimates are conservative. If you defeat this amendment of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. Johnson], then you must find a way to raise $12,000,000 additional. We struck from the bill last week a paragraph that will raise this amount if you adopt the pending amendment. Therefore a vote against this amendment is a vote for the big corporations, Mellon and Ford included. Are you going to vote $12,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States or do you propose to increase the already swollen fortunes of the multimillionaires? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], acting chairman of the committee, tells us he is not opposed to the Johnson amendment.

I regret the 200 or more Members who were here last week are not here to-day. It is clear the friends of Mellon and Ford are here. Their opposition is evidence of that.

I have some statistics from the Department of Commerce which I received at 2.30 o'clock this afternoon. It is an estimate of American investments abroad at the end of 1931. It is a conservative estimate.

There is $1,621,000,000 invested abroad in manufacturing plants. There is $7,998,000,000 invested in manufacturing plants, in mining enterprises, public utilities and in agricultural projects combined.

Some of you gentlemen from the country districts complain about competition from foreign countries. American money is sent to other countries, invested in agriculture, to raise products to send to this country in competition with the products that your farmers raise. Are you going to vote for your farmers or for the multimillionaires?

I call attention to a document issued by the Department of Commerce, New Estimate of American Investments Abroad; and also to Senate Document 258, Seventy-first Congress, third session. There you will find interesting information in regard to how American money is finding its way into foreign countries. At the close of the war our money helped to, in part, rehabilitate foreign countries. That was not so bad, but when money is earned in this country through the protection given the citizen by the Government and then that citizen takes his millions and sends it abroad and opens factories, employs cheap labor, and manufactures clothes, machinery, shoes, and other articles formerly manufactured here and shipped abroad, it is something that we should be alarmed about. What is going to become of the little foreign trade we have left if this is to continue? First comes the tariff to destroy our foreign trade, and then, to make a good job of it, American money is sent abroad to set up factories where our advanced methods are installed and, with the aid of machinery and cheap labor, articles are made and sold to our former customers. How can an American manufacturer compete under such conditions?

I insert the statistics received by me to-day from the Department of Commerce.

Preliminary estimate of American investments abroad at the end of 1931

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] would save these American merchants $12,000,000. I am not willing to save them a cent, and I am only sorry that we can not find a way that would be constitutional to get more of their money. I have respect for the American who, by his ability and toil, makes a fortune, but for those who made their money here and then used it to injure their country's trade I have no time.

Let us serve notice on this class here and now that they will not be allowed the deductions the bill as it came from the committee permitted. The Johnson amendment will make them pay, and its adoption will make other Americans hesitate before sending their money to a foreign country. I hope the House will adopt the amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Black, of New York, offers the following amendment: Page 103, line 8, after the word "corporation," insert "other than a citizen or domestic corporation engaged in a foreign country or possession of the United States in the business of manufacturing and selling a commodity which is capable of being both manufactured in the United States and shipped to such foreign country or possession of the United States." or possession of the United States.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to take a middle course between those who want absolute credit given to all corporations doing business in foreign countries and those who want no credit given to an American corporation doing business in a foreign country.

This amendment has been suggested to me by leaders of industry and by the American Federation of Labor. The best distinction made between these corporations was made by Mr. Matthew Woll, of the American Federation of Labor, when he said in a speech on March 12:

I pointed out, on the contrary, the double benefit to this country of equipping less-advanced peoples with essentials like railroads, public utilities, surfaced roads, automobiles, and farm machinery. We sell them these goods and at the same time put them in a position to buy from us more shoes, textiles, and consumption goods, more typewriters, cash registers, and sewing machines.

My amendment seeks to give credit for foreign taxes to the corporations doing the very thing that Mr. Matthew Woll set out in his speech.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I would like to just call attention to the gentleman's amendment, which reads "capable of being manufactured." I wonder if the gentleman did not mean "is manufactured," and then transported, because, for instance, an automobile is capable of manufacture here, and yet it may be entirely manufactured in a foreign country.

Mr. BLACK. No. My amendment is broader than the gentleman's suggestion. The fact that it is capable of being made here would bar them from the exemption.

Now, there is an evil in double taxation. As late as the October term of the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Burnet, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, against Chicago Portrait Co., Judge Hughes pointed out that there is a distinct evil in double taxation.

However, the gentleman who wanted to strike out this amendment pointed out another evil that those who want to be free of the double taxation go beyond their tariff walls and get cheap labor and compete with our goods. I am not for them. I am for the engineering corporation that goes down into South America and builds a bridge, builds a trolley line, builds a power plant, and buys its steel and other commodities necessary to the installation of those things from America, made by American labor, and sending back money to America. It is all very well to say that Henry Ford will build Fords in Ireland and send them back to compete with Fords, getting cheaper labor, but it is not possible that an American firm can build a road in South America and have the road come back here and compete with our roads, or that it can build a bridge in Brazil and the bridge will come back and compete with my Brooklyn Bridge. [Laughter.]

There are two groups of citizens and corporations coming within this section:

A. Those who have erected in foreign countries factories producing with foreign labor and materials, commodities in competition with American-made goods, contrived by Ameri-

B. American citizens or corporations which, instead of injuring American labor, are in fact, through their foreign associations, making a market for American goods, contrived by American labor.

Both A group and B group, under provisions of this bill as now written, are doubly taxed. I have in mind the adopted motion of the gentleman from Missouri on sec-

They bear the imposts of these foreign countries on their foreign operations and the additional taxes of the United

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Is it not a fact that all corporations in the United States are subject to double taxation because of paying a State income tax?

Mr. BLACK. But there are certain deductions made for taxes paid all over this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. They are deductions made against income.

Mr. BLACK. They are largely competing with American citizens and foreign competition is barred by the tariff law, but here they are out in the foreign field competing with the countries of the world and competing with one country that has become a business house.

In the case of competitive activities against American labor there is logic in the arguments of those who oppose credit on the taxes paid in America for the taxes paid abroad.

But it is sound policy that those citizens and corporations which are broadening foreign markets for American goods and services should be aided in their efforts to increase demands for American products.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. There is substantial difference between the American company which builds a plant abroad to build machines which compete with American-made machines and the American corporation which builds a bridge in South America with steel made here.

Engineering corporations, road-building corporations, corporations furnishing foreign cities and states such services as public utilities and motion pictures-none of these, of course, compete with American goods or American labor.

On the other hand, because of their American relations, they naturally give preference in all their purchases to goods made in the United States. They furnish customers for American steel, American lumber, American copper, American equipment.

Every year Congress appropriates millions of dollars to build up the country's foreign trade. It provides bureaus of the Department of Commerce which promote the foreign sales of American goods.

Just now the American exporter and the American corporation with foreign branches are facing ruinous conditions and destructive competition. In many countries they are by law barred from remitting from the country the profits they may earn.

Every foreign country lays heavy taxes on the American branch office.

The Congress of the United States should avoid heavier burdens upon those Americans who create foreign sales of goods or services.

Generally, 10 per cent of our commerce is in foreign trade. A great portion of this is in foreign branches of American corporations which this legislation subjects to double taxation.

I wired a great number of the leading American industrial heads about this proposal of mine. I have a wire, which typifies the situation as well as any other, from the Underwood Typewriter Co. The vice president says:

Telegram received. Our export sales of American manufactured typewriters, adding machines, and bookkeeping machines during the last four years represent 39.4 per cent of our total business during that period.

They are manufacturing them here with American labor, and, of course, they are taxed elsewhere. It is almost half their business, and almost half their business means half their employees.

If the gentleman who has presented this amendment is well intentioned—and nobody will accord him credit for greater sincerity than I—and he insists on his amendment, I think he is going one step too far, and my position on the question is based on the suggestion made to me by the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Chairman, I rise neither to oppose nor to favor the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson], nor the perfecting amendment introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Black]. I just want to make a statement in order to clarify the position of American citizens and corporations in the Philippine Islands in relation to the tax bill that is now under consideration by the Committee of the Whole.

If the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Missouri is passed, the American citizens and corporations in the Philippine Islands will be restored to their condition of 1918, which has already been remedied by the tax law of 1921, by the tax law of 1924, and by the tax law of 1926. The amendment tries to place American citizens and corporations in the Philippine Islands in the very disadvantageous position they were before in relation to their British, Japanese, Chinese, and other foreign competitors doing business in the Philippine Islands. The position of American citizens and corporations in the Philippine Islands is quite different than the position of American investors going to foreign countries. Plants are not established in the Philippine Islands for the purpose of hiring cheap labor, but to take to the Philippine Islands American goods manufactured in the United States as well as agricultural products raised in the United States.

The effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be that American business in the Philippine Islands will be killed. I am as much interested as any American citizen in balancing the Budget of the Government of the United States, but if you kill American trade in the Philippine Islands, conducted by American citizens and corporations, you can not get a single cent from that source, because it will cease to exist.

In a memorandum presented to the Congress of the United States, in which former President Taft, General Wood, Colonel Stimson, the Secretary of War, Davis, and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mellon, were in conformity, the following statement was made:

For a long time doubt existed as to whether the act of 1918 was intended to apply to the income of Americans doing business in the Philippines. Obviously, if so applied, it imposed a serious handicap upon our citizens there by subjecting them to a tax upon their incomes six times greater than the British, Chinese, and other foreign competitors were paying.

If you want to pass a law prohibiting all American citizens and corporations from doing business in the Philippine Islands then adopt the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, which would virtually prohibit them from doing any business in the Philippine Islands.

For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson] will be rejected.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson,]

Mr. Chairman, the first proposition that occurs to me is the suggestion made by the last gentleman who spoke. I think the highest privilege that could possibly be granted to the Philippine Islands would be that of statehood; and if they were a sovereign State and a member of the Union, they would then be subject to this tax just the same as a corporation in any other State of the Union. Therefore, I see no reason for making an exception there.

I now want to call your attention to another feature of this bill that I can not see any reason for, and that is the one that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Hawley] seems to recommend rather highly, and the gentleman makes this comparison: He tells us that if a corporation, resident of the United States, makes $100,000 in England it will not be taxed because they have a corporation tax there or an income tax that exceeds our own; but if we send a corporation down into Argentina, where they have no tax, we will tax that income 13 per cent. Why is it that we say to a corporation, "If you will send your investment to England, we will not tax you; but if you send it to Argentina, we will tax you 13 per cent?"

I suppose the idea is that this is double taxation, but I take it it is fundamental that every nation does, or at least ought to, levy a tax sufficient to pay the expenses of the government, and it does not seem to me the form of the taxation is any business of the United States. If they prefer to raise their taxes to pay the expenses of their government as a property tax, what business is it of ours? Why should we, as a reward for their levying a particular kind of tax which seems to please us—an income tax—knock that off and then not knock off the other? It does not seem to me to be reasonable under any circumstances.

I thank the committee for its kind attention.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the committee voted upon an earlier section of the bill with a cross reference to this provision. The vote was decisive, and while I would be the last one to be unfair to the estimable gentleman who is acting chairman of the committee, yet I understood it was the agreement that the decisions then made in committee would be abided by in the further consideration of this bill by the Ways and Means Committee when this section was reached.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the contrary, to my mind, was distinctly understood and, consequently, no extended argument was made at that time. It was said that when we reached this provision the merits of the proposition could be more properly discussed,

Mr. KVALE. I accept the statement of the gentleman, and shall not now press the point any further.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I understood that to be a test vote as to what would happen, although it was stated that the real provisions were in section 131. I do not know that there was any understanding with the Committee on Ways and Means, but so far as I am concerned, I am acquiescent in the action of the committee and for that reason did not argue the matter.

Mr. KVALE. I thank the gentleman for his reply. Let me remind the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Hawley] and the committee that the merits of the problem were at that time rather extensively gone into.

But approaching the general proposition, let us remember that when this tax has been spoken of as a 12 per cent tax, as a 13 per cent tax, as a 25 per cent tax, I fear this leaves a false impression. Let us remember, in the first place, as a fundamental and elementary fact, this point. No corporation is taxed if it does not make and declare a net profit or a net income.

Moreover, your statistics of the Treasury prove that out of every $10,000 in gross profits or in gross income annually from corporate sources $9,000 is lost through deductions or exemptions and is not income for taxable purposes. This leaves $1,000 out of the $10,000 for taxable purposes. Under the corporation-tax provision the Government simply says that if you are a going concern in the United States and if you make a net profit of $1,000 every year after all deductions have been allowed and after such nine-tenths of all corporate gross income has been exempted from taxation we will take annually one-eighth, or 12 per cent (or under the present bill 13 per cent, which is still approximately one-eighth of your net annual income).

This is a plain, honest statement of the general purport of the law. We have heard it stated in the course of the debate that under the present or existing law the situation exists where corporations earning in England a portion of their profit are actually paying into our Treasury a tax amounting to about a tenth of their net income there, as against a rate of one-eighth which they pay on profits accruing in the United States.

It seems to me the problem, now that we are facing this critical situation, resolves itself into the simple question: Shall we tax these profits made abroad by corporations who are guaranteed the support and protection of our Navy ard our marines and our national honor a little more heavily for a time in order to help meet this deficit that we are trying to wipe out?

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman knows as a practical proposition that Americans doing business abroad receive very little consideration or assistance from this Government. It is all very well to talk about the marines and the Navy and the Army, but as a practical proposition when an American concern goes into a foreign country it must depend upon the foreign police or foreign agencies for any protection it may receive.

Mr. KVALE. Oh, I could argue that with my friend the gentleman from my neighboring district at some length, but I can not take that question up at the moment.

I feel this is a meritorious proposition. It was decided once by the committee, and I hope that the former vote will be sustained here this afternoon. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. There are only eight minutes remaining, and the Chair has recognized three gentlemen in favor of the amendment. The Chair feels that he should recognize some one in opposition.

Mr. DICKINSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. DICKINSON. No, Mr. Chairman; I am in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for two minutes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the Johnson amendment. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that, according to my recollection, when there was a much larger attendance the Johnson amendment was sustained by a large majority, nearly 2 to 1, I think. It was estimated that it would save to this bill about $30,000,000. Now it is said by the Treasury Department that it will save at least $12,000,000. If you strike this out you have got to find some other subject to make up that amount.

I think those who go abroad to make their fortunes owe something to the country in rhich they established their business. [Applause.] I think they ought to pay something to the Government, and ought not to be able to offset their taxable income here by what they pay abroad.

I want to call the attention of the distinguished gentleman, the acting chairman in charge of the bill, to the fact that a statement made the other day indicated that personally he was friendly to the amendment. I hope the Johnson amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this was included in the estimate of balancing the Budget to the extent of $12,000,000?

Mr. CRISP. That is correct.

Mr. GLOVER. Then I see no reason why we should quibble over this. The subcommittee has favored it, the House has already passed on the question. We ought not to reverse ourselves when we are trying to balance the Budget. I see no reason why a man making his wealth in this country, if this country is not big enough to operate in and he goes to a foreign country and invests his capital there, because, perchance, he pays some tax there, that he should be credited for it back here. Let us pass the Johnson amendment and save $12,000,000, and keep American capital at home to employ American labor that is now out of employment and wants to work. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when this proposal was under consideration the other day it was distinctly understood and so expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Chindblom], that that section was merely a cross-reference. If you adopt this amendment, you drive American capital from seeking investment in foreign countries. That is the avowed purpose of its proponents. Capital is mobile; it seeks the place wherever it can get a gainful investment. I thought we took pride after the World War in becoming the creditor Nation of the world. But this proposal seeks to bar economic laws and aggravate the financial and economic revival of business in this country by penalizing American capital invested abroad.

Henry Ford did not go abroad to invest his money because he wished to supply from foreign countries the field of American consumption. He went abroad, as the distinguished leader of the majority, Mr. Rainey, said, to meet conditions in Belgium, in France, in Italy, in Germany, and other countries occasioned by their tariff policies. The branch factories were established before the passage of the Hawley-Smoot bill. Mr. Ford established these plants to cope with and meet conditions that prevailed in the automobile field abroad. Many American manufacturers have established branch establishments in different parts of the country, to reduce costs of production by the elimination of freights and the like.

American automobile manufacturers and in other lines have established branch factories abroad for a similar purpose. Shall we dwarf and cripple their expanding policy of world domination by this provincial policy of trying to restrain American capital only for home utilization?

Now, take the concrete case of the gentleman from Oregon, where an American corporation makes $100,000 in Great Britain and pays $27,500 income taxes to that country for the privilege of doing business there. Suppose the same corporation makes $100,000 in this country also. It would be charged under the present bill not only upon the $100,000 made here but with the net gain of $72,500 made in Great Britain, or on a total of $172,500, for the taxable year, on which the United States would receive the regular return of 13 per cent chargeable to all corporations. The provincialists would not credit the American corporation with the $27,500 income tax he was obliged to pay to Great Britain but would compel it to pay an income tax on a paper return of $100,000 which in fact it did not receive.

Are you going to allow the French and German automobile industry to capture that market for themselves, or will you approve the General Motors and Ford and all these other large industries going over there because of tariff conditions, in order to meet the local conditions, and invest their capital and get the benefit of the market there? We do get a return on their profits made in those countries, except on the taxes they are obliged to pay to the local governments.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.
Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman may recall that before the World War, when we were a debtor nation, we were very much gratified to have foreign capital invest in this country, and that a great amount of it was invested in this country.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the very purpose of this amendment, as disclosed by the hearings had before the Committee on Ways and Means on February 28 to March 1, 1930, on double taxation, shows that France not only doubles but trebles on the American investment. This is only fair and equitable to the American capitalist who wishes to keep his capital employed. There is no question of having cars brought over here in competition, except that in one case

Henry Ford, temporarily, as I am informed, established in Dublin a tractor plant because of exigent conditions in changing his plant from Highland Park to the River Rouge.

And who has reaped the advantage of that change? The Allis-Chalmers Co., of my own city, and the General Motors and others are capturing the American market with lowpriced tractors, and Ford is going to meet that competition by reestablishing a tractor factory here.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Assuming that manufacturers did go over there to meet conditions after the war, will the gentleman explain why the Mellon interests are going into Canada now?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because Canada raised her tariff barriers. Prior to the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill the Canadian Government did not have such high tariff barriers, so that the American motor industry could import free of duty more than 50 per cent of the parts that make a complete

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman wants to protect the Mellon interests?

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to encourage American capital in foreign investments. I want to see American capital dominate the world in industry, and have foreign countries pay tribute to this country because of American genius in the world of manufacture.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Johnson].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Johnson of Missouri) there were-ayes 62, noes 70.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. Coch-RAN of Missouri and Mr. CRISP to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported there were ayes 64, noes 80.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read down to and including line 16 on page 108. Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, we have now reached the section of consolidated and affiliated returns. The Committee on Ways and Means is considering an amendment to recommend in respect to that section. I ask unanimous consent that the section be passed over for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. That section has already been passed over by agreement.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I am advised that the gentlemen of the minority desire to have a conference at 5 o'clock. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BANKHEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10236 and had come to no resolution thereon.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, it is important that we dispose of the tax measure. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business, in order to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

FARM ORGANIZATIONS NOT FOR FEDERAL PAY CUT

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an exchange of correspondence between myself and the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, the Farmers' Educational Cooperative Union of America, and the National Grange.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me I desire to file herewith, for the information of the membership, exchange of correspondence between the various important and national farm organizations and myself on the subject of Federal wages. I contacted these organizations for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was true that these great national farm organizations, representing millions of American farmers, were taking an active part in favor of a general reduction of Federal salaries. It had been so stated. I am very happy to be able to note from this correspondence that the great national farm organizations have taken no action on the subject, and, therefore, it can not truthfully be said that they are favoring any general salary-reduction plan.

On the other hand, the responsible heads of these organizations, men of the highest standing, known throughout this country, students of economics, give their personal views on the subject, and without exception it is gratifying to note that they see the real purpose back of the proposed Federal salary cut as the first step in a general cut of wages and salary in industry and commerce throughout the United States, thereby lowering standards of living and reducing the purchasing power of the great masses of working people and wage earners in this country, and that the farmer would suffer most from such a fallacious economic policy.

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU,

Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I am sure you know that I have always done everything within my power for the aid of the farmers because I believe that we have everything in common. If I have accomplished nothing else, I think that I have been able to establish that the policy of dividing the workers of the industrial centers from the farmers of the country was detrimental to their respective interests and to the benefit of the exploiters of both.

At this year, time there is an extraord to reduce all Federal establishments.

At this very time there is an attempt to reduce all Federal salaries, which I am convinced is in keeping with a determined move-ment throughout the country to reduce wages in all industries, business and commerce. I need not point out to you that this will reflect not only on commodity prices but also on quantity con-sumption. The farmer will have to bear more than his share if such a disastrous policy of carried out.

Any salary reduction of Government employees can have little or no effect on the financial condition of the Treasury. Excluding such fixed charges as the debt service, requiring $1,000,000,000, and the Veterans' Administration, requiring a billion dollars, the Army and the Navy, and rivers and harbors improvements, the margin from which economies may be made is not great, and no real economy can be effected unless all of the lower-paid employees are reduced. It has been openly admitted that this would be psychological. True, it would be the justification for the general reduction of wages throughout the country that I have mentioned reduction of wages throughout the country that I have mentioned.

I would greatly appreciate if you will give this matter some consideration. May I suggest a conference between the representatives of the various farm organizations with a view of discussing sideration. tives of the various farm organizations with a view of discussing this subject and getting an expression from you? I know nothing that could produce a better effect to cement the ties that we have been seeking to establish between the workers in the city and those on the farm than for your organization to take a stand in opposition to the proposed salary cuts.

May I hear from you at your convenience?

With kindest regards, I am, very truly yours,

F. LaGuardia.

I am inclosing copy of editorial I wrote on this subject for Grange News of December 20, 1931. There is not much more to be added. I feel that prosperity depends upon developing the purchasing power of our people. There are several definite factors preventing its return, including—Unemployment.

 Fear of unemployment.

2. Fear of unemployment.
3. Low commodity prices.
4. Loss of confidence in financial institutions.
It is my belief that low commodity prices have been the cause of the whole mess. Agriculture joined with other organized groups in getting protective legislation for almost all other types of industry but found itself compelled to compete with the rest of the world with no protection on its basic stable commodities. Producing under a protective system, our costs of production were higher than the rest of the world, with the result that each year for the last 10 years agriculture has been living off of its capital. It was not the deflation of 1921 nor again 1929 which hit agriculture so extensively, but it was a gradual destruction of the capital investment and purchasing power of the farmers which went on for a 10-year period. It is impossible to destroy the purchasing power of 40 per cent of our people, either engaged in agriculture or directly dependent upon agriculture, without bringing disaster down upon the whole Nation. We have been pointing this out for six or eight years without effect, but after we had consumed over $30,000,000,000 of the $78,000,000,000 invested in agriculture and had neither income nor credit with which to buy, the persuand consuming power of this great portion of our Nation. paralyzed consuming power of this great portion of our Nation was the direct cause of a piling up of surplus stocks in every line of industry, the recession of sales and profits, and the debacle of maintenance of wages will not alone clear the difficulty.

Three distinct steps are necessary.

First, we must restore confidence in our financial institutions. and it is my personal opinion that the most effective and permanent method is through a system of Federal depositories, for I do not believe the temper of the people is such as to support, with confidence, any banking system under the control of the international bankers who have been responsible for a large por-international bankers who have been responsible for a large portion of our present problems.

Second, agriculture must be given a type of protection as effective as that provided for labor and other industries.

Third, if these other two projects are accomplished so that we have remedied the troubles which have caused the disaster, men should be put back to work on the development of public improvements until the purchasing power is built up to the point of setting our wheels of industry in motion again.

In my opinion, it will not require a large expenditure of public funds if we can cure the two evils outlined in suggestions 1 and 2, for the country is woefully short of needed supplies, and if we can once establish a credit system which will make money available and stop hoarding and, at the same time, put 40 per cent of our people in a position where they can produce profitably, the demand will be overwhelming. The farms of America need a billion dollars' worth of paint alone, and this is but a very small item in the needs of rural America.

I have tried to outline what I believe is a constructive program. I am very confident that a destructive program, such as a general

I am very confident that a destructive program, such as a general slashing of wages and commodity values, will but aggravate the situation

Yours very truly.

WAGES AND PRICES

[Extract from letter received by State Master Goss]

"Is it true that you are opposing reduction in wages when everything else is down, and, if so, why?"

The question is such a live one and is being asked so frequently, that I shall attempt to answer through the columns of Grange News. The State Grange having taken no stand on the question, it will be understood that the views expressed are my personal opinion.

While some readjustments in wages are undoubtedly in order, as while some readjustments in wages are undoubtenly in order, as a general rule, I think it a serious mistake to advocate wage cutting or reduction in salaries, except in cases of those very large salaries which have always been too high. The problem which confronts America is not that of high wages or high salaries, but an unfair distribution of wealth which is being diverted to the possession of a very few. To curtail the spending power of the average wage worker or salaried man would serve to make matters worse rather than better.

There is a more direct reason why farmers should oppose such moves. Agriculture has a mortgage debt upon farms in excess of $11,000,000,000, and it is estimated that it carries further debts, bringing the total close to $20,000,000,000. Most of these debts were contracted when farm prices were from two to three times as high as they now are. A conservative estimate would be that these debts were contracted when farm prices averaged two and one half times as high as at present.

these debts were contracted when farm prices averaged two and one-half times as high as at present.

The only means the farmer has of paying his debts is by raising farm produce and selling it. This means that in order to pay his debts and pay his interest he must market two and one-half times as much produce as when contracted. This means that in terms of farm produce—his only source of income—he must pay interest varying from 15 per cent to 20 per cent and must eventually pay $2.50 on principal for every dollar borrowed, measured in terms of farm produce. of farm produce.
This can not be done.

If this condition continues it means wholesale bankruptcy for

If this condition continues it means wholesale bankrupicy for American agriculture.

Our only remedy lies in raising the commodity price level to a point somewhere near the point at which our $20,000,000,000 in farm debts were contracted.

I know of no more powerful argument against restoring former price levels than the argument which could and would be presented if labor and salaried people were forced down to the same sented if labor and salaried people were forced down to the same level as agriculture.

Justice requires that compensation for agriculture and compensation for labor and salaried men should be on a proportionate basis, but the farmer's effort to force their compensation down to our present levels, thus assuring that our present low levels will become practically permanent, is a very short-sighted policy. The only sound policy is to fight to have our commodity levels lifted to values comparable with wages and salaries.

Agriculture can not pay its debts at present commodity prices. We have no alternative. We must have restored commodity prices or bankruptcy. Why, therefore, should we go off on the tangent of destroying the purchasing power of our best customers and thereby assist in fastening the present low commodity values upon

I realize clearly that my opinions on this subject are not popular among most farmers, but I have given the matter the best thought of which I am capable and can not honestly express any other opinion .- A. S. G.

THE PRESIDENT IS FURNISHING NATIONAL LEADERSHIP

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech delivered over the radio last night by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Wood].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. WILLIAM R. WOOD, OF INDIANA, IN REFUTATION OF STATEMENTS OF HON. JOUETT SHOUSE

I am here to answer the slanderous statements made concerning the President of the United States by Mr. Jouett Shouse, chair-man of the executive committee of the Democratic National Comman of the executive committee of the Democratic National Committee, last Saturday evening over a nation-wide hook-up on this broadcasting system. Mr. Shouse personally is not of sufficient consequence to warrant the distinction of being singled out for reply. It is the fact that his utterances were made in his capacity as the official spokesman of the Democratic National Committee that demands what he said to be given direct and positive refutation.

The President last Friday issued a public statement calling for unity of action in balancing the Budget, asking the Nation to support Congress in the difficult task and giving courageous assurance to the world that the financial structure of the United States Government would be sustained. He uttered no word of partisanship; he spoke highly of the Democratic leaders; he pitched his appeal to save hardship to millions in lofty terms of patriotism. His words gave stability in a world greatly shocked by the failure of the Democratic majority in the House to stand by its own measures which failure threatened the entire fabric of by its own measures, which failure threatened the entire fabric of public confidence. The President's statement appeared in the press of last Saturday morning.

Press of last Saturday morning.

Now comes Jouett Shouse spreading a smoke screen over this Democratic failure by misrepresentation and slander only paralleled by the last three years of effort by the Democratic National Committee to smear the President of the United States.

Mr. Shouse made three utterly false charges against the Chief Executive of the United States. First, that it was not until last Saturday that President Hoover made any appeal to the Congress or to the American public to balance the Budget. Second, that the existing deficit was created by this Republican administraor to the American public to balance the Budget. Second, that the existing deficit was created by this Republican administra-tion. Third, that President Hoover introduced partisan politics into the present effort upon the part of the House of Repre-sentatives to pass a tax bill. I shall discuss these three slanders in the order mentioned.

Mr. Shouse said:

"In to-day's papers President Hoover has issued to the American people a plea that Congress shall balance the Budget. * * * It must be a matter of regret to Mr. Hoover's friends, as it is a matter of deep moment to the American people, that he should have delayed so long in voicing his concern and in uttering his plea."

The record shows that President Hoover uttered his first warning against increasing and unwarranted Federal expenditures which ing against increasing and unwarranted Federal expenditures which would, if persisted in, unbalance the Budget as early as December 9, 1930. The President did not wait until after the horse was stolen before he urged Congress to lock the door.

In that statement he pointed out that bills calling for $4,500,-000,000 in appropriations over and above routine appropriations necessary to run the Government had been introduced under the guise of giving relief to some kind or another. And he warned Congress that their passage would result in financial embarrassment to the Federal Government in that it would necessitate either an increase in taxes or an increase in bond issues. I now quote from his warning as of that date:

"No matter how devised, an increase in taxes in the end falls from his warning as of that date:

"No matter how devised, an increase in taxes in the end falls upon the workers and the farmers, or, alternatively, deprives industry of that much ability to give employment and defeats the very purpose of these schemes. For the Government to finance public bond issues deprives industry and agriculture of just that much capital for its own use and for employment."

Then the President added: "Prosperity can not be restored by raids upon the Public Treasury. The leaders of both parties are cooperating to prevent any such event."

Note the President was gracious enough to state that "the Cooperating to prevent any such event."

Note the President was gracious enough to state that "the leaders of both parties are cooperating" to prevent a raid upon the Treasury. He did not single out the Democratic Party or any of its leaders for criticism. Yet on the very day the statement was issued, Democrat after Democrat arose upon the floor of Congress and denounced President Hoover because of it. That instant reaction by the Democrats constituted a public admission that they were the ones guilty of attempting to raid the Public Treasury. The shoe fit, and they hastened to put it on.

The attack in the Senate was led by the late Senator Caraway, who poured upon the head of the President all the bitter denunciation for which the Arkansas Senator was noted. He was followed by Senator Walsh, Democrat, of Massachusetts, who, after denouncing the President, challenged his statement that "leaders of both parties were cooperating" against the orgy of appropriations. Senator Walsh challenged any Democrat who agreed with the President to make it known, because he said he wanted such a Democrat "marked" so that his associates might know him for Senator Par Harrison joined in the denunciation of President Hoover's calling a halt to outrageous demands upon the Public Treasury. He charged that the President's statement that leaders of both parties were cooperating to prevent the Public Treasury being raided was not true, in so far as Democratic leadership was concerned. Here are Senator Harrison's words upon that

"President Hoover is trying to put Democratic leadership in a hole, and he is doing it deliberately. He is trying to compel Democratic leadership to assume responsibilities that it should

That is the first time in the annals of American history that a spokesman for a political party ever charged that he and other leaders of his party were being "put in a hole" by being asked to cooperate in protecting the integrity of the Federal Treasury. Senator Walsh of Massachusetts interrupted Senator Harrison's harangue with the following question:

"I should like to inquire of the Senator if he knows of a single Democratic leader in this country who is in sympathy with the policy and sentiments expressed in the statement of the President of the United States?"

To which question Senator Harrison replied that he did not

To which question Senator Harrison replied that he did not know of any such Democratic Senator, and then Senator HARRISON continued:

"We (the Democrats) propose to vote for such appropriations, large though they may be in the estimate of the President as are required to meet this situation; and if increased taxes are necessary to do that, then let us have the courage and the statesmanship to meet the issue at that time."

By reason of President Hoover's resolute opposition, the majority of the bills which he referred to failed of passage. Nevertheless a few were passed, and President Hoover vetoed them—nine in number. Seven of his vetoes were sustained. Those seven bills carried in the aggregate appropriations for $853,787,000, which was saved for the public by the President's veto. Two of his vetoes were overridden. One of them accounts for $60,000,000 of the present deficit. The other bill passed over the President's veto accounts for over $300,000,000 of this deficit and, in addition, the sale of Government securities to the amount of $930,000,000, which has had the effect of depreciating the market value of all Government securities and increasing the rate of interest which the Federal Government must pay on securities it must issue to meet the exist-Government must pay on securities it must issue to meet the existing deficit. For the veto of those bills, President Hoover was bitterly denounced by Democrats in both branches of Congress. September 21, 1931, President Hoover journeyed to Detroit, Mich., to address the annual convention of the American Legion, for the purpose of enlisting the efforts of that organization against further increases of governmental expenditures at this time. In the course of his address he said:

"The imperative moment has come when increase in Govern-ment expenditures must be avoided, whether it be ill-considered, ment expenditures must be avoided, whether it be ill-considered, hasty, and uninformed legislation, or whether it be for services meritorious in themselves. Every additional expenditure placed upon our Government in this emergency magnifies itself out of all proportion into intolerable pressure, whether it is by taxation or by loans. Either loans or taxes beyond the very minimum necessities of government will drain the resources of industry and commerce, and that, in turn, will increase unemployment."

The President in his annual message to Congress less Decem-ties of government will drain the resources of industry and commerce, and that, in turn, will increase unemployment."

The President, in his annual message to Congress last December, renewed his appeal to keep down expenditures. He warned Congress that to go further in expenditures would "destroy public confidence, denude commerce and industry of its resources, jeopardize the financial system, and actually extend unemployment and demoralize agriculture, rather than relieve them."

The President renewed his appeal to keep down expenses in his Budget message of December 6, last year.

In a special message to Congress January 4 this year, he renewed his appeal, stating that "The country must have confidence that the credit and stability of the Federal Government will be maintained by drastic economy in expenditures."

Alarmed by the number of "pork-barrel" bills which were introduced in the present Congress, some of which gave promise of passage, on January 8 last the President renewed his warning in a special statement in which he stated that our first duty as a nation was to put our governmental house in order by the reduction of governmental expenditures. He added the warning that "We can not squander ourselves into prosperity."

In view of this record, then, it is an exhibition of political mendacity for the official spokesman of the Democratic National Committee to make the public charge that the President of the United States did not, until last Saturday, raise his voice in an effort to balance the Budget of the United States.

The second charge of Mr. Shouse is that the existing deficit is "a Hoover deficit." This is not the first time Mr. Shouse has made that charge. He made it in a formal address over the air March 13 last. Mr. Shouse is not the only Democratic leader making that charge. It has been repeatedly made by Democrats on the floor of the House during the discussion of the pending tax bill. The evidence is conclusive that the Democratic Party is launching upon a campaign of misrepresentation in r

What are the facts? The deficit for the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1931, was $500,000,000, not including debt redemption. The decrease in Federal revenues for that year was $861,000,000. The deficit for the current fiscal year, ending next June 30, will be approximately $2,000,000,000, not including debt reduction. How much of this will be due to decreasing revenues can not be determined at this date. But it is definitely known that the revenues for the calendar year 1931 were more than $2,000,000,000 less than for the calendar year 1928, and at the rate the decrease in revenues is progressing there is not the slightest doubt but that the revenues for the current fiscal year may show a decrease of at least $2,500,000,000. least $2,500,000,000.

President Hoover can no more be charged with the responsibility for this decrease in the public revenues, the major factor in the deficit, than he can be charged with having caused the Great War, the stock-exchange panic, the drought, the Porto Rican hurricane, the Government of Great Britain going off the gold standard, the revolutions in 18 countries, the overproduction of commoditudes. ties, the panic in Germany, or any other of the numerous disasters, both economic and physical, which have overtaken the world during the past few years and caused and prolonged this depres-during the past few years and caused and prolonged this depression.

A portion of the deficit is due to increased appropriations—some emergency appropriation, some otherwise. Of the emergency appropriations, $500,000,000 were for increasing public buildings and public-work construction as a means of relieving unemployment. Every Democrat in both branches of Congress voted for these appropriations and criticized the President because they were not larger. In fact, on last Saturday afternoon, only a few hours before Mr. Shouse made his attack upon the President, Senator Wagner, Democrat of New York, in a radio talk over another broadcasting system, criticized the present administration for not going ahead with public works, which would amount to an expenditure of another $1,000,000,000.

Drought relief necessitated an emergency appropriation of $45,000,000. Every Democrat in both branches of Congress voted for this and criticized the President because it was not made $100,000,000. Sixty-six million five hundred thousand dollars are accounted for by increased pensions, for which the Democrats voted, which the President vetoed, and which the Democrats assisted in passing over the President's veto. Seventy-one million dollars is accounted for by additional appropriations for the Veterans' Bureau. These are the facts. The record shows it. They can not be truthfully contradicted.

Mr. Shouse is greatly concerned about the "Hoover deficit."

Mr. Shouse is greatly concerned about the "Hoover deficit." He views a Federal deficit from an entirely different angle than he did a year ago. In the February, 1931, Atlantic Monthly, Mr. Shouse was urging limitless expenditures by the Federal Government, regardless of deficits which such a policy might create. Criticizing the Republican administration at that time for not spending more money, he said:

"Federal work in the construction of reads and public buildings."

Federal work in the construction of roads and public buildings should be pushed and expanded. We appropriated money with-out stint to meet the demands of war. In the same spirit we should expend whatever sum is necessary to care for the present severe crisis of peace. And we should not be too much concerned over the possibility that there may be a deficit in the Treasury."

over the possibility that there may be a deficit in the Treasury."

Shortly after that article appeared, Mr. Shouse made a speaking tour of the United States. Everywhere he went he denounced the Republican administration and President Hoover for not going ahead blindly, squandering money right and left, giving every community and almost every individual a Federal hand-out regardless of the deficit that would thereby be created.

Democratic Members of the present Congress, regardless of President Hoover's repeated warnings, regardless of the existing deficit, regardless of the necessary increase in taxes or bonded indebtedness which would jeopardize the financial structure of the United States, are already boasting of the fact that they are going to add another $2,000,000,000 to the existing deficit by the passage of another bonus bill. age of another bonus bill.

The third false charge laid against the President by Mr. Shouse was that President Hoover has introduced partisanship into the discussion of the pending tax bill. He based that charge upon the statement of a third person who, coming from the White House, said the President had characterized the tax bill, as defeated by the House last week, as a Democratic measure. The President may or may not have so designated that bill. He probably did not, as he had urged Republicans to support the bill as a necessity because of the great crisis, even if they did not like the bill. If he did, he spoke the truth and merely repeated what the Democratic leaders sponsoring the bill had already stated on the floor of the

The record shows that Representative Crist, Democrat, of Georgia, acting chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, when he reported the bill to the House March 10, specifically stated that the Treasury Department, which represents the administration, presented to the committee an entirely different program than that reported by the committee. He repeated this on the floor of the House March 19, when he said:

"May I say here that the Treasury Department was opposed to a manufacturers' tax (that is, the sales tax). They repeatedly expressed their opposition to it and urged that the Treasury program be adopted; but after the committee had worked for a week or ten days in executive session considering these special items, I suggested that a subcommittee be appointed to consider the broad basis of a manufacturers' tax. The Treasury Department was still opposed to a sales tax."

So the sales-tax feature of the tax bill was not an administra-So the sales-tax feature of the tax bill was not an administration measure. It did not have the sanction of the Treasury Department. Nevertheless, when the bill was reported, the entire force of the administration was placed back of the passage of the bill as reported, because the administration, with President Hoover as its leader, felt that the passage of a tax measure which would balance the Budget was of far greater importance than any discussion as to the authorship of the bill. That attitude certainly was not partisanship.

Mr. Shouse says in this connection that if President Hoover.

Mr. Shouse says in this connection that if President Hoover had made his statement two weeks ago, before the House had acted upon the sales tax—and I now quote Mr. Shouse:

"It would have helped those who were trying to fight the battle for a balanced Budget. Now it is issued after the House has wreeked the committee bill and after the legislative situation has been thrown into such a state of confusion, and even chaos, that the outcome is difficult to predict."

But Mr. Shouse did not tell his radio audience that of the 153 votes which were cast in support of the sales-tax feature, 113 were delivered by the Republican administration and only 40 of them delivered by the Republican administration and only 40 of them were delivered by the Democratic House organization which had reported the bill and which had sponsored it on the floor of the House. The Republican votes for the bill constituted a majority of the Republican membership of the House. If a majority of the Democratic membership had voted for their own measure it would have passed. Instead, only 40 out of a Democratic membership of 220 supported the bill.

There is not the slightest doubt but that the legislative situation in the House of Representatives has been thrown into a state of confusion and chaos, but it exists because of the fact that the Democratic membership of the House refused to follow its own leadership on the floor and not-because of any lack of its own leadership on the floor and not-because of any lack of help from the Republicans and the administration.

By humiliating their own leadership and destroying their own organization the Democrats in the House have reverted to type. They have demonstrated they are unable to govern themselves, and therefore it stands to reason that they can not be expected to govern the country.

The leadership of the American people has been furnished by President Hoover for the last three years. It has been courageous and constructive. It has saved the American people from the infinitely greater misery that exists among other peoples of the world. In this critical hour all that Jouett Shouse and the other hirelings of the Democratic National Committee are able to suggest to the country is the destruction of confidence in the Govern gest to the country is the destruction of confidence in the Government of the United States and the repudiation of its President.

The United States is at war with depression. The general who is courageously leading it toward victory is now being hampered by demagogues who seek to break down support while the battle

DEATH OF HON, CHARLES J. THOMPSON

Mr. KNIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to announce the death of a former Member of this House.

I learned last night that my predecessor, Hon. Charles J. Thompson, of Defiance, Ohio, passed away at the home of his son in Albuquerque, N. Mex.

While Mr. Thompson and I were opponents, I am gratified to be able to give assurance that our personal relations were friendly. He was a high-standard citizen and a faithful and efficient public servant. During his 12 years of service in the House he endeared himself to many of the Members of this body.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my personal feeling of sorrow in the passing of this distinguished citizen of the State of Ohio and of my congressional district.
